F. Low, K.C. (William Mackenzie with him) for the appellant.—It is sufficient to deal with one of the three orders. Sect. 96 of the Public Health Act 1875 is the section under which an order for the abatement of a nuisance is made by a court of summary jurisdiction. By sect. 12 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), every complaint and information "shall be heard, tried, determined, and adjudged by one or two or more justice or justices of the peace, as shall be directed by the Act of Parliament upon which such complaint or information shall be framed, or such other Act or Acts of Parliament as there may be in that behalf." There is in the present case such a direction that the matter of this information shall be heard by two justices, as sect. 251 of the Public Health Act 1875 provides that the court of summary jurisdiction, when hearing and determining a complaint under the Act, shall be constituted of two or more justices in petty sessions. Therefore there must be at least two justices sitting to hear a complaint of this kind, and that section is relied on as showing that. Then, by sect. 14 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, if the justice or justices convict or make an order against the defendant, "a minute or memorandum thereof shall then be made, for which no fee shall be paid, and shall afterwards be drawn up by the said justice or justices in proper form, under his or their hand and seal or hands and seals, and he or they shall cause the same to be lodged with the clerk of the peace to be by him filed among the records of the general quarter sessions of the peace . . ." That procedure was followed in this case; the order was first drawn up, and it was then signed, but it was signed by one justice only of the three who sat and heard the case, and being so signed it was served on the appellant. The form of order for abatement of a nuisance under this section (sect. 96 of the Act of 1875), is form C in sched. 4 to that Act. Some orders may be made by one justice and some are to be made by two justices; and the forms which are now in use under the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 are the Consolidated Forms 1886, which are given in the schedule to the Summary Jurisdiction Rules 1886. Under sect. 12 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 a court of summary jurisdiction may be composed of one, two, or more justices. Then when we look at sect. 251 of the Act of 1875, the section requires two justices at least to hear this case, and to give the court jurisdiction there must be two justices at least. Then as to the form of the order it is clear that if an order is required to be made by two justices, a form that is open to the construction that the order is made by only one justice is inapplicable. It is clear upon these sections that the order as drawn up must be signed by two justices, and that this order, having been signed by one justice only, is bad upon that ground, and the quarter sessions were therefore wrong in holding that the signature of one justice to the order was sufficient. He referred to

Avory, K.C. (S. G. Lushington and Swinburne-Hanham with him) for the respondents.—Two justices having sat to hear the case, the order signed by one justice is sufficient. It may be a question whether the appeal was in fact an appeal against the written document or was an appeal from the verbal order made in open court, and in that connection the form of the order ought to be looked at. The appellant's notice of appeal was against an order made by the justices of the Epsom Division, and at the time he gave that notice of appeal he had nothing to go upon except the verbal adjudication of the justices in open court. There was a perfectly good order upon the appellant made by the justices verbally in court, and it is submitted that the appellant could have been summoned for not obeying that order even if a written notice or order had not been served upon him. The order as drawn up is in fact only drawn up for the quarter sessions, and the only reason for drawing it up is that it may be sent to quarter sessions and preserved there as a record of the order which might be made at quarter sessions. That is the effect of sect. 14 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, which says that the order when drawn up is "to be lodged with the clerk of the peace, to be by him filed among the records of the general quarter sessions," as the court of summary jurisdiction is not a court of record. Under sect. 96, if the court is satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, they may make an order, and under sect. 98 if the person does not obey the order he is liable to a penalty. If there were no other order than the written order, and if this order were bad on the face of it, then the court would look at the order; but the justices can make a perfectly valid order verbally in court and say to a person that he must do a certain thing, and the person could be summoned WING (app.) v. EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.).

for not doing that thing. If we refer to the recognisance to prosecute the appeal it recites that the order was made by two justices, so that both the notice of appeal and the recognisance recognise that the order was made by two justices. The fact that it was signed by one justice only follows the general form for all these purposes. Sect. 29 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 gave the Lord Chancellor power to make rules as to the forms to be used under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; and sect. 12 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1884 provided that any rules for the time being in force under that section should be of the same effect as if they were contained in the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848. Rules were made under the Act of 1884, and there is attached thereto a schedule of forms—the Consolidated Forms 1886—and by rule 31 those forms, or others to the like effect, may be used, and these are the forms now in use. There is a general form, form 19 (Douglas, 8th edit., p. 248), and in that form there is the signature of one justice only. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Suppose the order had no name of a justice upon it, would the party be bound to obey it?] Yes; there would be nothing to prevent the justices making an order then and there in court for the abatement of a nuisance forthwith—as, for example, in the case of a dangerous nuisance likely to spread disease. That would be a good order, and the person might be summoned next day for not complying with it, although no written notice or written order was served on him. The effect of the signature is not the making of the order valid, but the signature is merely the verification of an order previously made in court, and it is not even necessary that that order should be put into writing. The order in the present case is quite consistent with the matter having been heard by two justices. Lastly, by sect. 262 of the Act of 1875, no order made in execution of the Act is to be quashed or set aside for want of form, and at the utmost the defect alleged in this case is a mere want of form. There is no case on the point, but upon the statutes the quarter sessions were clearly right.

Low, K.C. was not called on to reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I confess I should have been glad if I could have seen my way to have prevented this appeal from succeeding, because I do not think that there are any merits whatever in the appeal. I have no doubt that the appellant knew that the order was made by two justices and that he appealed on the merits and failed. But a more important principle is involved in this appeal, and therefore we must decide the case in accordance with what our view of the law is. I have always understood that orders were drawn up, and sometimes courts have been ordered to draw them up, in order that if there is any objection to be taken to them, it may be raised by an appeal. Upon the appeal being heard by the quarter sessions a formal objection was taken on behalf of the present appellant that the original order of the 20th April, which was served upon the appellant, was bad upon the face of it, because it had only got the signature of one justice. If counsel, who has argued the case before us for the respondents, could have satisfied me that the object of the record, or the object of the signature of the justice, was merely for verification, or if he could have satisfied me that it was not contemplated that the order should be drawn up and served before ulterior proceedings could be taken, I should have been able to come to the conclusion that there was not the necessity for an order, good upon the face of it, being served. But I think the words of the statute are too strong, and I must say that there is this very important principle before proceedings can be launched against a person which may ultimately result in subsequent proceedings against him for penalties, and may put him to costs, that the order made upon him should be definitely certain, and should in accordance with the well-known principle, be good upon the face of it. Sect. 96 of the Public Health Act 1875 says: "If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exists, . . . the court shall make an order on such person requiring him . . . to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order." I do not want to lay too much stress on the words "specified in the order," but they occurred to me as rather indicating something to be in writing, and not merely "stated in court"; but it is possible that that is consistent with what I may call the verbal order. Then the court may by their order impose a penalty not exceeding 5*l.* on the person on whom the order is made. Then I ought to notice, though it is not disputed, but it is admitted, that two or more justices ought to have heard and did in fact hear these proceedings, as provided by sect. 251 of the Act which says: "The Court of Summary Jurisdiction when hearing and determining an information or complaint under this Act shall be constituted of two or more justices." Then the form of order for the abatement of the nuisance which is to be used, is form C in sched. 4 to the Act of 1875, and that form does recite the whole proceedings, the sitting of the court, the date within which the work is to be done from the service of the order or a true copy thereof, and it indicates that it is to be signed by two justices. The only thing that enables counsel for the respondents to contend that that order so drawn up must not be an order and need not be an order, signed by two justices, is the argument he founded on sect. 14 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, that "if he or they convict or make an order against the defendant, a minute or memorandum thereof shall then be made, for which no fee shall be paid, and the conviction or order shall afterwards be drawn up by the said justice or justices in proper form under his or their hand and seal or hands and seals, and he or they shall cause the same to be lodged with the clerk of the peace, to be by him filed among the records of the general quarter sessions of the peace." It occurs to me that in a case where we had to consider this section, and where something of the same sort was referred to, I pointed out at the time, and I should like to repeat it now, that the fact that the order is to be drawn up, and that no fee is to be paid for the order or a copy of the order on being given out, would rather look as though it were intended that the person should know what were the real terms of the order made against him. The order in question in this case of the 20th April, when served, was, upon the face of it, an order made only by one justice. It is obvious that the order may be made in cases where the person has not appeared. It may be made under circumstances where it is essential, before a person can know what he has got to do, that the order shall be given to him, and shall specify what he has to do. It seems to me, therefore, that it is an objection to these proceedings that the order which was served on the appellant in this instance, was an order which, upon the face of it, did not comply with the statute, and the fact that the present appellant to these proceedings had knowledge that two justices did sit to hear the complaint is not, in my opinion, a sufficient answer to the objection which is taken that the record of the proceedings, which must be supposed to be a truthful record, does not show, on the face of it, that the order is good. Although I am sorry to be obliged to come to this conclusion, because I do not think that there are any merits in the case yet, in my opinion, for the reasons I have given, this appeal should be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think when form C. in sched. 4, which is appended to the Public Health Act 1875, is looked at, it is clear that such an order as this is intended to be served, and, if served, it must be drawn up and must be in writing. I do not feel at all pressed with Mr. Ivory's argument that an order may have to be made which may have to be obeyed instantly, or within a very short time, because orders of this kind, although they look as if they would take a formidable time to work out, are all printed, and any magistrates clerk has forms and has nothing to do but to fill in a few blanks; and therefore, when an order is required to be immediately acted upon, there can be no real or serious difficulty in making it out and probably serving it at once. If an order is to be drawn up and is to be in writing, then I cannot help thinking that it ought to show on the face of it that it is a good order. I cannot think that the signature of a justice to an order of this kind is meant merely to verify the record, as it were. In my opinion it is intended to be part of the record itself, and to indicate who has made the order and how it has been made. The schedules to the Act are by sect. 317 to be read and have effect as parts of the Act, and the form of order is to be varied as circumstances may require, and as so varied they are to be sufficient for all purposes. But then counsel for the respondents argues that because under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1884, the forms which are to be drawn up by the Lord Chancellor and are to be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament, are substituted for the forms which were originally appended to the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1848, we must look to them to see what form would be sufficient in the present case, and he says, as the only form that is given as applicable to such a case as this, is a general form which is applicable to a great many kinds of orders which would have to be varied or supplemented by written matter in order to make them complete in each particular case, therefore, inasmuch as the form which is there given, contains the signature of only one justice, that the signature of one justice is sufficient. But I think that that overlooks the fact that in rule 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules 1886 it is said that the forms in the schedule to those rules are to be used with such variations as circumstances may require. Where the circumstances require that an order must be made by two justices, surely that is one of the instances in which the regulations or rules themselves direct that the necessary alterations should be made. Therefore I do not think that the mere fact that the signature of only one justice is provided in a general form is sufficient to qualify or abrogate the necessity of letting the order appear good on the face of it. Thinking, as I do, that the signatures of the justices or magistrates who made the order, are not merely for verification, but are for the purpose of ensuring that the record shall be a complete memorandum of the order which has been made, and the persons who made it, I therefore am of opinion that if two justices must make the order, two justices must sign it.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree; and, as my brothers have so fully expressed their reasons, I have nothing to add.

HENNAN AND CO. LIMITED v. DUCKWORTH. (a)

Dentistry—Unregistered person—Supply of false teeth—Fitting set in patient's mouth—Right to recover fee—"Dental operation, dental attendance or advice"—Dentists Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33), s. 5.

A person who was carrying on the practice of a dentist, but who was not registered under the Dentists Act 1878, made by the defendant and fitted to the defendant's mouth a set of false teeth which were taken for the defendant and kept and used by him. The defendant having refused to pay for the same:

Held, that sect. 5 of the Dentists Act 1878, which prevented an unregistered person from recovering any fee or charge for "the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice," did not prevent the unregistered person from recovering the price of the set of teeth so supplied, as distinguished from the fitting of the same.

APPEAL by the defendant from the County Court of Lancashire, held at Blackburn.

The plaintiffs, J. B. Hennan and Co. Limited, were a registered company with a registered office at Blackburn, who carried on the practice of dentists by means of unregistered managers who were not duly qualified to act as dentists under the Dentists Act 1878, and they brought the present action to recover the sum of 5*l.*, the price agreed to be paid by the defendant for a set of artificial teeth and fillings.

The particulars of the plaintiffs' claim were as follows:

To upper and lower sets of artificial teeth and fillings, 5*l.*

John B. Hennan said that he was the managing director of the plaintiff company, that he was not in the register, but that he was apprenticed to a dentist for seven years; that the defendant called on him on the 23rd April last, when he (the defendant) was wearing a set of teeth with which he was not satisfied; and the witness said that he would make a set of teeth and do some filling for 5*l.*; that the defendant visited him four times, and that on the 27th April the set was fitted in; that a Mr. Aynley fitted them in; that he (the defendant) took them away, and that he had a conversation with the defendant about not being qualified; that the defendant came and complained, and the witness offered to remedy the set.

Mr. Aynley said that the price was fixed for the teeth; that he fitted them in the defendant's mouth about the 27th April; and that the teeth were in his opinion a good fit; that the day before the action was entered he offered to alter them, but that the defendant said he could not spare them.

The defendant said that the set was bad; when he had worn them a week he went and complained, and he saw Mr. Hennan, who did something to them and told him to keep them in for some weeks; he again saw Mr. Hennan in August and said they were wrong, and that he would come in and see him at a later time; he went in September, when Mr. Hennan wanted them for the purpose of altering them, but the defendant could not spare them then. Ultimately this action was brought.

For the defendant it was objected that the plaintiffs could not recover on the ground that the action was brought to recover fees or charges for the performance of a dental operation or for dental attendance or advice, and came within the provisions of sect. 5 of the Dentists Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33).

The learned County Court judge held that the claim, so far as it was for making the set of teeth, as distinguished from the fitting of the same and the fillings, was not within the Act, and he assessed the amount to be recovered in respect of such making at the sum of 4*l.* 4*s.* for which amount he gave judgment, with leave to appeal, as he considered the matter of public interest.

The defendant appealed upon the grounds that the judge was wrong in law in not holding that the Dentists Act 1878, s. 5, was a defence to the action, and in not entering judgment for the defendant or non-suiting the plaintiffs; and that there was no evidence on which the judge could arrive at the decision he did.

Sect. 5 of the Dentists Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 33) provides:

A person registered under this Act shall be entitled to practise dentistry and dental surgery in any part of Her Majesty's dominions, and from and after the first day of August one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine, a person shall not be entitled to recover any fee or charge, in any court, for the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice, unless he is registered under this Act, or is a legally qualified medical practitioner.

R. W. Turner for the defendant. — [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The defendant kept the teeth, and for the purpose of the present case we must assume that he kept them.] Yes; the learned judge gave judgment for the whole amount, less 16*s.*, which he assessed as the costs of the fillings and the fitting. He was wrong in allowing the plaintiffs to recover any part of the claim. The point is whether under the Dentists Act the plaintiffs can charge for the bare cost of the materials, in which case there ought to have been some evidence offered as to the cost of the materials. If a person went into a dentist's shop and simply bought a set of artificial teeth, without any attendance or advice being given, then that would be a case of goods sold and delivered, and the Act would not apply to prevent the person from recovering the price. That case is totally different from the present. With regard to a person who does dental work and carries on a dental practice, it is not the value of the materials supplied for which the charge is made; the materials are merely incidental to the work, which is the skilled work of a dentist. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The judge has not given anything for "dental attendance" or "dental advice"; he has not allowed the plaintiffs anything for fitting nor for the fillings; and we must take it that what he has given is the cost of making a frame and teeth, and that he has assessed, whether rightly or wrongly, 4*l.* 4*s.* for the gold and the teeth.] Yes, for the cost of the materials. What a dentist charges for is his dental skill in preparing the teeth for the plate, in taking the impression, and in actually fitting the teeth to the mouth; but the section does not mean to hit persons who merely make frames and who make teeth which are sold to dentists. The fitting in of the gold and the teeth on the frame is a dental operation, and it is dental advice, and the giving of the teeth is merely ancillary to the advice, and therefore not recoverable. The judge had no power to split the claim, and assess so much for goods sold and delivered, and so much for dental operations. The real claim here is a claim for work done as a dentist, for dental advice, attendance, and for a dental operation, and that is the very thing the section was intended to prevent; and to allow an unregistered person to bring an action for the materials supplied in such a case would be to encourage a class of actions which it was the object of the statute to prevent. There is no hardship in not allowing such persons to recover for the materials supplied, as they can protect themselves by requiring payment before they part with the materials. There is a corresponding section (sect. 32) in the Medical Act 1858, which provides that no unregistered person shall be entitled to recover any charge "for any medical or surgical advice, attendance, or for the performance of any operation." Under that section an unregistered person who had performed a surgical operation could not recover a charge for the sutures or other things, such as splints or tubes which he had used. The reason why the Legislature in that section added the words "or for any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied" was that at that time there was the Pharmaceutical Society of Chemists, a body which supplied medicines. They may not prescribe them, but they may supply them. The section is a defence to the whole claim.

J. R. Randolph for the plaintiffs.—The learned judge took a proper view of the section. It is admitted for the purpose of this argument that the figures are correct; and, assuming them to be correct, the judge disallowed everything for fitting these teeth and so on, and he only gave the plaintiffs judgment for the balance for that which they could supply. The supply of a set of false teeth is really goods sold and delivered, and not work and labour done. In the case of Lee v. Griffin (4 L. T. Rep. 546; 1 B. & S. 272) a person who had ordered a set of false teeth died before they were delivered, and there being no memorandum under the Statute of Frauds, her representative would not pay for them. The point turned on the question whether the dentist was right in suing for goods sold and delivered, in which case he was beaten by the Statute of Frauds, or whether he was right in suing for work and labour done, in which case the statute would not apply; and the court held that it was goods sold and delivered. The court there drew the distinction between the two causes of action for goods sold and delivered and for work and labour done, and they came to the conclusion that a set of teeth, to be made for the person and fitted to the mouth and then paid for, was goods sold and delivered. That is a decision to show that the sale of a set of false teeth to be fitted to the mouth of the patient is the sale of a chattel. [He was stopped.]

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I must say that I have a strong feeling that it would be very desirable that the Dentists Act of 1878 should be amended, if it is thought by persons who are acquainted with dental matters that it is desirable that only registered and qualified persons should supply false teeth to go into person's mouths. I can well imagine that although, in one sense, it is quite a different thing to perform an operation on the teeth, the mouth, the gums, or the jaw, yet at the same time it may be an extremely uncomfortable and unsuitable thing, and I dare say, perhaps in rare cases, a dangerous thing to have improperly fitted teeth; but, I think that, taking the language of sect. 5 of the Dentists Act 1878, it does not go far enough to include such a case as this, and we must take it that, at any rate in 1878, the common use of false teeth was perfectly well known. The language used in sect. 5 is that the unregistered person shall not be entitled to recover any fee or charge "for the performance of any dental operation, or for any dental attendance or advice." In my opinion, prima facie certainly, the words in that section "dental operation" mean operation upon the person—on the mouth of the patient; "dental attendance" would mean advising in respect of the condition of the mouth, or as to what should be done, and "advice" would, of course, mean something of the same character. If it had been intended by the Legislature that the section should go on and say: "And nothing supplied by the dentist in pursuance or in consequence of such advice shall be charged for"; I think we should expect to find those words there. And I myself am a little pressed by the fact that, in the corresponding section in the Medical Act, which was passed in 1858, the Legislature did add the words: "For any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied"; whereas in the Dentists Act they did not add: "For any teeth prescribed or supplied." The reason given by counsel for the appellant—namely, that those words were inserted in the Medical Act because chemists then existed who supplied medicines without prescribing—does not seem to me quite a sufficient answer.

This Act, being an Act which prevents an unregistered person from being entitled to recover charges and fees, must be construed strictly; and while I should be glad if it should be thought desirable that the Act should be amended in the direction I have indicated, it would, in my opinion, be going too far to hold that the learned judge, who has expressly excluded any charge for fitting and advice and so on, was wrong in the view he took. Whether he has given the plaintiffs too much is a point we cannot deal with. He has assessed the amount recoverable on a right principle, unless the Act makes the supply of the false teeth part of the "dental operation," the "dental attendance" or "advice," which I do not think it does. I was for the moment pressed by counsel's suggestion that the non-registered person could protect himself by requiring payment beforehand, and by saying "You shall not take the thing away until you have paid your money for it"; but we have here to deal with a statute which prevents a person from having the ordinary rights of being paid for articles which he has supplied, and I think that the language of the section is not sufficient to bring such a case as the present within its terms. We must hold, therefore, that the County Court judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I come, with some reluctance, to the same conclusion. I say "with some reluctance," because, probably, there is no part of a dentist's work which requires more care and very often more skill than the preparation and the manufacture of false teeth, and it might very well have been that the words would have covered such a case as this. But I do not think that it is possible to say that making the teeth can come under "dental attendance or advice." Therefore we are really driven to the question whether the words "dental operation" are sufficiently large to include such work as this. It seems to me that a dental operation—an operation in respect of the teeth—really means an operation in a surgical sense, something that is to be done, not upon the false teeth, but upon the living person, and that what really is charged for here is that which was not done upon the person, but was done upon the incomplete set of false teeth, in order to make them fit the person; and I do not think that "dental operation" can reasonably be construed to cover such a state of things as that.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur, and have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

Collision—Failure to stand by and give name—Compulsory pilotage—Limits of port of Liverpool—8 Anne, c. 8—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 422, 586, 603, 633.

The fact of a vessel after collision with another vessel not standing by and giving her name, as required by sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, does not render her owners liable, if at the time she was compulsorily in charge of a pilot.

The Queen (20 L. T. Rep. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 354) followed.

A collision occurred in the estuary of the river Mersey between the steamships G. and S.

By sect. 127 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, "every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel so far to the westward as the . . . Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel."

Since the date of the Act the buoy has been removed, and for the purposes of pilotage the Bar Lightship, which occupies a position outside of that occupied by the buoy, is treated as the westward limit.

The G. at the time of the collision was at anchor between the Bar Lightship and the place where the buoy used to be.

The defendants pleaded that the S. was at the time of the collision compulsorily in charge of a pilot.

Held, that, the Fairway Buoy having been removed, the Bar Lightship occupied the same place relatively for the purposes of sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, and that pilotage was therefore compulsory.

ACTION for damage by collision brought by the owners of the steamship Gladestry against the owners of the steamship Sussex.

The collision occurred about 12.45 a.m. on the 20th Dec. 1903, about one mile S. & E. of the Mersey Bar Lightship.

The Gladestry was a steamship of 2360 tons gross register, and at the time was on a voyage from Savannah to Manchester with a cargo of cotton and phosphate rock, and manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told.

At the time of the collision she had a Liverpool pilot on board, and was at anchor, heading about S.S.E., and exhibiting the regulation anchor lights.

The Sussex was a steamship of 5474 tons gross register, and was on a voyage from Liverpool to London with a general cargo, and manned by a crew of fifty-nine hands all told. She was at the time of the collision in charge of a duly licensed Liverpool pilot.

The defendants admitted that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Sussex, but alleged that it was occasioned solely by the fault of the pilot in charge, and that the collision took place within a district in which pilotage is compulsory by law.

Barnes, J. came to the conclusion on the facts that the collision was solely caused by the negligence of the pilot in charge of the Sussex.

It appeared from the evidence of the pilot of the Gladestry that the Fairway Buoy, which marked the entrance to the Queen's Channel in 1858, was about three-quarters of a mile nearer in than the position of the present Bar Lightship.

A lightship was first placed near the bar in 1873, and the lightship and Fairway Buoy co-existed until 1875, when the latter was removed and nothing put in its place.

In 1884 the Bar Lightship was moved to its present position.

It was also alleged by the plaintiffs that those in charge of the Sussex after the collision failed, without reasonable cause, to stand by and give the name of their vessel, and to comply with the provisions of sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) is as follows:

(1) In every case of collision between two vessels, it shall be the duty of the master or person in charge of each vessel, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own vessel, crew, and passengers (if any), (a) to render to the other vessel, her master, crew, and passengers (if any), such assistance as may be practicable, and may be necessary to save them from any danger caused by the collision, and to stay by the other vessel until he has ascertained that she has no need of further assistance; and also (b) to give to the master or person in charge of the other vessel the name of his own vessel and of the port to which she belongs, and also the names of the ports from which she comes and to which she is bound. (2) If the master or person in charge of a vessel fails to comply with this section, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default.

The plaintiffs contended that at the time of the collision the Sussex was not compulsorily in charge of her pilot as she was outside the district in which pilotage is compulsory.

By sect. 3 of 8 Anne, c. 8—an Act for making a convenient dock or basin at Liverpool for the security of all ships trading to and from the said port of Liverpool—the limits of the ports are defined as:

The limits and extent whereof are as far as a certain place in Hoyle-Lake called the Redstones, and from thence all over the river Mersey to Warrington and Frodsham Bridges.

The material sections of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 92) are as follows:

Sect. 121. The board may examine any person, being of the age of eighteen years and upwards, who shall have served as an apprentice in any of the Liverpool pilot boats for not less than three years . . . and every such apprentice or other person who upon any such examination shall be found to be qualified to act as a pilot, and shall be approved of by the board, shall receive a licence in writing, signed by the secretary of the board, certifying that he is duly qualified to act as a pilot for the port of Liverpool. . . .

Sect. 123 provides for a penalty on persons acting as pilots without a licence.

[ADM.]

Sect. 124 provides that pilots misbehaving themselves are to have their licences recalled.

Sect. 127. Every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, so far to the westward as the buoy commonly called or known by the name of the Formby North-West Buoy, or Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel; and, if sailing through the Rock Channel, pilot the same so far to the westward as the North-West Buoy of Hoyle; and any pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel to such distance as aforesaid shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also, at the discretion of the board, be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 133. The board may from time to time determine, vary and alter and fix rates of pilotage to be paid to pilots for piloting vessels, such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limit: that is to say, (a) as to British vessels: For piloting a vessel from the distance of the Great Orme's Head or the coast of Wales to the port of Liverpool, not less than five shillings nor more than eight shillings per foot; for piloting a vessel any greater distance to the port of Liverpool, not less than six shillings nor more than nine shillings per foot: for piloting a vessel out of the port of Liverpool, not less than three shillings and not more than four shillings per foot; for piloting a coasting vessel, including therein vessels trading with Ireland, the islands of Faro or Ferro, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, Sark, and Man, either into or out of the port of Liverpool, one half only of the above rates respectively.

Sect. 139. In case the master of any vessel, being outward bound, and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burthen of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if such pilot had actually piloted the same into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all expenses incurred in recovering the same.

By sects. 586, 603, and 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) it is provided as follows:

Sect. 586 (1). A pilot shall be deemed a qualified pilot for the purposes of this Act if duly licensed by any pilotage authority to conduct ships to which he does not belong. (2) Every qualified pilot, on his appointment, shall receive a licence containing his name and usual place of abode, a description of his person, and a specification of the limits within which he is qualified to act. (4) Every qualified pilot acting beyond the limits for which he is qualified by his licence shall be considered an unqualified pilot.

Sect. 603 (1). Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force. (2) If within a district where pilotage is compulsory the master of an unexempted ship after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of the ship, or has made a signal for the purpose, pilots his ship himself without holding the necessary certificate, he shall be liable for each offence to a fine of double the amount of the pilotage dues that could be demanded for the conduct of the ship.

Sect. 633. An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The pilotage certificate which had been given to the pilot of the Sussex was as follows:

Pilot of the first class.—Pilot boat No. 3.—Licence No. 104.—The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Pilotage Department.—To all whom it may concern, be it known that George F. Parkinson, aged sixty-five years, being 5ft. 8in. in stature, having a fair complexion, and whose place of abode is 20, Sandown-road, Seaforth, having in pursuance of the provisions of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 been duly examined and found to be qualified to conduct any vessel into or out of Liverpool, Holyhead, Beaumaris, Chester, Fleetwood, Pile of Foudre, and the Isle of Man, is by this certificate duly licensed to act as a pilot of the first class for the port of Liverpool, from the date thereof until the 1st day of June 1904, provided that he shall comply with the provisions of the said Act, and of all other Acts binding upon him in relation to pilotage, and with every order or by-law made by the said board, and shall conduct himself with propriety and prudence.—Given by the said board.—MILES K. BURTON, Secretary.

Pickford, K.C. and Balloch for the plaintiffs.—The Sussex must be found to blame as she failed to stand by and give her name after the collision, as required by sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It may be that, if it is shown that the collision was solely the fault of the pilot, then there is proof to the contrary within the meaning of the section:

The Queen, 20 L. T. Rep. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 354.

[BARNES, J.—I think that, assuming the pilot was compulsorily in charge at the time of the collision, the fault for not standing by was his.] The Sussex at the time was not compulsorily in charge. She was going out through the Queen's Channel, and the collision happened outside the place where the Fairway Buoy used to be—that is to say, outside the limits fixed by sect. 127 of the Act of 1858. It is true that the rate charged by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is to the Bar Lightship, but the board have no power to extend the limits fixed by the Act. If the Dock Board see fit to remove the landmarks, it may make it more difficult to tell when the vessel is outside the district in which pilotage is compulsory, but that does not alter the liabilities of the parties. The fact of the pilot remaining on board after the spot where the buoy used to be is immaterial. The cases of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (20 L. T. Rep. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 237; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) and The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29) are not in point. In those cases the collision took place in a district in which the pilot was licensed to act, and he was paid a rate fixed for the whole district. In the present case he was licensed to take vessels into and out of the port of Liverpool. The question must be determined at some time or another whether the pilot is compulsorily in charge or not. If it is said that the fact of his being on board and in charge is sufficient, where is one to stop? The contention would be just as good a one for a vessel during her voyage across the full breadth of the Atlantic as for a few miles. Under sect. 133 the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board only have statutory power to levy rates for the pilotage of vessels into and out of the port of Liverpool. It may be said that if you take a pilot you pay him for piloting your vessel to the Bar Lightship, and therefore he is never your servant, but that would apply equally to a provision for piloting vessels to Holyhead, or any other place outside the port of Liverpool. It is to be noticed that the terms of the licence are for the port of Liverpool only.

THE SUSSEX.

Aspinall, K.C. and Noad, for the defendants, contra.—The real test is whether the owner has a choice and is allowed to say whether or not he will take a pilot, or whether he is obliged to take one, whether he will or not. As Lord Esher, M.R. says in The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep., at p. 51; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 30): "When therefore he took this pilot on board, he must have taken him in the ordinary way by giving notice at the pilotage station at Bristol that his ship was going out from Bristol, and would require a pilot. He does not select a pilot; he is not allowed to; he is obliged to take the pilot whom he does not select, and that, in itself, makes that pilot compulsory." It will be seen from the licence that the pilot had knowledge of various ports. What the authorities were dealing with was the requirements of their own port. It was necessary that the pilot should have knowledge of the neighbouring ports. There is here an obligation to take a pilot into and out of the port of Liverpool, and Parliament has seen fit to give the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board powers to license pilots to act far outside their own port. In 1858 the conditions were such that it was well known where the Fairway Buoy was. They have since altered, and the Harbour Board have adapted their regulations to the change of circumstances. It is submitted that there is nothing in the Act that prevents the Harbour Board from varying the limits of the pilotage district.

Pickford, K.C. in reply.—The argument of the defendants comes to this: If the shipowner treats the pilot as compulsorily in charge because he has been compelled to take him originally, then he is not liable for his negligence. There is no authority, no principle of law to support such a proposition. It does not matter whether you mean to make a man your servant or not; you must show that you were obliged to employ him and put him in charge; and, unless you are compelled to do so, you are liable. If the pilot's licence does not extend beyond the place mentioned in sect. 127 of the Act of 1858, then he becomes an unqualified pilot as soon as that place has been reached. See

There is nothing in sect. 133 which gives the Dock Board the power contended for. This is clearly shown by the words, "such rates to be according to the draught of water of such vessels, and to be within the limits following, &c."

BARNES, J.—This is a case of collision which took place on the 20th Dec. last, at a little before one o'clock in the morning, between the steamship Gladestry and the steamship Sussex, about one mile S. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. of the Mersey Bar Lightship. The Gladestry is a screw steamer belonging to the port of West Hartlepool, of 2360 tons gross register, and, whilst on a voyage from Savannah to Manchester with a cargo of cotton and phosphate rock, had anchored at the spot where the collision took place. I understand she had a Liverpool pilot on board, but nothing turns on the question of what was done on board her. Her regulation lights were burning—that is to say, the regulation lights for a vessel over 150ft. in length, at anchor, according to the rules which govern the river Mersey. Whilst in that position, at anchor, she was run into by the Sussex. The stem of the Sussex struck the port side of the Gladestry forward of the fore rigging. The Gladestry at the time was heading about S.S.E., and the tide was about ebb, running about a knot. The defendants' vessel, the Sussex, is a screw steamer of 5474 tons gross register, and was bound out from Liverpool to London. She was—I am using the term in the neutral sense at present—in charge of a duly licensed Liverpool pilot, who had, I presume, been obtained in the usual way; because the master of the defendants' ship, in answer to this question: "Had they (the brokers in Liverpool) notified the pilotage authorities that you would require a pilot?" said "I instructed them to" and "A pilot came on board." The question in this case is whether the owners of the defendant vessel are responsible for the damage which was thus occasioned to the plaintiffs' ship. The defendants' ship, according to the captain's evidence, suffered no damage at all. The charges that are made by the plaintiffs in the statement of claim impute negligent navigation to those on the Sussex, and they also impute a breach of the 422nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The defendants in their defence say as follows: "The defendants admit that the plaintiffs have suffered damage by a collision between their steamship Gladestry and the steamship Sussex, belonging to the defendants, and that such collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Sussex. They deny that such negligent navigation was by themselves or their servants or by any person for whose acts they are responsible at law." Then they plead in the second paragraph the usual plea of compulsory pilotage and allege that the damage was occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the pilot in charge of the Sussex. They say that the pilot, "though the lights of the Gladestry were reported to him when the Sussex was more than a mile distant from the Gladestry, so navigated the Sussex that she ran into the Gladestry, which was lying at anchor." That is the state of the pleadings. The plaintiffs' vessel being at anchor, with proper lights showing—there is no dispute as to that—and the defendants' vessel having navigated into her in weather that was quite clear enough for the moving vessel to keep clear of the one at anchor without the slightest difficulty, it is quite obvious that the defendants' vessel is to blame for this collision, and that the defendants would be liable for this collision unless they are exempted by reason of the vessel being in charge of a compulsory pilot at the time. I think it will appear when I come to deal with the case before Sir Robert Phillimore that that question of compulsion, or non-compulsion, determines both questions in the case—namely, the responsibility for the navigation of the Sussex and the point raised under the 422nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The first point to determine is one which I have already given my view about—namely, whether the pilot was alone to blame. There is not, to my mind, the slightest doubt about that. [His Lordship then dealt with the evidence as to this, and as to whether there had been a breach of the provisions of sect. 422 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.] The pilot, who was called here, was not asked any question about this part of the case at all, and so I have nothing but the evidence about it to which I have already referred. Now, I do not think, after considering the evidence, that the master of the defendants' ship intentionally wished to run away or keep his name dark. It would not have been the slightest use trying that, because there was a pilot on board, who had been taken on board in the usual way, and they must have known all about it afterwards. But what I think is the explanation is that which he gives himself. He said he was excited and worried. But the question is whether a master in charge of a large vessel like this is entitled to be excited and worried, and not stand by simply for that reason. In my judgment, there was in fact a failure to stand by and give the name, under sect. 422, and the question that then comes to be considered is whether a reasonable cause for such failure has been shown. Both I and the Elder Brethren, who are much better judges about this than myself, think that no reasonable cause has been shown for this failure. If we were to allow cause to be shown on such facts as these, every shipmaster would be able to show cause. In my judgment there has been no reasonable cause shown for failure to comply with some part of sect. 422, at all events. That brings me to the law applicable to the case. The position was this: There was, from what I have shown, in my opinion negligence on the part of the pilot alone which caused the collision. There was failure to comply with sect. 422, and there has not been sufficient cause shown for that failure. But as the pilot was in charge in fact, then, if he were compulsorily in charge the negligence of the pilot alone would not render the owners responsible for the navigation of the vessel, and the failure to comply with sect. 422 would, in my judgment, according to Sir Robert Phillimore's decision in the case of The Queen (ubi sup.), not make the collision one deemed to have been caused by the master or any other servant of the shipowners. Sub-sect. 2, it will be remembered, says that if the master or person in charge of a vessel fails to comply with this section, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act or default. Now, Sir Robert Phillimore, in dealing with the corresponding section of the older Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33), in which the words are "person in charge," said (20 L. T. Rep., at p. 855; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., at p. 242; L. Rep. 2 A. & E., at p. 355): "It has been argued on behalf of the Lord John Russell"—one of the ships in that case—"that the Queen is not entitled to claim this exemption upon two grounds. First, upon the construction of sect. 33 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. And this upon two grounds. First, it is said that the 'person in charge' intended by that section must, having reference to the context, be deemed to be the master, and with this part of the argument I agree. Secondly, it is contended that whereas the master has been guilty, as in this instance, of a violation of his duty in offering no assistance to the other vessel which came into collision, he is, by the words of the statute, to be deemed alone to blame for the collision, and that it follows by necessary implication that the pilot-exemption, so to speak, is taken away. With this portion of the argument I am quite unable to agree. There is no doubt, on the assumption, of course, that the pilot is alone to blame for the collision, that his liability and the exemption of the master attached when that fact took place; and if it was intended by the statute to say that the subsequent misconduct of the master would remove the exemption and fix the liability of the collision upon the master, the language, in order to produce this result, ought to have been much clearer and plainer than I now read it to be." Even assuming that the failure was to be treated as that of the master—I am not concerned for the moment in considering whether it is or is not because the effect of the decision that the pilot is solely responsible is that proof to the contrary has been shown, and it clears the master and other servants of the shipowners. Because the wording of the subsection is: "The collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to be caused by his wrongful act or default." The master and other servants of the shipowner are not responsible, and the collision cannot be deemed to have been caused by their wrongful act or default. Now that, I think, both counsel have agreed, in this case leaves the question to be determined, which governs both points, Was the pilot in this case compulsory or not? The pilot was, in fact, navigating, and the question is reduced to this: Was he compulsorily in charge? Or, perhaps, having regard to the defendants' argument, I might say, Was he in charge in such circumstances that the owners are not liable for his acts? That covers the various points taken by Mr. Aspinall in connection with the various cases cited. This question turns upon a certain curious state of facts, and also upon the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act of 1858, some of the sections of which were recently considered in this court. Now, that Act makes pilotage compulsory for outward bound ships. I need not go into the question here of inward bound ships. We have had that discussed already. The sections which apply to this subject are sects. 121, 123, 124, in particular sect. 127, and sects. 133 and 139. The general effect of those sections—I am only summarising them—is that, so far as outward bound ships are concerned, the pilotage is compulsory, and a pilot must be employed to pilot the vessel out of the port of Liverpool. The port of Liverpool is defined by the old statute of 8 Anne, c. 8, in these words: [His Lordship then read the section.] The vessel is under pilotage out of that port. Now, the collision in this case, I think there can be no doubt, took place outside the port of Liverpool. The spot which I have already stated as being the place of the collision is to the westward, considerably, of the place called the Redstone. The particular section under which the present difficulty arises is the 127th section, which provides that every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot the said vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, as far as the buoy commonly called or known as the Formby N.W.

THE SUSSEX.

Buoy, and as the buoy commonly called or known by the name of Fairway Buoy in the Queen's Channel, &c., and that every pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel shall forfeit his right to receive the pilotage rates and at the discretion of the board be deprived of his licence. At the time that the Act of 1858 was passed it appears to be the fact that there was a buoy called the Fairway Buoy, and it seems to have been placed on the charts by the name of the Bell Beacon, at the outside end of the Queen's Channel, which appears to be that part of the Crosby Channel to the westward, the Formby Channel going more to the N. or N.W. That Bell Beacon is shown on the oldest chart that has been furnished to me, corrected up to May 1870, and it is shown as a little outside the five fathom line. It is shown well clear of the bar, as it then existed, and it has been agreed in the course of the argument that that is about, or I may take it that is about, the position of the Bell Beacon or Fairway Buoy in 1858. I do not suppose it is precisely the same, because changes of a slight character may have been made from time to time; but at any rate it is sufficiently near for the purposes of the present case. Now, that position has been transferred by the Elder Brethren, for me, on to the latest chart I have been furnished with—namely, one published on the 21st Dec. 1903; and it will be found that that position puts the old site of the Fairway Buoy a little to the eastward of what is marked on the present chart as QB 2 gas light fixed and black buoy on the northern side of the channel, and a little to the S. and W. of Q 3, and almost on top of a very shallow sounding on the banks. The state of things at the present time is that that buoy has been removed and has been removed for some considerable time, as I understand, and in recent years the bar has extended itself further and further out to sea, as far as one can judge from these charts; and in still more recent years the channel has been dredged somewhat to the westward of the old site of the Fairway Buoy, and is now marked on the chart as "dredged cut"; and there are four gas buoys marking that dredged cut, and they are marked as Q 2 and Q 1 on the northern side and B 1 and B 2 on the southern side. Those buoys are all inside the five fathom line. Now, the place of the collision, which has also been marked for me on the chart, is shown on the chart which I am referring to as about half to three-quarters of an inch below the centre of the word Bidstone, just between the two figures 5 and 5½. There is now, and has been for a long time—I think it has been said since 1884—the Bar Lightship, which is shown on the 1903 chart to the westward a little of the five fathom line and the northern exit of the Queen's Channel. So that if you run on past these gas buoys Q 2 and Q 1 and completely cross the bar, and then pass over the five fathom line, in a very short distance you come upon the Bar Lightship. So that the place of the collision is outside the old position of the Fairway Buoy and inside the position of the Bar Lightship. The point is now made that under sect. 127 of the Act the pilot's duties ceased, and compulsory pilotage ceased, as soon as the vessel passed the position in which the old Fairway Buoy was when the Act of 1858 was passed. There is one point, before dealing with that main point in the case, which I will dispose of shortly. Mr. Aspinall contended that sect. 133 gave the Dock Board power to extend the limits to which ships had to be taken. That section states that the board may from time to time vary and fix the rates to be paid for pilotage, and his contention was that as the board had done something—namely, treat the Bar Lightship as the place to which the pilots had to go—they had extended the distance to which ships have to be taken, by virtue of the 133rd section. I do not myself regard that section as having any such effect as contended for by Mr. Aspinall. Pilotage is compulsory on vessels outward bound, as I have already said, except in the case of certain small vessels, and I regard this section as a section which only deals with the rates which, within certain limits, the board may fix. I do not think that section has any application to the present case. Now, so far as the Dock Board is concerned, what has been done with regard to this matter appears to be that they have taken away the old beacon, they have placed the Bar Lightship in the position which I have described, they have placed the gas buoys which I have referred to, they have deepened the channel, and they have fixed pilotage rates. The sheet before me gives the compulsory pilotage rates outward: Liverpool to Bar Lightship, or Horse Channel Fairway Buoy. So far as the present case is concerned the rate is Liverpool to Bar Lightship. The evidence shows that the pilot in this case was taken to pilot the ship to the Bar Lightship. The master said in his evidence that the pilot wanted to be engaged to take the ship to Point Lynas, but that he had replied that he wanted him to take the ship to the Bar Lightship—that he had another man. Some pilotage cards were put in—one dealing with pilotage to the bar and the other with pilotage from the Bar Light-vessel—and it seems clear that the Bar Lightship is at present treated as the place where vessels are to be taken to. The matter, therefore, as far as the facts are concerned, I have dealt with, and the question comes to be, What is to be the law applicable to the case? At present I do not regard this case as on all fours with the two cases which Mr. Aspinall relied upon. The first of those two cases is that of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.). Shortly stated, it is the case of a ship coming up the Channel to London and taking a pilot on board at Dungeness. Before reaching Gravesend, whilst the vessel was still under the control of the pilot, she came into collision with another ship through the pilot's negligence. The defendants' ship belonged to the port of London, and there was a question as to where the port of London extended. But the substance of the case was this, that she was in a district in which she was bound to take a pilot to Gravesend, when she took him on board, and to pay him to Gravesend; that when she got to a certain distance she was within the exemption of vessels navigating within their own port; and that so, as soon as she passed across a certain imaginary line, she was not, in the strict sense, under compulsory pilotage. But it was held that, there having been an obligation to take a pilot on board to begin with, and to pay him up to the end, and he remaining in charge as pilot, the shipowner was not responsible for the collision which took place. It is shortly put by Byles, J., who delivered the judgment of the court, as follows: "If the master of the defendants' ship wanted to go to Gravesend, or beyond, he could not take a pilot for a shorter distance. It was compulsory on him to take a pilot for that distance at least. The pilot could insist on being paid all the way to Gravesend, and could insist on being carried to Gravesend. There had been in effect a contract between the captain and the pilot that the pilot should go to Gravesend, should be paid to Gravesend, and should act as pilot to Gravesend." Then he says: "Suppose a storm, a fog, or other emergency to have arisen, endangering the life not only of the crew, but of the pilot himself, surely the pilot could have insisted not only on being carried to Gravesend, but on piloting the vessel thither according to his contract. It is plain that during the first portion of the transit between the Downs and Gravesend the relation of master and servant did not exist between the owner of the defendants' vessel and the pilot; and we cannot see any indication of a fresh contract as to the latter portion of that transit." The other case is that of The Charlton (ubi sup.). I summarise the facts as they strike me. The defendants' pilot was employed to take the ship out of Bristol, and I think she was going to Cardiff. The pilotage was compulsory in the port of Bristol, which did not extend as far as the place of the collision. But the Bristol Channel District extended to further than the place of collision, and the pilot had a licence which covered the port of Bristol and the Bristol Channel District. So the collision took place in a district in which the man was licensed to act; he had been originally taken on board under compulsion; he was paid, as I understand, a rate fixed for the whole district; and practically that case appears to me to be on all fours with the case of the General Steam Navigation Company. I do not think it is put in quite the same way in the judgment, though there are some passages which would seem to do so. But even if it is not so put, there is a distinction between that case and the point raised in the present case. Because the Master of the Rolls (Lord Esher), in the course of his judgment (73 L. T. Rep., at p. 51; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 30), said: "Then, looking at this statute, and the order of 1891, when the vessel had passed out of the port of Bristol, when she had gone through the port and was outside the port, I have no doubt myself that he was no longer a compulsory pilot. Therefore, when the accident happened, he no longer was a compulsory pilot. But when he was taken on board this ship and put in charge he was a compulsory pilot, and, although he had passed out of the limits where he was a compulsory pilot, he still was in charge as pilot, and in charge without any alteration of the relations between himself and the master of the ship. He was still the pilot. He was in charge of the ship, for they had not gone to such a place that he was no longer a licensed pilot. He was in the district where he was a licensed pilot, and although he had gone beyond the port where he was a compulsory pilot, it is under such circumstances that the master could not properly be called upon to determine whether the compulsion had ceased or not. Then the necessities of the case require that you should not make him a servant of the owners when they had no real opportunity of determining whether he was or was not their servant. They were compelled to take him without his being their servant, and they had no real opportunity of seeing that that relationship which had been put upon them had ceased." Apart from the question of payment, there is this, that the pilot was still a pilot acting within a district for which he was licensed, and the court held in the circumstances that the case came within the section of the Merchant Shipping Act which exonerates the shipowner. There is a considerable distinction, I think, at the outset, between that case and this particular case, because the pilot here was duly licensed to act as a pilot of the first class for the port of Liverpool. Now, if one reads those words in their restrictive meaning, that would be only in the port of Liverpool. But, having regard to the Act of 1858, it does not seem to me possible to read those words in such a restrictive meaning, because the pilot has to take the ship out of the port of Liverpool to a point outside it; and on coming in, for instance, the master of a ship is bound to employ a pilot from the pilot stations fixed by by-laws, and I think, if I remember rightly, one of those is right out at Great Orme's Head, and another is Point Lynas. So, to take a vessel in or out, the pilot must act partly outside the port. Therefore his licence means to do those duties which are necessary for the purpose of navigating a vessel into and out of the port of Liverpool. But that is all. Then, going out, the pilot has to take the ship to a certain distance, and there his duties cease, and he does not become a pilot licensed for a district at that point at all. He is licensed to a point in a certain place, and this Act is not like those Acts which refer to Bristol and London, where I think it will be found that persons navigating the districts must be qualified. So those cases do not seem to me to be precisely in point in the present case. That still leaves a very important question to be determined—namely, whether this pilot was still acting compulsorily in charge of the ship because of the state of things which exist at the present day. I do not think it necessary to decide this case upon the point which the plaintiffs raised. The reason I have come to my conclusion is this: I do not think that the strict construction which the defendants endeavoured to put upon the 127th section of this Act can be maintained. If it is construed strictly, the limit to which a pilot has to go is the Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel—in other words, a spot where the Fairway Buoy rested in the year 1858. To my mind that construction would be unreasonable, and not within the fair contemplation of those who must have framed this section, and not within that which is necessary for the purpose of working out the subject with which we are dealing and the employment of pilots. My reasons are these: Construed strictly—and if you once construe it strictly you must do it entirely strictly—the Fairway Buoy of the Queen's Channel would be that which was then there. Of course that cannot be. The buoy has been removed. But if construed strictly it must mean the identical spot when the Act received the Royal Assent. That cannot be so, because we are dealing with a port which has a well-known estuary where there are banks of sand, which, I suppose, from time immemorial have been existing and shifting in a great variety of ways, and probably, from the nature of the locality, extending and silting up the port and rendering necessary what has been done—namely, the dredging of a deep cut out to the bar. It seems clear to my mind that the bar has gradually extended itself. Take the case that must be presented on a strict construction, and assume that a Fairway Buoy is left to mark the Queen's Channel. That Fairway Buoy means a buoy which shows you are well out of the channel and clear of danger. If the bar extends from time to time, and I am still dealing only with the Fairway Buoy, that must inevitably be moved by those who have charge of the entrance of the port, to suit the state of the channel. What, then, is the legitimate conclusion to draw? I think it is that, although that buoy has been moved, something has taken its place—namely, the Bar Lightship—which, although not a buoy in the strict sense, is the substitute, to my mind, for the buoy. It is remarkable to find, and I hope I have made it clear in stating its position, that it is placed, having regard to the state of the bar, in almost the same position as the Fairway Buoy occupied with regard to the channel which it was intended to guard. That is the explanation, I have not the least doubt, why the lightship is now treated as being the boundary to which the pilots have to go, why the rates are stated in the pilot sheet to be Liverpool to the Bar Lightship, and why the contract is made in such a form as to be a contract to take the ship out to the Bar Lightship. I think, myself, that is the reasonable interpretation to place upon this Act, having regard to the necessary shifting of the place and the nature of the exigencies which have to be dealt with; and it is shown by those conversant with the locality that that is the manner in which the matter is acted upon. To my mind the evidence of the pilot really tends to establish that position. The result therefore, to my mind, is that in this case the pilot was still compulsorily in charge at the time when the collision took place, and that answers the whole of the questions raised in this case. I have given the best consideration I can to the case, and I hope I have made clear the points which I think material and upon which this case is to be decided. The result must be, in my judgment, that the defendants succeed in this case.

THE SUSSEX.

REX v. HUMPHRIS. (a)

Criminal law—Bankruptcy—Fraudulent debtor—Absconding with property—Debtor's property—Deed of assignment—Revocable deed—Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 42), s. 12.

Property of an assignor does not become the property of the trustee under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors until it has come into the possession of the trustee.

(a) Reported by A. A. BATHURST, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. H. executed a deed of assignment whereby he assigned all his property to W. B. as trustee for his creditors. The deed was duly registered as a deed of assignment, but was not disclosed to the creditors. Immediately after the execution of the deed J. H., having, without the knowledge of the trustee, collected certain debts due to him, absconded with part of the proceeds of his collection, and left England. He was thereupon adjudicated a bankrupt, and subsequently indicted, under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869, for having quitted England and taken with him part of his property which should have been divided amongst his creditors.

Held, that the money with which J. H. absconded, having never come into the possession of the trustee, was not the property of the trustee, but remained the property of J. H., and that J. H. was therefore properly convicted under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869.

Reg. v. Cresso (29 L. T. Rep. 897; 12 Cox C. C. 539; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 105) considered and distinguished.

In this case, stated by the Recorder of Banbury, the facts were as follows:—

The prisoner was tried on an indictment charging him with a felony under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869 for having, within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, quitted England and taken with him a part of his property to the amount of 20*l.* and upwards—that is to say, a sum of 120*l.*—which ought to have been divided amongst his creditors.

The prisoner, Joseph Humphris, who carried on business at Banbury, being in a pecuniary difficulty, on the 24th April 1903 executed a deed by which he assigned all his property to William Booth as trustee for the benefit of his creditors.

The deed was executed by the prisoner and by William Booth, the trustee, on the 24th April, but was never executed by any creditor, nor was the name of any creditor or the amount of any debt ever inserted in the schedule thereto.

On the 24th April 1903, before and at the time when prisoner executed the deed, he had in his possession the sum of 161*l.* in cash, being moneys due to him which he had collected from various debtors, the whole of which sum he retained instead of handing the same over to the trustee. William Booth, as trustee, on the 25th April 1903 took possession of the prisoner's business premises, stock, and effects, and continued the business until the appointment of the official receiver under the bankruptcy consequent on the petition which was subsequently presented. The deed was registered under the Deeds of Arrangement Act 1887 on the 27th April 1903.

On the 28th April 1903 the prisoner absconded from and quitted England and went to Canada, taking with him the sum of 120*l.*, part and parcel of the sum of 161*l.* of which he was possessed on the 24th April 1903.

On the 30th April 1903 a bankruptcy petition was presented against the prisoner; a receiving order was thereupon made on the 15th May 1903, and on the 18th May 1903 the prisoner was adjudicated a bankrupt. No evidence was adduced at the trial that any creditor knew of the prisoner's intention to execute the deed, or that any creditor had ever in any way assented thereto, or that any creditor ever knew of its existence, or that the trustee had done anything under the deed beyond taking possession of the prisoner's property and effects and carrying on his business.

REX v. HUMPHRIS.

At the close of the prosecution it was submitted on behalf of the prisoner that there was no case to go to the jury, because on the evidence the sum of 120*l.* so taken away by the prisoner on his quitting England as aforesaid was under and by virtue of the deed the property of the trustee and not the property of the prisoner at all, and therefore, on the authority of Reg. v. Creese (29 L. T. Rep. 897; 12 Cox C. C. 539; L. Rep. 2 C. C. R. 105), the case was not within sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869.

The recorder declined, however, to withdraw the case from the jury, but consented to reserve the point.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the second division and was released on bail pending the decision of the court.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the sum of 120*l.* so taken away by the prisoner when he quitted England was "his" (the prisoner) property within the meaning of sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62).

Vachell for the prisoner.—The case is concluded by Reg. v. Creese. The whole point is whether the property was the property of the prisoner or the property of the trustee, and here the prisoner had parted with all his property to the trustee. He might possibly have been convicted of larceny of the trustee's property, but he cannot be convicted under sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869. This deed was irrevocable. It had not been communicated to the creditors, and might therefore be revocable so far as they were concerned (Siggers v. Evan, 5 E. & B. 367), but the trustee had incurred expense under it, and it was therefore irrevocable in respect of him.

Sutton for the Crown.—The facts in this case are different from the facts in Reg. v. Creese. In that case the fact of the execution of the deed had been communicated to the creditors, and the debtor's money and other property had actually come into the possession of the trustee. Here, however, the trustee never had the money which the prisoner misappropriated; the prisoner was merely liable to account. The deed was revocable. No creditor had expressed his assent to it:

Johns v. James, 39 L. T. Rep. 54; 8 Ch. Div., at p. 748, per James, L.J. discussing Garrett v. Lord Lauderdale, 2 Russ. & My. 451; 3 Sim. 1.

Further, the effect of the prisoner's retaining the 16*l.* was to revoke the deed pro tanto.

Vachell in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgments of Lord Alverstone, C.J., Grantham, Darling, and Channell, JJ. was delivered by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This was a case stated by the Recorder of Banbury on the conviction before him of the prisoner on a charge, under the 12th section of the Debtors Act 1869, of having within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him quitted England and taken with him a part of his property to the amount of 20*l.* and upwards—that is to say, a sum of 120*l.*—which ought by law to be divided amongst his creditors. The prisoner was proved to have so quitted England taking with him 120*l.*, but he had, shortly before going, executed a deed of assignment of all his estate to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and it was contended on his behalf, on the authority of the case of Reg. v. Creese (ubi sup.), that the 120*l.* was not "part of his property" within the meaning of the section. That case is undoubtedly somewhat similar to the present, and we have to consider whether it is distinguishable. There the charge was preferred under sub-sect. 5 of sect. 11 of the Debtors Act 1869 as to fraudulently receiving "any part of his property," and it is impossible, we think, to put a different meaning on the words "any part of his property" in the 12th section to that which they bear in the 11th section, sub-sect. 5. But for the doubts created by the decision in Reg. v. Creese, we should certainly have held that "his property" which ought to be divided amongst his creditors," in the section in question, included property which had been his, which remained in his possession, and the title to which, so far as parted with at all, had only been parted with by him in such a way as to leave it still divisible amongst his creditors in the event of bankruptcy. The concluding words of the section, "unless the jury are satisfied there was no intention to defraud," would be sufficient to protect the accused where he had acted innocently and not in contemplation of bankruptcy. We have, however, to see whether, if we so held, it would be contrary to anything really decided in Reg. v. Creese, and for that purpose we have to consider the facts of that case and this. In Reg. v. Creese the assignment of the 21st Dec. 1872 had been acted upon, and was undoubtedly a genuine transaction; further advances had been made upon it. Creese entered the service of Lakin and White, the trustees under the deed pursuant to the terms of it, and for several months continued to act as the agent and bailiff of the trustees. The bankruptcy of Creese did not take place until the 17th Oct. 1873, nearly a year after the date of the deed, and the removal, which was the alleged offence under sub-sect. 5, of sect. 11, took place on the 14th or 16th Oct. 1873. The only ground on which the title of the trustees of the deed failed was that the deed of Dec. 1872 had not been registered as a bill of sale. It seems to us, therefore, that the court was right in holding that at the date of the alleged fraud the property really belonged to the trustees and not to Creese. We agree, therefore, that Reg. v. Creese was rightly decided, the facts of that case being as stated; but if the reasoning of the court lays down any general rule which would exempt the defendant in this case from responsibility, we do not agree with it. The facts in this case appear to be different. Except by the trustee taking possession of the stock and effects, the deed does not appear to have ever been acted on. The 120*l.* with which the prisoner absconded was no doubt money which the trustee under the deed might have claimed from him by virtue of the assignment, but he never did get it as the trustees of the deed in Creese's case got the stock which Creese misappropriated, and, at most, the trustee here had a mere paper title. Nothing took place which would make this money which the defendant was obviously keeping back from his creditors, and which he had in his actual possession and was not holding for the trustee, in any real sense the property of the trustee under the deed executed three days before the absconding. We do not adopt the view that the deed was revocable so far as regards the property of which the trustee under it got possession, for the trustee had an interest in it. James, L.J. in Johns v. James (8 Ch. Div., at p. 751) says: "You cannot revoke the deed and get the property out of the hands of the trustee until, at all events, you have satisfied all the charges and expenses he has incurred, and any right he has acquired in the property. It is not a revocation of the deed; it is a revocation of the directions given by the deed to the assignee as to what he should do with the property." The deed therefore was not revocable, but as to the money of which the trustee never got possession, no irrevocable trust appears to have been created. We think that the recorder was right in leaving the case to the jury, and that on the facts the 120*l.* was when taken away by the prisoner his property which ought by law to be divided amongst his creditors, and that any claim which the trustee under the deed might have to have the money handed over to him is not sufficient to prevent the operation of sect. 12 of the Debtors Act 1869. The conviction must be affirmed, and the defendant be ordered to serve the remainder of the sentence.

BRUCE, J.—I agree that the conviction must be affirmed. But I wish to add that I think the facts in Reg. v. Creese were very different from the facts in the present case. In this case the deed of assignment was a voluntary deed executed by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors and was not communicated to them, and so was revocable by him except in so far as the trustee had acquired an interest in the property assigned. But, so long as there were proceeds to meet the claim of the trustee for his expenses in acting under the direction of the deed, the debtor was at liberty to revoke the mandate contained in the deed so far as it related to the residue of his property. I think there was no evidence whatever to show that the trustee had acquired any interest in the sum of 120*l.* in question. When on the 28th April the debtor appropriated the sum of 120*l.* which had never been in the possession of the trustee, I think he revoked the mandate to the trustee contained in the deed so far as it related to the 120*l.* In the case of Reg. v. Creese the deed was not a voluntary deed, for part of the consideration of the deed was a sum of 350*l.* paid by one of the trustees to the debtor. The deed, therefore, in that case was not a revocable deed, and the money which the prisoner appropriated he had received as the servant or bailiff of the trustees, and the money was clearly the money of the trustees. Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Jan. 26, 27, 28, 29, and March 15.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, STIRLING, and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Arbitration—Ouster of jurisdiction of the court—Deficiency in pleading—Waiver of right to object—Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. lxxviii.), s. 88, sub-se. 14, 22, s. 202—Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. clxxii.), s. 43, schedule.

Where by private Acts of Parliament and a scheduled agreement regulating the rights and duties of the co-plaintiffs (traders and manufacturers at W. and the corporation of W.) and the defendants, it was in effect provided that any difference arising between the parties as to the statutes and agreement should be determined by arbitration, an action brought by the co-plaintiffs against the defendants in respect of a certain dispute between them arising under the statutes was ordered to be dismissed as between the corporation of W. and the defendants, and stayed until the determination by arbitration of the dispute as between the traders and manufacturers at W. and the defendants, the jurisdiction of the court being ousted, and no deficiency in pleading and no waiver by the parties could give such jurisdiction.

So held by Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L.JJ. (dissentiente Cozens-Hardy, L.J.), reversing the decision of Byrne, J.

APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of Byrne, J. The only point which calls for a report is with reference to a preliminary objection raised on behalf of the defendants that the court had no jurisdiction to decide the questions in dispute, but that they must be referred to arbitration.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the judgments.

The material sections of the private Acts of Parliament read in the course of the judgments were as follows:

Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885:

Sect. 88. For the protection of the corporation of Warrington, and of traders, manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington, the following provisions, unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company, shall have effect—viz. (inter alia), sub-sect. 14: The company shall, before the canal be opened for traffic, at their own cost dredge the bed and banks of the river Mersey and for ever after maintain the same dredged, so that at all times there shall be a depth of 8ft. of water at low-water of spring tides between the western boundary of the works of Monks, Hall, and Co., at or near Bank Quay and the eastern boundary of the borough of Warrington near the commencement of the Latchford Canal. Sub-sect. 22. If any difference shall arise between the company and the corporation as to the true intent and meaning of this section or as to anything to be done thereunder, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed (unless otherwise agreed on) on the application of the company or the corporation by the Board of Trade, whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties, and the costs of the reference shall be borne as he shall direct.

Sect. 202. If any question arise between the company and any person touching anything to be done or not to be done, or any money to be paid under the provisions of this Act, then, unless by this Act otherwise expressly provided, such question shall be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896 :

Sect. 43. The terms of agreement set forth in the schedule to this Act are hereby confirmed and made binding upon the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Warrington and the company as if the same were contained in an agreement duly entered into by those parties and confirmed by Act of Parliament and the agreement dated the ninth day of April one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six and made between the same parties is hereby declared to be null and void so far only as the same differs from the terms of agreement hereby confirmed.

The scheduled agreement referred to in sect. 43 of the Act of 1896 contained (inter alia) the following provisions :

Clause 6. If and whenever the company shall fail to maintain the channel referred to in the first clause of these presents and navigation is thereby obstructed, then and in each such case the traders and manufacturers carrying on business at Warrington shall have the right of navigation in respect of vessels passing through the Walton Lock of the portion of the Manchester Ship Canal extending from Eastham to the Walton Lock, of the Walton Lock and of the portion of the river Mersey within the limits described in clause 1 (a) of this agreement, free of all tolls and dues, until the aforesaid channel shall have been made and completed to the reasonable satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being of the corporation, provided always that no such trader or manufacturer, as aforesaid, shall be entitled to the right of navigation referred to in this clause, if the company immediately on the receipt of a written notice from the surveyor for the time being of the corporation, certifying the fact of such obstruction and its position and extent, commence to dredge, and continue to dredge, the aforesaid channel to the reasonable satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being of the corporation.

Clause 9. Save as hereinbefore expressly mentioned nothing in this agreement contained, shall affect, lessen, or take away any rights, powers, and privileges enjoyed by, or conferred upon, the corporation and the manufacturers and traders of Warrington, under or by virtue of any Acts relating to the company or otherwise, and save as aforesaid such rights, powers, and privileges are hereby reserved accordingly.

Clause 10. If any difference shall arise between the company and the corporation as to the true intent and meaning of this agreement, or as to anything to be done or not to be done thereunder, such difference shall be determined by an engineer to be appointed (unless otherwise agreed on) on the application of the company or the corporation by the president for the time being of the Institution of Civil Engineers, whose decision shall be final and binding on both parties, and the cost of the reference shall be borne as he shall direct.

The action came on for trial before Byrne, J. on the 16th Jan. 1903, when the following preliminary judgment was delivered :—

BYRNE, J.—In this case an important point has been raised by way of preliminary objection. Now, the action is brought by “Messrs. Joseph Crosfield and Sons, James Fairclough and Sons, and Monks, Hall, and Co., on behalf of themselves and all others the traders, manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington, and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Warrington.” To prevent the possibility of ambiguity I have been asked to amend the statement of claim by making the firms sue also in their own respective rights. That seems to me to be a reasonable application, having regard to the nature of the case, and I propose to treat the statement of claim as amended in that respect, and also in respect of the slight amendments introduced to accord with that in the praying part of the statement of claim. Taking the case upon that footing, I now consider what is the nature of the case sought to be made. The co-plaintiffs are the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Warrington. The named plaintiffs are traders and manufacturers carrying on business at or near Warrington. Under the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 there were certain provisions introduced in this way: By sect. 88 it was provided that: [His Lordship read the preamble to that section, and continued:] Then follow a series of provisions for the benefit of the corporation and of the traders in question. Subsequently to the date of this Act an agreement was entered into—it was dated the 9th April 1896—between the corporation and the Manchester Ship Canal Company, and, putting it quite shortly, certain provisions were introduced, and there was an alteration of rights purporting to be made by means of that agreement. Then the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896 was passed, and sect. 43 is as follows: [His Lordship read that section, and continued:] Of course, some difficulty arises upon the form of that section; but the result of it is that the terms of agreement are made binding as if the same were contained in the agreement subsequently confirmed by Act of Parliament. Now, obligations were imposed by the Act of 1885 and by the Act of 1896, and the terms of agreement thereby confirmed, whereby—again putting it quite shortly—the canal company was to keep a certain channel, and certain privileges were conferred upon the class of traders referred to in the event of nonfulfilment of the obligations of the canal company. It is alleged by the plaintiffs that the canal company has not fulfilled its obligations in certain respects, and that a right arose, and still exists, of certain free navigation. In fact, the canal company has insisted upon charging tolls—certain rates—and has declined to allow free navigation; and the moneys have been paid under protest in respect of the demands of the canal company in that respect. Thereupon this action was brought asking, first of all, for a declaration, the general effect of which is to establish a right to a certain depth of water in the channel of a portion of the river Mersey. In terms it follows the exact words of part of a clause of the confirmed agreement. But the substance of the matter is that there is a dispute between the parties as to the true meaning of the obligation, the one party saying that there must always be a depth of 8ft. of water at low water of spring tides in the channel, meaning, in fact, a depth of 8ft. of water. It is contended, on the other hand, that that is not the true meaning; that there need not necessarily be, as I understand it, actually 8ft. of water because the bed of the channel has altered; and that what has to be done is to look at the circumstances as at the time when the obligation was imposed, and to take a certain other datum line from which to calculate the 8ft. I think I have with sufficient fairness stated the nature of the dispute between the parties. I do not need to define what it is—there is a dispute as to what the true meaning is. Secondly, the plaintiffs ask for a declaration that for the period for which the canal company has failed, and so long as it shall continue to fail to fulfil its obligations, the traders of Warrington, on whose behalf the plaintiffs sue, will possess the right of navigation, which they say was conferred upon them in the events which have happened. Shortly, the plaintiff firms in their individual capacities asked for the repayment of dues and tolls paid by them since April 1896, in respect of navigation between certain limits, and, if necessary, for accounts and inquiries to ascertain the amount. Then they also ask in their individual capacity for payment of damages for breach by the canal company of the obligations cast upon it by the agreement, and the statutes. Then there is a claim for an injunction in what is called “general terms.” What the injunction is to be I do not know, and it is not for me, and I am not going to pretend, how to define exactly what relief I think the plaintiffs may or will be entitled to. But what I have to consider is the preliminary objection taken which I think is fairly expressed in this way: First, that having regard to the arbitration provisions contained as well in the original Act of Parliament, as in the terms of the agreement confirmed by the subsequent Act of Parliament, the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the action is ousted in the full sense—that is to say, the court cannot entertain the action, even with the consent of all parties to it. Or, secondly, that even assuming the action is one which the court could deal with if the canal company waived its right to insist on arbitration it has not waived such right, and it is now at the trial entitled to insist upon arbitration to the exclusion of the exercise of jurisdiction by the court. I think that fairly seems to be the way in which the objection is put forward. It will be convenient to consider the objection first as between the corporation of Warrington and the canal company, and to keep that matter entirely distinct from the question as between the other plaintiffs and the canal company. It is common ground, and in fact could not be disputed, that an Act of Parliament may be so framed as to entirely oust the jurisdiction and to compel the court to refuse to hear the action, even although all parties asked to have it heard. I regard the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (L. Rep. 2 Sco. App. 347) as a case of that nature, and I cannot do better than read what Farwell, J. says about it in the recent case of Manchester Ship Canal Company v. Manchester Racecourse Company (83 L. T. Rep. 274; (1900) 2 Ch. 352). The case which I have mentioned of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.) had been cited, and the learned judge says (at p. 361 of (1900) 2 Ch.): “A great deal of argument was founded upon Caledonian Railway Company

v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). But the problem before the court in that case and subsequent cases of the same nature was absolutely different to anything I have to solve. The question was not whether the parties were or were not bound by the contract into which they had entered. No such question arose. The question was whether the courts were bound or not by a substantive statutory enactment, presumably in the interests of the public, that the agreement which was confirmed between the parties should be implemented and made effective by the parties. Of course, if the Legislature says to the parties, ‘Not only do we declare the agreement valid between you, but you shall perform it,’ then there is a statutory enactment over and above the agreement validated between the parties, which enactment the Attorney-General could probably enforce, or to which, at any rate, the remedy by mandamus would apply. The parties might waive the agreement between themselves for their own benefit. They could not waive the statutory duty imposed upon them, if it were a duty imposed for the benefit of the public at large.” Now, referring to the case itself of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.), I find first that there a certain agreement had been entered into between the provisional directors of the railway companies as to the construction and maintenance of certain railways and works. And the Act of Parliament, after reciting that fact, goes on (at p. 349 of L. Rep. 2 Sco. App.) thus: “And it is expedient that the said agreement should be sanctioned. The said agreement shall be and the same is hereby sanctioned and confirmed, and shall be as valid and obligatory upon the company and the Caledonian Railway Company respectively as if those companies had been authorised by this Act to enter into the said agreement, and as if the same had been duly executed by them after the passing of this Act.” That phraseology to a great extent resembles the phraseology in sect. 43 of the second Act in the present case; it is not exactly the same, but similar to it. Lord Cairns pauses there and then says: “Up to this point, the enactment does no more than give statutory validity to the agreement; but the clause proceeds in these words, ‘And it shall be lawful for the company (that is, the Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company) and the Caledonian Railway Company respectively, and they are hereby required, to implement and fulfil all the provisions and stipulations in the said agreement contained.’” And upon that portion of the clause the Lord Chancellor expresses his view that there is more than a statutory validity given to the agreement. There is a substantial statutory enactment to the effect that the obligations imposed shall be fulfilled having this result, inasmuch as there was in the agreement a clause to the effect that “All differences which may arise between the parties hereto respecting the true meaning or effect of this agreement, or the mode of carrying the same into operation, shall, from time to time, so often as any such questions or differences shall arise, be referred to arbitration in terms of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 33, s. 119).” I have read the view which Farwell, J. has expressed with reference to the true meaning of that case, and I may say that I absolutely and entirely agree with what that learned judge said in respect to it. On the other hand, in the case which has been cited to me of London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (60 L. T. Rep. 370; 40 Ch. Div. 100) the question was as to the effect of an agreement having legislative confirmation without any express statutory enactment in an Act of Parliament, but having certain clauses in the Act of Parliament which were referred to in the agreement. In that case there had been an agreement to submit matters in dispute to arbitration. "The court," it was held, "is not deprived of its jurisdiction to determine the matters in dispute if neither party insists on an arbitration. And in a case where the defendant had in his pleadings insisted on his right to arbitration, but had failed to raise the point at the hearing, and had gone into evidence on the merits, the Court of Appeal refused to allow the point to be raised on the appeal." Now, that agreement was an agreement to refer to arbitration under an Act of Parliament. The Act of Parliament which was referred to in the agreement contained certain provisions, and amongst others sect. 26: "Full effect shall be given by all the superior courts of law and equity in the United Kingdom, according to their respective jurisdiction, and by the companies respectively . . . to all agreements, references, arbitrations, and awards in accordance with this Act." The learned judges there pointed out that the legislation which was, so to speak, incorporated in the agreement, was legislation which places it in the power of railway companies to insist upon that contractual right as against each other, if they choose to make a bargain to that effect, and to fall far short of legislation which debars the courts of this country from deciding disputes between railway companies if the railway companies themselves do not choose to insist upon the arbitration clause in their agreement." I have read that passage from the judgment of Bowen, L.J. in that case (at p. 108 of 40 Ch. Div.). So that that case really stands upon a different footing from the class of cases represented by Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). In the case of London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (78 L. T. Rep. 575; (1898) 2 Q. B. 7) there are observations—though I cannot say that the point was decided—tending directly in the same direction as the decision in Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). That was not a case of an agreement confirmed by an Act of Parliament; it was a case of legislative enactment by means of a provisional order and subsequent statute, and Chitty, L.J. at the commencement of his judgment (at p. 17 of (1898) 2 Q.B.) says: "The question really is one of construction of that which has the force of an Act of Parliament." It is exactly the same case. There had been no provisional order, but there had been an Act of Parliament in so many words enacting the provision in question. I need not dwell upon other points of distinction between London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (ubi sup.) and the present case that have been referred to, but it appears to me that there are two distinct classes of cases. There is, first of all, the class of case where there is a direct statutory enactment which says that matters shall be referred to arbitration, which has the effect of preventing the courts from entertaining jurisdiction. There is the second class of case, where there is an agreement with statutory confirmation, in which case the parties may waive their right to insist upon having an arbitration. Now, the present case does not stand on precisely the same footing as any of those cited, and again it is convenient to consider the effect of the Act first, and still as alone between the corporation and the canal company. I go back now to the statute. I have read the introductory words showing for whose protection sect. 88 was passed: "The following provisions unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company shall have effect." Then there is sub-sect. 22, which is important. [His Lordship read that section and continued:] Now, that provision is entirely governed by the introductory words which I have read: "Unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company." Therefore although there is, but for the words that I have last read, what would be a direct statutory enactment probably ousting the jurisdiction of the court altogether, as between the corporation and the canal company in respect of these matters, it appears to me that the words "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company" show that it was within the competence of the parties, notwithstanding the statutory enactment, to alter by agreement, or to waive the right to insist upon that, and to appeal to the ordinary tribunals of law. So that there is that clear distinction at the outset. Now, striking out those words "unless otherwise agreed on," &c., the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.), and the opinion in London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (ubi sup.) would seem to apply. It is true that the express enactment would not appear to be an enactment introduced for the benefit of the whole of the public, but an express enactment introduced for a class or section of the public. With reference to the variation by agreement, it is to be observed that it does not say "unless otherwise agreed on" in writing, or in any specific way. I mention that because I find that there are other sections in this Act of Parliament where it is specifically enacted that the agreement must be in writing, or says in what form or manner the alteration is to take place. Now, it appears to me that if the matter stood on the original Act alone, it would be competent for the agreement to be effected between the parties in reference to going to a court of law by the one party bringing the action and the other party waiving the right to insist upon arbitration. Then the next question is, has there been a waiver? I think the true answer is "yes," unless the objection to the action has been taken, as Bowen, L.J. expresses it in the case to which I have referred, from the first. I am clear that this objection was not taken by the defence. It has been pointed out that under the rules of practice it is not necessary to raise points of law, and it has also been pointed out that in this defence there are some general words referring to all rights and remedies arising under the Act which might possibly be held to cover what is meant. With reference to the express words in the defence, I said that it was clear that the point was not raised in any true sense, and I have not heard it suggested that it was, in fact, intended to be raised by those words. It is true you need not plead points of law, or plead the evidence on which they are founded. But you may give notice of points of law; and it appears to me that it is of the greatest importance in considering whether the objection has been taken from the first to see whether the first reasonable opportunity has been taken of raising the objection, being an objection to jurisdiction, if it is intended to insist upon it. Having come to that conclusion that the objection was not taken by the defence, and it not having been taken at the earliest possible stage, it is perhaps unnecessary to express an opinion with reference to the provisions of sect. 4 of the Arbitration Act 1889 as to raising these points and as to moving for a stay of proceedings when there is an arbitration clause, and for a reference to arbitration. But, as at present advised, it strikes me that that section precisely points out the method in which an objection to jurisdiction may be taken from the first. And I am by no means prepared to say that if a party having the right so to apply elects not to do it, but put in his defence—even if on his defence he gave notice that he meant to raise the objection—it might not be held to be too late when he came to the trial, he not having taken that proceeding which appears to me to have been expressly designed, amongst other things, to enable the parties to take the objection at the very earliest opportunity. I do not think, there being opposition, that I ought to permit an amendment by allowing the introduction of this objection into the defence, for the reason that it is an objection going to jurisdiction, and one which ought to have been taken at the earliest available opportunity. Then, still as between the corporation and the canal company, I come to the second Act and the agreement, and reading sect. 43, I find that the terms of the agreement—not the agreement, but the terms of the agreement—set forth in the schedule to this Act are hereby confirmed and made binding on the corporation and the company as if the same were contained in the agreement duly entered into by these parties and confirmed by Act of Parliament, and the agreement of the 9th April is hereby declared to be null and void so far only as the same differs from the terms of the agreement hereby confirmed. Now, suppose the agreement had been first made, and had then been simply confirmed by Act of Parliament, the case would appear to have fallen within the class of cases like London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.), and what was said by the Lord Chancellor in Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.) as to the true effect and meaning of a confirmation of an agreement, apart from the express statutory enactment that the parties were to implement and carry out the agreement. It is really an a fortiori case so far as waiver is concerned, to the case depending—if it depended alone—on the provisions of the earlier Act. Therefore, I come to the conclusion that there was power in the parties to waive, and that there has been a waiver of the right to insist upon the matter being referred to arbitration. Taking the view which I have expressed as to this preliminary point as between the corporation and the canal company the case would have to proceed, and I might say I should simply take the evidence and give relief to one or both of the plaintiffs. It would only be a case of misjoinder and perhaps some additional evidence. But, I think, in view of the arguments that have been addressed to me, and also because it might save taking some portion of the evidence should I entertain a particular view, I ought to deal shortly with this question also. The first Act in question enables the corporation to vary or alter the rights of traders. But, nevertheless, and subject to alteration, I think that they have—that this class of traders have—direct rights conferred, in respect of which the class may be representative—again in respect of class rights—and individuals may have, in respect of individual rights, direct relief in some respects. There is this: that in fact these traders have paid moneys which they say the canal company was not entitled to levy, and they ask to have the money back again. Now it appears to me that if they have rights conferred upon them in the way that the rights have been conferred by the original and by the subsequent statute, and the statutory confirmation of the second agreement varying the terms of the first, they have a right to come and ask to have that money returned to them individually, which they have wrongfully paid, and that they are not, in any way, bound to wait until the corporation shall have had an arbitration with the canal company before taking such proceedings. I think that they could have sued under the first Act, and so far as they are concerned their rights are not lost, but varied by means of the second Act and agreement. With reference to their right to sue as a class I am not prepared to say that they cannot establish a right to a declaration which would be common to all of them, assuming that they proved right upon the facts that they have a free right of navigation in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament. I have expressed my opinion on what I recognise as a difficult and important point—and both parties have represented it to me as an extremely important point—and I understand that the probability is that the objection will be insisted upon elsewhere. Should the canal company be successful on an appeal, and particularly in reference to the first form of the objection which has been taken that the jurisdiction of the court is entirely ousted, I can only point out that the expenditure which will be occasioned by what I understand must, necessarily, in its nature, be a long case, and the taking of evidence, will be thrown away, and if the plaintiffs prove wrong the burden of that expense will entirely fall upon them. At the same time, having decided as I have, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to ask that the case may now proceed. I should have thought myself, assuming that it is intended—I understand it is—to seek for an opinion on this point elsewhere, that by far the more convenient course to follow, would be to take the opinion of the Court of Appeal first upon this preliminary point; and I should think, having regard to the nature of the case, it is extremely likely that the Court of Appeal would see its way to advance such an appeal as that, and that the rest of the case should be allowed to stand over in order to see whether the evidence should be taken at all.

Moulton, K.C.—I was about to apply to your Lordship for that purpose. The defendants do wish to take the opinion of the Court of Appeal on that subject of waiver.

BYRNE, J.—I think I have expressed an opinion about this that I think it rests with the plaintiffs. I think that they are entitled to go on now. They have got my judgment, and by what I have said about its being an important and difficult point it must not be understood that I have any doubt myself as to the view I have expressed. I think that the plaintiffs have a right to say: "Let the case proceed. The court has jurisdiction, and we have come here properly and will proceed."

Hughes, K.C.—We have considered the matter very carefully with our clients, and it is so important to us that the matter should be promptly disposed of that we would necessarily press your Lordship to go on. If there is to be an appeal to the Court of Appeal and, possibly, to the House of Lords on this preliminary point, it would take a very long time, and then would have to come back and start afresh. We will take all risks. We quite appreciate all the risks we take.

The trial of the action proceeded accordingly, and the hearing of the evidence occupied several days. At the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment.

On the 7th April 1903 the following written judgment was delivered by BYRNE, J.—The constitution of the action is as follows: Three limited companies sue in a representative capacity on behalf of themselves and all others—the traders, manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington. Each company also sues in its individual capacity, and the corporation of Warrington is the remaining plaintiff. The defendants are the Manchester Ship Canal Company. The relief claimed by the corporation and by their co-plaintiffs in their representative capacity is for declarations to establish alleged rights, and that claimed by the plaintiff traders individually is for repayment of tolls paid by them under protest which they alleged to have been wrongfully enacted from them, and, as a separate matter, damages for delay occasioned by neglect to preserve a channel in a certain portion of the river Mersey in accordance with statutory obligations imposed on the defendants. The case raises important questions of construction arising out of two Acts of Parliament and the terms of an agreement scheduled to the later of such Acts. The defendants, the Manchester Ship Canal Company, are under certain obligations in respect of a portion of the river Mersey, situate between the western boundary of Monks, Hall, and Co. Limited at or near Bank Quay and Howley Lock, including the portion of the old bed of the Mersey between the westerly end of the river diversion and Walton Lock. The nature and extent of their obligations so far as necessary to be considered in the present case are defined by the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885, s. 88, and by the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896, s. 43, and the terms of agreement by the last-mentioned section confirmed. The Acts of 1885 and 1896 are local and personal Acts as distinguished from general Acts and private Acts. Undoubtedly such an Act may be so framed as to amount to more than a statutory confirmation of an agreement inter partes, but unless the Act be so framed I think that the principles of construction to be applied are to be found clearly laid down in D. Davis and Sons Limited v. Taff Vale Railway Company (72 L. T. Rep. 632; (1895) A. C. 542). I will refer to the remarks of the Lord Chancellor, which are to be found at p. 549 of (1895) A.C., where he says: "That brings me to the question whether the Act does in truth constitute a contract between the two companies giving no right except to each other, and therefore not justifying the trader in refusing to pay the amount demanded. Now, it seems to me that there is a very obvious answer to the argument that the 23rd section of the Act constitutes merely a contract between the companies. It is not a contract; it is not, to my mind, even like a contract; it bears no analogy to a contract. It is an express enactment which imposes an obligation on the Taff Vale Railway Company to charge certain rates; it is immaterial what the terms are upon which these rates are to be charged; we are now construing the statutory obligation; and if the Taff Vale Railway Company has done the thing which the Legislature has contemplated they might do, and which, if I am right in what I have said before, they have done, then their right to charge more than the lowest rate, which for the time being they have charge for like traffic to or from the docks at Cardiff, Penarth, or Barry has ceased, and the Legislature has prohibited them from doing it. It would be strange indeed if this be true, that a trader sued for the higher charge should not be able to set up the unlawful character of the excess." And Lord Watson (at p. 552 of the same report) says: "In cases where the provisions of a local and personal Act directly impose mutual obligations upon two persons or companies, such provisions may, in my opinion, be fairly considered as having this analogy to contract, that they must, as between those parties, be construed in precisely the same way as if they had been matter, not of enactment, but of private agreement. It was in that sense that in Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners (7 App. Cas. 694, at p. 707) I ventured to observe that 'such statutory provisions as those of sect. 43 occurring in a local and personal Act must be regarded as a contract between the parties, whether made by their mutual agreement, or forced upon them by the Legislature.' For all purposes of construction, I thought that the provisions which the House had to interpret might be legitimately viewed in that light. But it did not occur to me then, nor am I now of opinion, that the analogy of contract, for it is nothing more, could, in an English case especially, be carried further. The provisions of a railway Act, even when they impose mutual obligations, differ from private stipulations in this essential respect, that they derive their existence and their force, not from the agreement of parties, but from the will of the Legislature. And when provisions of that kind are not limited to the interests of the of the parties mutually obliged, but impose upon one or other or both of them an obligation in favour of third parties, who are sufficiently designated, I am of opinion that the obligation so imposed must operate as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of these parties, and cannot be regarded as a mere stipulation inter alios, which they may have an interest but have no title to enforce." [His Lordship read and commented upon sect. 88 of the Act of 1885, and continued:] I will only say that if rights directly enforceable by traders and manufacturers are given by the section, it does not appear to me that the clause is applicable to such rights as for the time being existing under the original Act or as altered by agreement at all. I have shortly analysed the whole section of the Act, with the result that I am quite clear that some of the sub-sections—as, for instance, 8 to 11—confer rights upon the corporation only, and others—such as 2 and 5—upon traders and manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington directly. Omitting the words at the beginning of the section, "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company," it appears to me from the whole scope of the section that certain of the sub-sections, not in terms confined to the corporation, or to traders, imposed obligations on the company towards all those for whose protection the section is expressed to be enacted, and to confer direct rights upon all or any of those in whose favour it is so enacted, and notably I consider that sub-sect. 14, which is the most important one for the purpose of the present case, confers a direct right upon, and gives a right of action to, all or any of the persons mentioned as those for whose protection the section was introduced. To what extent the words in the introductory part of the section, "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company," confer a right upon the corporation—acting, of course, in good faith—to vary the rights of all or any of the classes of persons interested under the sub-sections, or of members of those classes, is not, in the view I take of the effect of the Act of 1896, material to consider. And it is sufficient to say that I can see ground for fair argument that the agreement subsequently entered into between the corporation and the company exceeded the powers of the corporation to apply the legislative sanction which it received by the Act of 1896. I am guarding myself; I am not in the least saying that it was in excess, but I can see fair ground for arguing that it was so. [His Lordship then dealt with the merits of the case, and came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed in their action.]

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Upon the opening of the appeal the defendants took the preliminary objection which had been raised by them in the court below.

Cripps, K.C. (Moulton, K.C., Pickford, K.C., O. Leigh Clare, and Aubrey T. Lawrence with him) for the appellants.—The preliminary question raised by this appeal is whether the matter in dispute between the parties should be determined by arbitration instead of by the court. Sect. 88, sub-sect. 22, of the Act of 1885 raises in one form, although not in a complete form, the question of jurisdiction. I say that thereby there is a statutory substitution of an engineer for the court. Byrne, J. was entirely in favour of the defendants upon this point, except on the question of waiver. His Lordship decided that the defendants had waived their right to object to the jurisdiction of the court, and that such jurisdiction arose. Upon this point I would also refer to sect. 202 of the same Act, which is likewise an arbitration clause, and is a very wide arbitration clause, and one that covers the substance of the present dispute. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The agreement being embodied in the statute, it is a statutory condition precedent and goes to jurisdiction.] Suppose that it is not a question of jurisdiction, but only a matter inter partes, the court would interfere by way of a stay of proceedings. I submit that the learned judge in the court below has made a mistake on the point whether it is necessary to plead to the jurisdiction. He thought that because the defendants had not specifically pleaded to the jurisdiction they had waived their right to do so. But parties cannot waive the jurisdiction. If it is ousted by legislative enactment, the parties cannot waive it. As between the parties they can waive; but if it is a statutory provision they cannot. The provisions of the Act of 1885 are to apply unless the parties otherwise agree. Byrne, J. thought that as the defendants had not pleaded the want of jurisdiction they had otherwise agreed. But it cannot be "otherwise agreed" simply because the pleader has adopted a particular form of pleading. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—If the jurisdiction of the court is ousted, it is not in accordance with the practice to go to the court to ask for a stay of proceedings, because in such a case the jurisdiction of the court does not exist.] You go to the court to ask for an exercise of its discretion. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Can the manufacturers and traders sue here? They are not parties to the agreement. That was made between the canal company and the corporation: (see Ellis v. Duke of Bedford, 70 L. T. Rep. 332; (1899) 1 Ch. 494.) Persons having joint interests can sue. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Is there any statutory provision as to a stay in the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 or the Arbitration Act 1889? I am aware that there is a practice as to that, but is there any statutory provision?] Sect. 4 of the Arbitration Act 1889 provides that: "If any party to a submission . . . commences any legal proceedings in any court against any other party to the submission . . . in respect of any matter agreed to be referred, any party to such legal proceedings may at any time after appearance, and before delivering any pleadings or taking any other steps in the proceedings, apply to that court to stay the proceedings, and that court . . . if satisfied that there is no sufficient reason why the matter should not be referred in accordance with the submission, and that the applicant was, at the time when the proceedings were commenced, and still remains, ready and willing to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration, may make an order staying the proceedings." He referred also to

Bousfield, K.C. and Hughes, K.C. (with them Frederic Thompson) for the respondents.—It was not urged before that no jurisdiction existed, and that the matter ought to go to arbitration. No suggestion was made that arbitration was the proper tribunal. We agree that if the court has no jurisdiction it is not necessary to refer to that fact in the pleadings. All that has to be shown to the court is that it has no jurisdiction. There are four classes of cases which may arise relating to the present question: First, where the court only has jurisdiction; secondly, where the court has no jurisdiction, and some other tribunal possesses it. Between those two classes of cases there are two other instances: (a) Where a party to proceedings comes sub modo and says that he is entitled to have arbitration. The court is bound to give effect to that application and to stay the proceedings. (b) The court has power to stay where it has a discretion to exercise, originally under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 and now under the Arbitration Act 1889. The following cases were relied upon by the defendants in the court below:

Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Sco. App. 347;

London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 60 L. T. Rep. 370; 40 Ch. Div. 100;

London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington, 78 L. T. Rep. 575; (1898) 2 Q. B. 7; on appeal 79 L. T. Rep. 503; (1899) A. C. 79;

Manchester Ship Canal Company v. Manchester Racecourse Company, 83 L. T. Rep. 274; (1900) 2 Ch. 352, at p. 361.

But neither London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan (ubi sup.) nor London and North-Western Railway Company v. Billington (ubi sup.) supports the appellants' contention, while the latter case supports ours. In Midland Railway Company v. Loseby and Carnley (80 L. T. Rep. 93; (1899) A. C. 133) the decision of the Court of Appeal in London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan (ubi sup.) was approved by the House of Lords. There must be something more than a simple common form arbitration clause in an Act of Parliament to deprive the court of its jurisdiction. It may give the parties the right to go to arbitration, but it does not oust the jurisdiction of the court if they prefer to go to the court. The effect of such a section is not to exclude the jurisdiction of the court so that the parties cannot waive, but must go to arbitration. The Arbitration Act 1889 contemplates references under statutory powers, for by the 24th section it is provided that: "This Act shall apply to every arbitration under any Act passed before or after the commencement of this Act as if the arbitration were pursuant to a submission, except in so far as this Act is inconsistent with the Act regulating the arbitration, or with any rules or procedure authorised or recognised by that Act." In the Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners (7 App. Cas. 694) there was a clause precisely similar to that in the present case. As to the question of waiver of the right to object to the jurisdiction of the court, Byrne, J. went fully into that question. So far we have dealt with the matter as if the arbitration clause were in common form. But it is not in common form. The clause is not directed to excluding the jurisdiction of the court, but to providing a special tribunal if the parties wish to resort to it. It is the provision of a tribunal, not the exclusion of the jurisdiction, that is aimed at. It was for the benefit of the parties that such a tribunal should be set up, but not to their benefit that the jurisdiction should be excluded. And, unless there are some express words to exclude it, it cannot be treated as excluded. The appellants must show that the purpose of this clause is exclusion to enable them to succeed. It is not enacted that all differences shall go to arbitration, but three specified things. The jurisdiction of the court is not ousted unless one of the parties insists that arbitration shall be the tribunal. We have so far argued as if there were not the words at the beginning of sect. 88. That section is prefaced by the words "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company." Those are an integral part of the enactment, and dominate the whole matter. You cannot have the jurisdiction of the court determined by the will of the parties unless in the case already mentioned. If the sections only give the parties the right to arbitration that is enough for the plaintiffs. Then arises the question of waiver, and sect. 4 of the Arbitration Act 1889 becomes very material. As to what is a "step in the proceedings," within the meaning of that section, see Ford's Hotel Company Limited v. Bartlett, 73 L. T. Rep. 665; (1896) A. C. 1, at p. 4.

The authorities show that if it is intended to go to arbitration, the party desirous of doing so must decide to do so earlier than at the stage at which the appellants did in the present case. Dealing with the matter as between the company and the corporation, the question is whether the provisions of the Acts are sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the court. The appellants contend that no amount of waiver will do, and that the court has no jurisdiction. But in a private Act it is not intended to oust the jurisdiction of the court. Although in a public Act it might be provided that persons should go to arbitration. That, however, does not apply to the present case, and the intention ought not to be imputed to the Legislature that the parties should never resort to the court, but should go to arbitration. In a public Act for the protection of the public, it might be a matter of policy that arbitration should be the tribunal—e.g., for the purpose of saving expense. But that is not so when it is a matter of agreement. There is no case which shows that the jurisdiction of the court is ousted in such circumstances as these. The case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.) is an authority for exactly the opposite proposition for which the appellants cited it in the court below. Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy (ubi sup.) was certainly not a case of the jurisdiction of the court being ousted. In London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (ubi sup.) the whole discussion was not upon the question whether the court had jurisdiction, but whether the arbitrator had jurisdiction to deal with a certain part of the case. And when the court came to consider that case in Midland Railway Company v. Loseby and Carnley (ubi sup.) that point was made clear. The case of London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) shows that where two companies have agreed that all differences between them shall be submitted to arbitration, the parties may waive the arbitration and go to the court. Why should it be supposed that the Legislature intended the plaintiffs here to go to arbitration if they preferred to go to the court. And when some nice questions of law are involved, it is most desirable that they should have the right to go to the court, for where questions of law are raised arbitration is the most unsatisfactory tribunal, and public policy cannot require that they should go to arbitration whatever it may in the case of a public Act. With regard to the question of the right of the traders and manufacturers to sue, sub-sect. 22 of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 as to arbitration has nothing to do with any dispute between them and the company. Supposing that they have no right to bring this action, the municipal corporation has the power. But the traders and manufacturers are greatly affected, and if the provisions of the Act of 1885 are carried out the canal is much to their advantage. It was for that reason that various provisions were inserted in that Act to preserve the river and to protect the traders and manufacturers. That gives them a direct right to enforce the provisions of sect. 88:

Herron and others v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commissioners, 67 L. T. Rep. 658; (1892) A. C. 498, at p. 553.

That was a very similar case to the present, and there the action was brought by three persons as representing a class. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The question is whether the traders and manufacturers were intended by the Legislature to have any voice in the matter. The words at the beginning of sect. 88, "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company," seem to make the corporation and the company the masters of the situation.] They are masters of the situation to this extent and no more, that they can agree to a modification of the provisions of the statute. [STIRLING, L.J.—Why is this point not governed by Ellis v. Duke of Bedford (ubi sup.) as to whether a representative action may be brought?] It is rather more than that—namely, whether persons who are represented have a right of action. We say that the traders and manufacturers themselves have the right to enforce this agreement which was for their protection, and that without the aid of the corporation. This is in the nature of a contract between the company and the traders and manufacturers, as Lord Halsbury said in Herron v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commissioners (ubi sup.). If that is so, they have by virtue of contract the rights of the corporation. There is an alternative proposition: Suppose it is an agreement between the corporation and the company and incorporated in an Act, even a member of the public who can show damage—and à fortiori a trader—is entitled to sue to enforce the obligation. The clearest authority on that proposition is

D. Davis and Sons Limited v. Taff Vale Railway Company, 72 L. T. Rep. 632; (1895) A. C. 542.

Cripps, K.C. in reply.—Two other cases which show that the rights of the traders and manufacturers are put much too high are [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The proposition which you are dealing with was discussed very fully in this court subsequently to the year 1897 in Groves v. Lord Wimborne (79 L. T. Rep. 284; (1898) 2 Q. B. 402, at p. 416). His Lordship referred also to the decisions as to arbitration under the Building Societies Acts; and, in particular, cited Crisp v. Bunbury (8 Bing. 394). Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants, the Manchester Ship Canal Company, in an action brought against them in which the plaintiffs are the corporation of Warrington and certain traders of Warrington as representing the traders of Warrington generally, and also in their individual capacities. The object of the action is to enforce rights which they claim respectively to have against the Ship Canal Company under a clause of an Act of Parliament, or under that clause as modified by an agreement affirmed by a subsequent Act of Parliament or under that agreement. The trader plaintiffs, in their individual capacities, although they include a claim for damages for the breach by the Ship Canal Company of dredging obligations cast on them by the statute or by the agreement, in substance, claim the return of tolls, which were paid by the traders on the demand of the Ship Canal Company for the user of the canal, which user was necessitated by failure of the canal company to perform duties alleged by the plaintiffs to have been cast on the canal company, in respect of maintaining the channel of the river Mersey at a certain depth. The failure by the canal company to perform these duties would entitle the traders under the 6th section of the agreement scheduled to the Act of 1896, to navigate a portion of the canal, free of all tolls and dues, during such time as the said channel should be obstructed. The plaintiffs generally ask for declarations of rights. When the case came on for hearing the defendant company took a preliminary objection, which was this: that having regard to the arbitration provisions contained as well in the original Act of Parliament as in the agreement affirmed by the subsequent Act, the jurisdiction of the court is absolutely ousted in the sense that the court could not, even with the assent of all parties, entertain the action or dispose of a particular matter in difference essential to the maintenance of the action. I will observe here that the action really embodies three actions, and that it may be that the ousting of the jurisdiction may be effective as to one or more of the claims although not effective as to all three actions or all the claims. This, however, would seem an unfortunate result, for it is obvious that it is desirable that all these cases relating to the same obligations of the canal company should be disposed of by the same tribunal. The preliminary objection so far as it is based on the original Act of the Manchester Ship Canal—1885—depends primarily on sect. 88 of that Act. The section begins with these words: [His Lordship read them and continued:] Then follow numerous provisions, the 14th of which deals with the obligation of the canal company in respect of the dredging of the channel of the river Mersey, and the maintenance of the dredging, so that at all times there should be a depth of 8ft. of water at low water of spring tides between a certain point, and the eastern boundary of the borough of Warrington, the object of this provision being, of course, the maintenance of the channel of the Mersey, which might be affected by the construction of the canal, and its maintenance in such a condition that the channel of the Mersey might continue a navigable way convenient to the borough of Warrington and its traders. Then provision 22 says this: [His Lordship read that provision, and continued:] The words "unless otherwise agreed on" refer, I assume, simply to the appointment of the arbitrator, who may be an agreed arbitrator or one appointed by the Board of Trade. Thus far I have only dealt with the statute of 1885, but subsequently, in 1896, the company and the corporation in the exercise of the power conferred by the words in the preface of sect. 88, "Unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company," agreed to modify the provisions of sect. 88. I should here observe that in my opinion, the power of agreement thus given in the prefatory clause of sect. 88 is only a power to alter the provisions in that section, and has no bearing whatever on the power of the corporation or the company to waive the provision contained in sub-sect. 22. Now, the agreement thus made in 1896 between the corporation and the company, slightly modified, was confirmed by sect. 43 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896, which runs thus: [His Lordship read that section and continued:] The agreement in the schedule recites the prefatory words in sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 and sub-sect. 14 of that section and then recites an agreement of 1893 between the corporation and the company whereby, in consideration of the corporation not opposing the opening of the canal, although incomplete, the company agree, subject to penalties, to complete at their own cost on or before the 1st July 1894 the dredging authorised by sect. 88, sub-sect. 14, of the Act of 1885, reserving all powers, rights, and privileges of the corporation and the manufacturers and traders of Warrington, under the Acts relating to the company or otherwise. The recital of this agreement of 1893 is followed by a recital that, by the same agreement the company agreed that during the time fixed for completion by that agreement, the corporation, traders and manufacturers at Warrington should have the right to carry, by means of their barges, goods from the Mersey to the Mersey along the Manchester Ship Canal free of rates or tolls. Then follows a recital of disputes and differences having arisen between the company and the corporation, and that the company and the corporation have agreed to settle those disputes by that agreement, the corporation, traders and manufacturers at Warrington should have the right to carry, by means of their barges, goods from the Mersey to the Mersey along the Manchester Ship Canal free of rates or tolls. Then follows a recital of disputes and differences having arisen between the company and the corporation, and that the company and the corporation have agreed to settle those disputes by that agreement, the corporation, traders and manufacturers at Warrington should have the right to carry, by means of their barges, goods from the Mersey to the Mersey along the Manchester Ship Canal free of rates or tolls. This recital of the agreement between the corporation and the company is followed by a rather remarkable recital relating to the traders. It runs thus: "And whereas the traders, manufacturers, and all other persons now or hereafter carrying on business at or near Warrington are entitled to use portions of the canal and river Mersey and the lock and works at Walton, on the terms and conditions defined in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 88, and the corporation and the company have agreed to alter those terms and conditions as hereinafter mentioned." It will be observed that although it is rights of the traders and others carrying on business which are affected, it is the corporation and company who make the agreement, and this may be very important when one comes to consider whether, upon a breach of this agreement confirmed by statute affecting the rights of traders and others, an action based on the breach may be brought by the injured person, as is the case when an individual is injured by the breach of a statute passed for his benefit, provided such a remedy comes within the purview of the Legislature in the particular statute which it is especially likely to do in a case in which the Act is not an Act of public and general policy, but is rather in the nature of a private legislative bargain between certain persons likely to be affected by the work authorised by a special Act, and a body of undertakers as to the manner in which they will keep up certain public works. The scheduled agreement by clause 1 provides that "Sub-sect. 14 of sect. 88 shall, for the purpose of this agreement" (I am not sure what these last words mean, but I think practically nothing) "be read and have effect as if the same were in the words following." Then follow some give-and-take clauses as to the dredging and two clauses (d) and (e) which deal with wharves and the rights and liabilities of the company and the wharf owners respectively in relation thereto. These clauses are remarkable because they embody a bargain with considerations passing to and from the company and the wharf owners. Then follows sect. 2, which provides for a modification of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885, the sub-section which dealt with the rights of the traders of Warrington in certain circumstances to use the canal on the payment of certain fixed tolls. Then comes clause 4, whereby the company bind themselves to execute the dredging and works prescribed by the agreement. Then clause 6, which gives the traders a right of navigation on a certain part of the canal free of charge. It provides as follows: [His Lordship read it and continued:] It will be observed that it is the surveyor of the corporation who has to give this notice. Clause 7 provides for the revival of sect. 88 as it originally stood after notice and default, but this clause is unimportant, as no such notice was ever given. Clause 8 enables the corporation in case of neglect or default of the company in maintaining the channel to remove the obstruction at the cost of the company. Then come clause 9, which saves all the rights of the traders, and clause 10 which is the arbitration clause. Those two clauses run thus: [His Lordship read them, and continued:] It will be observed that the latter clause differs very little from sub-sect. 22 of sect. 88 except that the engineer arbitrator is to be named by a different authority. Clause 12 says that the corporation shall have all rights and privileges under and shall be deemed to be traders within the meaning of this agreement. I think I have now called attention to all the material parts of the statutory agreement. It will be observed that the right to recover the tolls can only arise under the statutory agreement, although other damages could be recovered by traders and manufacturers for breaches of the provisions of sect. 88 affecting them if indeed traders individually have a right of action within the purview of the Act of 1885. The right of the traders collectively to a declaration of rights, whether under the Act of 1885 or under the statutory agreement of 1896, I will consider presently. I think that the only other matter which I have to call attention to before considering the preliminary point, based on an alleged ouster of jurisdiction of the court, is sect. 202 of the Act of 1885, which runs thus: [His Lordship read it, and continued:] I may as well at once dismiss the consideration of sect. 202. In my judgment, it is quite unnecessary to resort to the arbitration clause contained in the section, even in the case of general damages or return of tolls claimed by the traders individually, for whether such claims are based on the Act of 1885 or on the scheduled agreement the claimants cannot succeed unless the company are in default, and the company cannot be proved to be in default unless and until their liability or obligation has been fixed, and if that liability or obligation can only be fixed by arbitration, the claim for damages or return of money paid for tolls must fail until the obligation or liability has been so fixed, and the same proposition is true of an action for declaration of obligation or liability. I will now proceed to deal with the question whether the effect of sub-sect. 22 of sect. 88 is to oust the jurisdiction of the court in the fullest sense of the word, that is to say, in the sense that jurisdiction cannot be given to the court to determine a question the determination of which has to be relegated by Act of Parliament, even by the consent of the parties to the litigation in court. That a statute may thus bar a plaintiff from maintaining an action in a court of law and compel him to pursue the course laid down by the statute cannot be doubted: (see Crisp v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394; and also the provisions in the Building Societies Acts). In that case it is to be observed that although there was a trial at Nisi Prius and a verdict for the plaintiff, the objection to the tribunal was allowed to prevail without any plea to the jurisdiction on a mere objection taken at Nisi Prius and reserved to be disposed of by the court in Banc. The same case shows that it is not necessary that the jurisdiction of the court should be barred by express words; it is sufficient if the jurisdiction is barred by necessary implication. A great deal of argument was addressed to us as to when and under what circumstances a statutory arbitration clause will in the full sense of the word oust the jurisdiction of the courts. Byrne, J., on the authority of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (L. Rep. 2 Sco. App. 347), and the judgments of Smith and Chitty, L.JJ. in London and North-Western Railway v. Donellan and Billington (78 L. T. Rep. 575; (1898) 2 Q. B. 7), which were approved by the House of Lords in Midland Railway Company v. Loseby and Carnley (80 L. T. Rep. 93; (1899) A. C. 133), held that in the present case if the matter had stood on the original Act independently of the words "unless otherwise agreed on," the jurisdiction of the courts would have been ousted by an arbitration enactment raising a statutory duty which could not be waived. Thus far I agree with Byrne, J. But the learned judge went on to hold the words in the prefatory clause of sect. 88, "unless otherwise agreed on," rendered it competent, in case an action was brought, for one of the parties by his conduct to agree to waive the right to insist on arbitration. I cannot agree. I think, as I have already stated, that these words only refer to a modification of the provisions of sect. 88. As to the ouster of jurisdiction, it was argued by Mr. Bousfield and Mr. Hughes that Byrne, J. had misunderstood the decision of the House of Lords in the Caledonian Railway case (ubi sup.), and that the opinion of Sir Archibald Smith and Chitty, L.JJ. in the London and North-Western case (ubi sup.) had not been affirmed by the House of Lords on the appeal in London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (ubi sup.) or Midland Railway Company v. Loseby and Carnley (ubi sup.). I cannot agree. The suggestion that the judgment of Lord Cairns in the Caledonian Railway case (ubi sup.) had been misunderstood was largely based on observations by Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. in London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (60 L. T. Rep. 370; 40 Ch. Div. 100) by which those Lords Justices expressed doubts whether Lord Cairns meant to decide or meant to indicate his own opinion to the effect that the jurisdiction of the courts was ousted. With deference to those Lords Justices, I think that a careful examination of the Caledonian Railway case as reported in the Law Reports, in connection with the facts and pleadings as stated in the Court of Session decisions (3rd series, vol. 10, p. 892) shows that Lord Cairns did mean to decide and indicate that the jurisdiction of the court was ousted in respect of the particular matter in question. The matter stands thus: The plaintiffs brought their action claiming payment under certain clauses, 8, 9, and 14, of an agreement between the two companies—of one-fourth part of the balance of certain gross receipts after making certain deductions. The defendants pleaded to the whole action art. 18 of the agreement, whereby it was provided that: "All differences which may arise between the parties hereto, respecting the true meaning or effect of this agreement, or the mode of carrying the same into operation, shall from time to time, so often as any such questions or differences shall arise, be referred to arbitration in terms of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, and the provision with regard to the settlement of disputes by arbitration in such Act, shall be held to be incorporated with this agreement, and pleaded that the action was excluded by the said art. 18." The Lord Ordinary sustained the plea in law, and dismissed the action. Against this decision there was an appeal which was argued twice—once before four judges and once before seven. The first decision on appeal was simply to reverse the decision of the Lord Ordinary on the ground that the action was a simple action for money debt, raising on the face of it no question falling under clause 18, and it was pointed out that the judge might still send a special point to an arbitrator if any question arose in the course of the cause which fell within the obligation to refer to arbitrators. By the second decision in the Court of Appeal, it was further decided that the question raised by the defenders' second plea, that is to say, that the defenders "ought to be assoilsied in respect that in none of the half years in question did any balance of revenue remain after meeting the requisite charges, and that thus there was no sum divisible between the pursuers' and the defenders' shareholders in terms of the 9th article of the said agreement" involved a difference between the parties respecting the true meaning or effect of the agreement, for what the Wemyss Bay Railway Company maintained was that according to "the true meaning and effect of the agreement" the Caledonian Railway Company had a right to one-fourth of the profits only when the remaining three-fourths was sufficient to meet the interest on the debt, and Lord Kinloch, in advising the opinion of the court, said: "I am of opinion that the question thus raised is, in the sound sense of the agreement, a 'difference arising between the parties respecting the true meaning or effect of the agreement.'" And it was ordered, therefore, to supersede the consideration of the cause until the said question should be settled by arbitration in the manner prescribed. It was against this judgment that the Caledonian Railway Company appealed to the House of Lords, and the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns), having regard to the words of the Act to which the agreement between the railway companies had been scheduled "and it shall be lawful for the company (that is, the Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company) and the Caledonian Railway Company respectively, and they are hereby required to implement and fulfil all the provisions and stipulations in the said agreement contained," held that the arbitration clause had become a statutory obligation, and that the Act of Parliament excluded the jurisdiction of the court to decide this question which had arisen in the course of this action, forcing the parties to have it settled not by the ordinary tribunals of this country, but by arbitration. The case of London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) was very different, because in that case the arbitration clause was contained in a voluntary agreement which the railway companies were authorised to enter into by the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859, and which although entered into under such authority was nevertheless simply a voluntary agreement imposing no statutory obligation to arbitrate. With regard to the contention that the judgments of Smith and Chitty, L.J.J. in London and North-Western Railway Company v. Donellan and Billington (ubi sup.) were not approved by the House of Lords in Midland Railway Company v. Loseby and Carnley (ubi sup.), and that the opinion of the Law Lords in London and North-Western and Great Western Joint Railway Companies v. Billington (79 L. T. Rep. 503; (1899) A. C. 79) show this, I cannot agree. The last-mentioned case only decided that the jurisdiction was not ousted because there had been no difference existing between the parties before action, which is certainly not the fact in the present case. Assuming then, as in my opinion you must, that the jurisdiction of the court may be ousted by statutory provisions which have no express words to that effect, let us see what are the modes by which jurisdiction may be ousted. Sometimes the statute constitutes arbitration, the only tribunal in which disputes between certain parties can be determined, and thus ousts the jurisdiction. Sometimes the jurisdiction is ousted because the statute has plainly said that some matter essential to be proved in a particular action should only be determined by arbitration. The Caledonian Railway case (ubi sup.) seems to me to be an instance. In either case if the arbitration provision thus enacted is for the public good and not for the benefit of individuals, no deficiency in pleading and no waiver by litigants can give the court jurisdiction. In my judgment the intention of the Legislature as expressed in sub-sect. 22 is that, in regard to anything to be done or not to be done under sect. 88, the engineer to be appointed by the Board of Trade, is intended to be the only tribunal for the determination of what is the true intent and meaning of the section, just as under sub-sect. 21, the same engineer is to have sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine details as to sub-sects. 13, 15, and 16, so under sub-sect. 22, that arbitrator has sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine the obligations of the company under sect. 14. Sect. 88 in spite of its preface cannot be regarded as merely embodying an agreement come to by the promoters of the Bill and the corporation of Warrington in the course of the promotion. It provides for the protection of those who were parties to no agreement—traders, manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington—because the Legislature thought it right that this section of the public should be so protected, and I cannot see that the fact that the preface authorises the corporation and the company to agree on other provisions alters the character of the section. It is still a section passed in the public interest and not merely the embodiment of private agreement. The corporation of Warrington are obviously deemed to be sufficient guardians of public interests, to intrust them with such modification of the provisions as receives the approval of the corporation and the company. It is perhaps a convenient place to mention, although taking the view which I do of this case it is not very important that this power of the corporation goes rather to show that the Legislature did not intend traders to have any direct remedy in this part, either in an action by someone on behalf of others or in actions by individuals. I will now pass to the scheduled agreement. The agreement is, by sect. 43 of the Act of 1896, confirmed and made binding on the corporation and the company. The corporation and the company are the only parties to it, and it seems to me to follow that it is impossible for the traders to sue upon the agreement quâ agreement and the rights of the traders seem to me to fall exactly within the words of Lord Watson in D. Davis and Sons Limited v. Taff Vale Railway Company (72 L. T. Rep. 632; (1895) A. C. 542), where after pointing out that in cases where the provisions of a local and personal Act directly impose mutual obligations upon persons or companies, such provisions may be fairly considered as having this analogy to contract, and they must, as between those parties, be construed in precisely the same way as if they had been matter not of enactment but of private agreement. And he goes on to say that it was in the sense that he observed in Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners (7 App. Cas. 694), that such statutory provisions must be regarded as a contract between the parties whether made by their mutual agreement or forced upon them by the Legislature. And he says that for all purposes of construction these observations apply, but not further. Then follow the words of Lord Watson, which seem to me to apply exactly to this case (at p. 552 of (1895) A. C.): "The provisions of a railway Act, even when they impose mutual obligations, differ from private stipulations in this essential respect, that they derive their existence and their force, not from the agreement of parties, but from the will of the Legislature. And when provisions of that kind are not limited to the interests of the parties mutually obliged, but impose upon one or other or both of them an obligation in favour of third parties, who are sufficiently designated, I am of opinion that the obligation so imposed must operate as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of these parties, and cannot be regarded as a mere stipulation inter alios, in which they may have an interest but no title to enforce. These observations are not meant to apply to any case where a private contract made between two companies is scheduled to and confirmed by the Act, because, in such a case, the very form of the enactment indicates that it is to operate as a contract, and not otherwise." It seems to me, therefore, that in the present case, if we are to regard the scheduled contract as a mere contract between the parties to it, the traders cannot sue upon such a contract, and if, on the other hand, we are to regard the Act of 1896, or the Act of 1885 as operating as a direct enactment of the Legislature in favour of the traders, neither the traders nor the company can get rid of such direct enactment by waiver or otherwise, unless upon a true construction of the Act the enactments appear to have been passed merely for the benefit of such persons and not in the interests of the public. The outcome of these considerations is that, in my opinion, the preliminary objection ought to be allowed in respect of the whole action. First as to the statute, and the effect of sub-sect. 22 of sect. 88. It seems to me that alike in respect to the claims of the corporation and the traders, collectively and individually, the action is based on default by the canal company in the performance of their obligation after dredging the bed and banks of the river Mersey, to "for ever after maintain the same dredged, so that," &c., or if one treats sub-sect. 14 of sect. 88 as modified by clause 1 of the scheduled agreement, then for ever to maintain the channel dredged, in accordance with the provisions of sub-sect. 14, as modified by that agreement, and it matters not whether one takes the arbitration clause in sub-sect. 22 of sect. 88, or takes the arbitration clause in sub-sect. 22, as modified by clause 10 of the scheduled agreement—in neither case can it be proved that there is a default in maintainance, if the parties differ as to the true intent and meaning of the words of the statute as in force, with relation to the obligation to maintain, until that difference has been settled in the manner provided by the statute. Now, that there had been for a long time before the date of this action a difference between the corporation and the canal company as to the true meaning and intent of the provisions regulating the obligation to maintain I cannot doubt, and it follows that the determination of this difference must go to arbitration before any action, based on the statutes, can be brought. Then as to an action by the corporation based on the agreement, as an agreement, in my opinion, the confirmed agreement, having regard to its frame, and in particular to its modification under the statutory powers given by sect. 88, and to the sub-sections to that section, cannot be relied upon by the corporation as a mere agreement containing provisions, which can be waived by the consent of the parties. I think, therefore, that no action can be brought by the corporation based on the agreement quid agreement. The action of the traders collectively claiming declaration of right fails for the same reasons which I have given in regard to the action of the corporation making similar claims. The claim of the individual traders for return of tolls paid fails, because it is essential to the maintenance of this claim that default by the canal company should be proved, but this cannot be done till the standard of duty has been determined by the statutory arbitrator, which has not yet been done. I think that the arbitration clause in sect. 88 of the Act of 1885, and clause 10 of the agreement, prevent the traders in their individual capacity proving any default in fact by the canal company; but even if this were not so, I should be inclined to hold that, as regards individual traders, jurisdiction is ousted by sect. 202 of the Act of 1885. If, however, their action fails merely because something essential to their cause of action fails to be decided by arbitration, I think the action might be stayed and not dismissed. With regard to the pleading, I agree with the contention that although according to the old rules of pleading it was not necessary to plead the jurisdiction, modern practice has been so to plead ouster of jurisdiction: (see Mayor, &c., of Folkestone v. Brooks and Ladd, 69 L. T. Rep. 403; (1893) 3 Ch. 22). But assuming the pleading of the defendant company is faulty in this respect, I am clearly of opinion that the pleading ought to be treated as amended. No one was placed in any difficulty by the omission to plead, and the case, in my opinion, bears no analogy to those cases in which there is a refusal to stay after a step has been taken by the defendant in actions brought in contravention of an arbitration clause contained in a voluntary agreement. In my judgment, this appeal ought to be allowed. I will deal with the costs later.

STIRLING, L.J.—This is an action by certain traders and manufacturers carrying on business at or near Warrington on behalf of themselves and all others, the traders, manufacturers, and others carrying on business at or near Warrington, and also in their own respective rights and the corporation of Warrington as plaintiffs against the Manchester Ship Canal Company. The plaintiffs complain that the defendants have failed to perform certain obligations imposed on them by Act of Parliament and that damage has thereby been occasioned to the plaintiffs who are traders and manufacturers in their individual capacity. They also allege that, in the events which have happened, the traders, manufacturers, and others near Warrington became entitled to a right of navigation over portions of the defendants' canal and the river Mersey, free of tolls; but that the defendants have insisted on payment of toll. In these circumstances the plaintiffs claim declarations as to their rights; repayment to the traders and manufacturers, plaintiffs in their own rights, of the tolls which they have been compelled to pay; payment of damages to the same plaintiffs for defendants' breach of their statutory obligations; and an injunction at the trial before Byrne, J. a preliminary objection was taken to the jurisdiction of the court as to the matters in dispute was ousted, and the questions between the parties must be determined by arbitration; but this objection was overruled by the learned judge. Upon this appeal the same objection has been taken and argued, and we have now to dispose of it. Sect. 88 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1885 commences thus: [His Lordship read the preamble to that section, and continued:] There follow twenty-two sub-sections, some of which contain provisions which seem to be mainly for the protection of the corporation (as, for example, sub-sects. 8, 9, 10, which relate to the sewage, gas, and other works of the corporation). Others contain provisions which seem to be mainly, if not exclusively, for the protection of the traders and others carrying on business at or near Warrington (as, for example, sub-sect. 2, which confers on those traders and others the right to use certain portions of the canal entrances, locks and lock entrances, and also part of the river Mersey, upon payment of tolls); while other sub-sections contain provisions apparently for the benefit of both (as, for example, sub-sect. 13). Sub-sect. 14 appears to me to fall under the last clause, a view which is confirmed by the way in which the sub-section is dealt with in the agreement of the 9th April 1896: (see clause 1, sub-clause (d)). The enactment at the commencement of sect. 88 contains the usual qualifications that the provisions there referred to are to take effect "unless otherwise agreed on between the corporation and the company." These words read in their ordinary meaning seem to authorise the corporation and the company to vary the provisions of sect. 88 by entering into an agreement to that effect. This power was exercised by an agreement between the corporation and the company bearing date 9th April 1896, and that agreement was with some modification confirmed and made binding on both parties by sect. 43 of the Manchester Ship Canal Act 1896, which is as follows: [His Lordship read that section and continued:] This section does not expressly give the force of a legislative enactment to the terms of the agreement thus confirmed, although two sub-sections of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 are expressed to be thereby varied. There is no dispute that either by action or by recourse to arbitration the Corporation of Warrington is entitled to enforce the provisions for its protection contained both in sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 and of the agreement confirmed by the Act of 1896. The first question to be considered is whether the traders and others carrying on business at or near Warrington are entitled to enforce such of the provisions of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 as are intended for their benefit. These provisions are found in the form of legislative enactment and do not arise merely out of a contract which has received statutory confirmation: and they are expressed to be for the protection of such traders and others. I think the decision in D. Davis and Sons Limited v. Toff Vale Railway Company

(72 L. T. Rep. 632; (1895) A. C. 542) applies, and that the traders are entitled to enforce the provisions of the section. Next, can they enforce the similar provisions of the agreement confirmed by sect. 43 of the Act of 1896? Those provisions do not take the form of legislative enactment, yet seeing that by the terms of sect. 88 of the Act of 1896 they are an authorised substitute for legislative enactment, it seems to me that the same right of enforcing them must exist. If, however, I rightly understand the way in which the plaintiffs in the present action shape their case, it may not be absolutely necessary to decide this point, for they base their claim on the provisions of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885, but do not desire to enforce them to an extent beyond those contained in the agreement of 1896, which are less favourable to them. I now come to the main question to be decided on the present occasion, namely, whether the corporation and traders, or either of them, can enforce their claims by action, it being contended on behalf of the defendants, that the provisions as to arbitration found in the Act of 1885, and the confirmed agreement of 1896, are such as to oust the jurisdiction of the courts. In support of this contention, reliance is first and principally placed on sect. 88, sub-sect. 22, of the Act of 1885. It is not really disputed that this enactment does impose on the company and the corporation an obligation to refer to arbitration any difference arising between them "as to the true intent and meaning of sect. 88," or as to anything to be done or not to be done thereunder; but there is a question as to the nature of the obligation; namely, whether it is such as, in the language of Lord Cairns (see Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Sco. App. 347, 350), to force the parties to have their disputes settled, not by the ordinary tribunals of the country, but by a reference to arbitration, or whether it is only such as to render it the duty of the court to enforce the section when either party insists on a reference to arbitration: (see London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 60 L. T. Rep. 370; 40 Ch. Div. 100). This is important, for if the latter be the correct view, then it may be that as a fact Byrne, J. has held the defendants were too late in claiming a reference to arbitration, whereas, if the former be that which is the true meaning, the objection is, in fact, that the court has no jurisdiction to entertain the action, and it may properly be raised at any time. Now the corporation of Warrington does not claim damages. The question between it and the defendant company are: (1) What is the true intent and meaning of sub-sect. 14 of sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 as varied by the agreement and statute of 1896. (2) Whether the company has or has not duly dredged and maintained the bed and banks of the river Mersey. In my judgment both these are questions which fall to be decided by arbitration in accordance with sub-sect. 22. That being so, and the obligation as to arbitration being imperative, and imposed by statute, it seems to me that the case falls within the terms used by Lord Cairns in advising the House of Lords in Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). And it is to be observed of Lord Chelmsford, Lord Hatherley, and Lord

OT. OF APP.] JOSEPH CROSFIELD & SONS LIM. v. MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL CO. [CT. OF APP.]

Selborne, that they expressed their unqualified concurrence with what Lord Cairns said on that occasion. It is true that in the case just mentioned the circumstances were such that the same conclusion might have been arrived at, even if the true nature of the obligation imposed on the parties to that litigation had been such as was held by the Court of Appeal to exist in the subsequent case of London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.). It is also true that in that case Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. (the former of whom had been counsel in the Scotch case) expressed doubts as to whether Lord Cairns really meant to decide or express an opinion that the jurisdiction of the courts was ousted. And those doubts on the point of so high authorities, have caused me very great difficulty. But the decision in London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.)—by which, of course, I am bound—is not precisely in point, and on the whole it seems to me that the better course is that this court should follow the language of Lord Cairns, assented to by the other noble Lords, and that any mistake as to its meaning—if such there be—should be set right by a higher tribunal. I agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J. in thinking that the obligation to refer is not altered by the words “unless otherwise agreed on” which occur at the beginning of sect. 88, and I do not desire to add anything to what he has said on that point. Assuming, then, that the jurisdiction of the court is ousted in the case of difference as between the corporation and the company, within sect. 88, sub-sect. 22, of the Act of 1885, I have to inquire whether this is also true as to the difference between the traders and the corporation. Now, it is obvious that sub-sect. 22 does not in terms extend to such differences: nor can I see that it makes the settlement of differences between the corporation and the company, a condition precedent to the bringing of an action by the trader against the company. Many of the provisions of sect. 88—as, for example, those in sub-sect. 2—are of the highest importance to traders, but might affect the interests of the corporation very slightly. In the case of differences arising between a trader and the company as to these provisions, the corporation might reasonably be desirous to avoid controversy, and the Act, so far as I see, provides no means by which the corporation could be compelled to embark, on what might prove to be an expensive contest before an arbitrator. Even where the corporation has an interest in the matter in dispute, the trader might be differently affected, and serious injustice might be done if he were to be held bound by arbitration proceedings, between the corporation and the company, to which he could not be directly a party. It is lastly contended that the present case falls within the terms of sect. 202 of the Act of 1885—namely: [His Lordship read that section, and continued:] The reference is to the provisions in sects. 126 to 137 of the Act. This sect. 202 is found in part 10 of the Act, under the heading “Miscellaneous.” To ascertain its effect I think it is desirable to look back to the earlier portions of the Act and see what express provision has there been made on the subject of arbitration. The earliest section in which such a provision occurs appears to be sect. 63, which is one for the protection of the owners for the time being of the Hooton Overport and Netherport estate in the county of Chester. This section is followed by a long series of sections (sects. 64 to 126 inclusive) for the protection of other owners, persons, corporations and companies, some of which do, while others do not, contain provisions for arbitration. The general nature of the provisions of the sections which contain arbitration clauses does not as far as I can see, materially differ from those of the section which do contain such clauses. Further, the arbitration clauses actually inserted vary considerably in their terms. In some (as sects. 71 and 118), all differences under the section are to be so determined; in others only matters more or less specific, for example, sect. 63 as to anything to be done or not to be done under the particular section or (sect. 88) as to the true intent or meaning of the section or as to anything to be done or not to be done thereunder or (sect. 99) as to any plans or mode of executing any work under the section. Again, the modes of arbitration prescribed are very various: as, for example (sect. 63), an engineer to be appointed (unless otherwise agreed) by the Board of Trade; or (sect. 64) under the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859; or (as in sect. 84) “in manner provided by this Act”; or (sect. 113) in accordance with the Common Law Procedure Act. It would seem that as regards these arbitration provisions the Legislature was desirous of giving effect to the wishes of those for whose benefit they were intended. Sect. 202 appears to be a section of wide operation applicable to all matters falling within its terms for which no specific provision has been made elsewhere. It is a positive legislative enactment that all questions arising between the company and any person touching “anything to be done or not to be done” under the provisions of the Act shall be determined by arbitration in the way pointed out. That seems to me to extend to anything to be done or not to be done under sect. 88. Now the main question at issue between the company and the traders of Warrington is whether the company have or have not duly dredged, and maintained dredged, the bed and banks of the river Mersey; and that is a question as to a thing to be done or not to be done under sect. 88. If the question is as between the company and the corporation of Warrington—as I think—to be settled by arbitration under sect. 88, sub-sect. 22, then it seems to me that for the same reasons it ought to be settled as between the company and the traders by arbitration under sect. 202. It appears to me that it would be an anomaly if it were held that the differences between the company and the corporation must be settled by arbitration, while those on the same matters between the company and the traders need not. I do not think that the tolls and damages claimed by the trader plaintiffs are moneys to be paid under the provisions of the Act of 1855. But still in accordance with what was done in the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.), the action ought to be stayed until the question which falls to be determined by the arbitration has been decided. In my opinion, therefore, the action ought to be wholly stayed or dismissed as between the corporation of Warrington and the defendant company; and should be stayed until the determination of the main question as between the traders and manufacturers of Warrington and the defendant company.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—As I have the misfortune to differ from the majority of the court, it is necessary that I should, as briefly as possible, state my own views. This is an action in which the corporation of Warrington and certain traders carrying on business at Warrington, are co-plaintiffs, and the Manchester Ship Canal Company are defendants, and a preliminary objection has been raised that the jurisdiction of the court is ousted, or, in other words, that the High Court has no jurisdiction to entertain the action, and that the disputes between the parties must be decided by arbitration. Byrne, J. has overruled this objection. The question depends upon the proper construction and effect of a few sections in the Manchester Ship Canal Act of 1885 and the amending Act of 1896. The plaintiffs' case is shortly this: They say that the canal company were bound by statute to dredge and maintain dredged a certain portion of the river Mersey at a certain depth, and that they have not fulfilled this statutory obligation, and that heavy damages have been sustained by the individual traders by reason of this breach of duty on the part of the canal company. The traders also allege that they were entitled in the events which have happened to use a portion of the canal free from toll, and they seek to recover tolls which they have paid under protest. Sect. 88 of the Act of 1885 is an elaborate section, obviously inserted in the interest of Warrington. It commences as follows: [His Lordship read the preamble to that section, and continued:] Then follow twenty-three sub-sections, under which various rights are conferred upon the corporation and the traders, and various restrictions and obligations are imposed upon the canal company. Sub-sect. 14 binds the company to dredge, and maintain dredged, a certain part of the Mersey to a depth of 8ft., and sub-sect. 22 is as follows: [His Lordship read that sub-section, and continued:] Now, it will be observed from the introductory words that although certain rights are given by the section to the traders, power is left to the corporation and the canal company by agreement to modify these provisions, but not, I think, to make entirely new and independent provisions. For this purpose the corporation was apparently treated as representative of the traders. In 1896 an agreement dated the 9th April 1896, was entered into between the corporation and the canal company, which was, I think, intended to operate and take effect under the introductory words in sect. 88. By clause 1 of the agreement sub-sect. 14 of sect. 88 was, for the purposes of that agreement, to be read and have effect as if the same were in the words following: It is not necessary to read the whole clause; it is sufficient to say that it altered the portion of the Mersey which the canal company were bound to dredge and maintain dredged, and it contained various other provisions modifying the rights conferred by sect. 88 upon the traders as well as upon the corporation, and clause 10 was as follows: [His Lordship read that clause, and continued:] I may remark in passing, that this arbitration clause differs from the arbitration clause in sect. 88 of the Act of 1885, the appointment of the arbitrator resting with the President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and not with the Board of Trade. Sect. 43 of the Act of 1896 was as follows: [His Lordship read that section, and continued:] Now, it is necessary to consider the case of the corporation separately from the case of the traders. I cannot regard sect. 88, in its original form or as modified by the Act of 1896, as a mere agreement between the corporation and the canal company. I think it was an enactment dealing with, and conferring rights upon, not the whole public but a particular class of public—namely, manufacturers, traders, and others at or near Warrington—and this being so, it seems to me that sect. 88 must be taken to have conferred rights to be dealt with and enforced only in the manner prescribed by sub-sect. 22, or, in other words, I think that sub-section excludes the jurisdiction of the court in any case of difference between the corporation and the canal company falling within the language of the sub-section: (see Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). The authorities which have decided that under the Building Societies Acts and the Friendly Societies Acts the jurisdiction of the courts is ousted may be referred to as illustrating the general principle: (see especially Crisp v. Bunbury, 8 Bing. 394) and Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Kent (51 L. T. Rep. 6; 9 App. Cas. 260). In my view the position is not changed by reason of the Act of 1896. The scheduled agreement confirmed by the Act must either be regarded as something to be read into, and to form part of, sect. 88, or as something more than a mere agreement between the parties, and as in substance a public enactment affecting not merely the parties, but traders and others. I agree, therefore, with my Lord and Stirling, L.J. that the objection, so far as the corporation is concerned, is valid. With reference to the traders different considerations apply. Neither of the two arbitration clauses referred to in terms affects the traders, each relating only to differences between the corporation and the company. It is quite true that in a certain sense the corporation might be said to represent the traders for the purpose of obtaining from the arbitrator a declaration of right, yet it is difficult to see how either of those arbitration clauses can be applied to the case of individual traders, each of whom alleges that he has sustained damage by reason of the breach by the canal company of its statutory obligations. No traders could be a party to such an arbitration or require such an arbitration to be entered upon. The introductory words of sect. 88 suffice to show that it was intended to confer certain rights upon the traders for whose benefit the section was enacted, and even apart from that there is sufficient in the section itself to entitle the traders to maintain an action for damages unless there is some other provision in the Act expressly excluding the jurisdiction of the High Court: (see D. Davis and Sons Limited v. Toff Vale Railway Company, 72 L. T. Rep. 632; (1895) A. C. 542). It seems to me wrong to postpone the adjudication upon the claims of the traders until after an award in a reference to which they will not be parties. I agree with Stirling, L.J. upon this point. It is suggested, however, that sect. 202 of the Act of 1885 has the effect of ousting or postponing the jurisdiction of the court. The section is as follows: [His Lordship read that section, and continued:] I may remark in passing that this arbitration clause differs from both the arbitration clauses I have already set out. No importance was attached to this section in the argument in the court below; but it is nevertheless open to the appellants to contend that the jurisdiction of the court is excluded by it. I am not able to attribute such force to the section. Even if, which may be doubted, it has any application to a claim for damages of the nature I have indicated, I think it is at the most only a clause enabling either party to apply to the court to stay the proceedings, and to refer to arbitration, and is not a clause excluding the jurisdiction of the court: (see London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 60 L. T. Rep. 370; 40 Ch. Div. 100). I cannot conclude that the jurisdiction of the court is ousted for all time, in every case of dispute between the canal company and members of the public with reference to the statutory obligations imposed on the canal company towards those members of the public. These obligations are both numerous and varied. They extend over nearly 100 sections. I find in some sections an express reference to sect. 202 (see, for example, sect. 72, sub-sect. 7, and sect. 85, sub-secta. 3, 8, and 10). It may be that sect. 202 only prescribes a mode of arbitration for those cases in which in the earlier part of the Act arbitration is prescribed, but no particular mode of arbitration is specified. But, however that may be, I do not find myself able to agree with the view of the majority of the court that it is not competent to us at the present moment to consider the case presented by the traders. The result, in my opinion, is that the objection prevails as to the corporation, but not as to the traders, and the strict course would be to strike out the corporation as co-plaintiffs, and to leave the other co-plaintiffs to continue the action. But, although no relief could be given to the corporation in this action, the misjoinder is not very material for the questions arising for decision as between the traders and the canal company involve or include the questions sought to be raised as between the corporation and the canal company, and under these circumstances, in my view, we ought now to deal with the merits of the appeal.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that so far as the Corporation is concerned, the action ought to be dismissed. We will deal with the traders collectively in the same way as we do individually. I understood that they claimed no damages, and only claimed a declaration. So far as it is an action by the traders there will be a stay thereof until further order, or, if we use the Scotch word, the action will be “superseded” until further order. That was what was said in the case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company (ubi sup.). “Superseded” is the word used in the report. Then, with regard to the costs, I think that we all agree, having regard to the view of the majority of the court of what the judgment should be, that, inasmuch as this preliminary point of ouster of jurisdiction was not taken until the case was before Byrne, J., the defendants ought not to have any costs prior to that time—prior to their taking the point. But with regard to the costs since the plaintiffs, having elected to go on, and have an inquiry held, those costs the defendants must have. Then with regard to the costs of this appeal, they must have those likewise.

Appeal allowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Jan. 29 and 30.

(Before BYRNE, J.)

CARMICHAEL v. EVANS. (a)

Partnership—Dissolution—Expulsion clause—Conduct detrimental to partnership business or flagrant breach of any duties of partner—Conviction by police magistrate for travelling without a ticket—Injunction.

Articles of partnership provided that the managing partner, in the event of either of the other partners being addicted to notorious intemperance or immorality or other scandalous conduct detrimental to the partnership business or at any time during the partnership permitting or being guilty of any flagrant breach of any of the duties of a partner, should be at liberty to remove either or both of them from the partnership on giving them six days' notice in writing. One of the partners was convicted by a police magistrate of travelling on a railway without a ticket with intent to avoid payment and fined the full penalty, and thereupon the managing partner gave him notice expelling him from the partnership.

On motion by the partner for an interim injunction to restrain his expulsion:

Held, that, as the plaintiff had been convicted of dishonesty, the case was within the expulsion clause, and that there was ample justification for the notice of dissolution, and the court declined to interfere by injunction.

APPLICATION for an interim injunction by the plaintiff, to restrain his expulsion from a partnership.

In July 1901 articles of partnership were entered into between the defendant Mrs. Elizabeth Harries Evans, Joseph Harries, and the plaintiff Peter Carmichael, whereby the parties became partners in the business of general drapers, carried on in the Brompton-road under the name or firm of “Tudor Brothers.”

The business had for some time previously been carried on by the defendant, and the bulk of the capital was provided by her, the other partners receiving salaries and being each further entitled to an eighth share in the net profits of the business.

By the partnership deed the defendant Mrs. Evans was to have the sole general direction and control of the business, and also the right to require the other partners to devote the whole of their time to the business; but she was only bound to devote so much of her time to it as she should think fit.

By clause 22 of the deed it was provided amongst other things that in the event of Harries or the plaintiff, or either of them, being addicted to notorious intemperance or immorality or other scandalous conduct detrimental to the partnership business, or at any time during the partnership permitting or being guilty of any breach of any of the conditions of the deed, or any flagrant breach of any of the duties of a partner, or failing to account for moneys received, the defendant was to be at liberty to remove either or both of them from the partnership on giving to either or both not less than six days' notice in writing, and thereupon the partnership was to cease and determine at the expiration of such notice as regards the person to whom it was given. In any such event the defendant was empowered to publish a notice of the partial or total dissolution of the partnership, as the case might be.

The deed also contained provisions for ascertaining the value of the interest of the expelled partner.

On the 31st Dec. 1903 the plaintiff was convicted at the Westminster Police-court for having travelled on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway without a ticket and fined 40s. and 2l. 2s. costs. A report of the conviction appeared in several of the daily papers, but in none of them was any reference made to the fact that the plaintiff was a partner in "Tudor Brothers," though his full name was given, and he was described as "managing partner of a large drapery firm in Brompton-road."

The defendant, having seen a notice of the conviction in one of the papers, made inquiries as to the facts therein alleged, and, having determined to exercise the power of expulsion given to her by clause 22 of the partnership deed, she on the 14th Jan. 1904 sent to the plaintiff the following notice:

In consequence of your recent conviction at the Westminster Court for travelling on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway with intent to avoid payment, I hereby give you notice, in pursuance of the articles of partnership under which the business of Tudor Brothers is carried on by you, Mr. Harries, and myself, that the said partnership shall cease and determine so far as concerns yourself on the expiration of one week from this date.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action against Mrs. Evans in which he claimed a declaration that the notice of dissolution on the 14th Jan. was void, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from excluding him from the partnership and from publishing notice of the dissolution, and now he moved for an interim injunction to restrain his exclusion from the partnership until trial of the action, and to restrain the defendant from publishing the dissolution.

From the evidence it appeared that the plaintiff had been a season-ticket holder on the Brighton line for about ten years; his season ticket had expired on the 8th Sept. 1903, and it had not been renewed on the 27th Nov. 1903, the day on which he had been detected travelling without a ticket. The plaintiff in his evidence alleged that he had been ill and overworked, and that he had always intended to renew his season ticket; that he had usually in the meantime taken a daily ticket, but on this occasion he had inadvertently omitted to take a ticket.

He further alleged that as the name of Tudor Brothers was not mentioned in the newspapers, and it was not generally known that he was a partner, no harm whatever had been done to the business by the report of his conviction.

Evidence to the same effect was given by Harries, the other salaried partner.

The defendant in her evidence stated that the effect of the conviction was most injurious to the business; that the whole staff of the firm of Tudor Brothers, comprising male and female shop assistants, buyers, counting-house clerks, and porters, knew that the plaintiff was a partner; that the wholesale house from whom goods were purchased knew that the plaintiff was a partner of the firm, and many of the customers also had similar knowledge; that from the point of view of business dealings with wholesale houses with whom the credit of the firm and of the individual partners was of the highest importance, and from the point of view of the customers with whom business was transacted, the widely spread report that a member of the firm had been convicted, in the words of the magistrate, of a "shabby fraud" could not but detrimentally affect the welfare of the business.

Mr. Evans, the defendant's husband, who was himself engaged in a large drapery business, took the same view of the effect of the plaintiff's conviction.

There was also evidence that the plaintiff's brother, a builder, had considered it necessary since the plaintiff's conviction to advertise in the daily papers and trade journals that his business was not in any way connected with that of the plaintiff.

Rowden, K.C. and G. Henderson for the plaintiff.—The defendant ought to be restrained from acting under the expulsion clause until the trial of the action. The object of a clause of this kind is to protect the partnership. The court always construes clauses of this kind strictly in view of the abuse to which they may be subjected and of the hardship resulting from expulsion:

Lindley on Partnership, 6th edit., p. 427.

Immoral conduct on the part of a partner in a firm of bankers is not a sufficient ground for a dissolution as to that partner, although the articles of partnership contained a clause for dissolution in case any of the partners should do any act to the discredit or injury of the co-partnership:

Snow v. Milford, 18 L. T. Rep. 142.

The court ought to maintain the status quo pending the trial. If the fact that the plaintiff is a partner is not generally known, his continuance in the business will do no injury to the defendant. The offence for which the plaintiff was convicted is not within the terms of clause 22.

Levett, K.C. and M. Romer for the defendant.—The court ought not to interfere in this case. The defendant has the largest interest in the business, and she is convinced that the plaintiff's conviction is detrimental to the partnership business. The status quo would not be maintained by an interim injunction, for the defendant would until the trial have to carry on the business with a partner who has been convicted of dishonesty. Mutual trust and absolute honesty are essential features of partnerships. If a partner has been guilty of embezzlement or has committed a breach of trust, his co-partner may by notice dissolve the partnership from the date of the notice, notwithstanding the articles of partnership provide for its continuance for the joint lives of the partners:

Essell v. Hayward, 30 Beav. 158.

There is no suggestion that this notice of expulsion has been given otherwise than in good faith.

Rowden, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 30.—BYRNE, J. (having referred to the notice of motion, and having read clause 22 of the deed of partnership, continued:—) It has been said in argument, that a clause of this description being of a very stringent character, the court must be careful to see that it is reasonably and fairly exercised, and that events have happened which justify expulsion before allowing it to operate. Having said that, I ought to add that in the present case there is no contest at all with reference to the main facts. The plaintiff in the action was a season-ticket holder on the Brighton line, and in the habit of travelling daily to and from London. On the 8th Sept. 1903 he allowed that season ticket to expire, and up to the 27th Nov. of the same year he had failed to renew it; on that day he was detected travelling without a ticket. Proceedings were subsequently taken in the police-court under the Regulation of Railways Act 1889, s. 5, sub-s. 3 (a), which imposes a penalty in the case of a person travelling without having previously paid his fare "with intent to avoid payment thereof." He was convicted and fined the full penalty with costs. I neither desire to exaggerate nor to minimise the nature of the offence, nor do I desire to dwell upon the circumstances more than to this extent—to say that the circumstances in connection with this conviction, so far as there is no dispute about them, are not such as induce me to think that this was otherwise than a bad instance of defrauding the railway company. The period of two and a half months was allowed to elapse without renewal of the season ticket, and the excuses given appear to me to be wholly insufficient. This was a matter in which every day the man must have been reminded of the fact of the absence of his ticket. Before the magistrate he said that sometimes he took a ticket and sometimes he did not during this period. In his affidavit he says that, except on three or four occasions, he did take a ticket when travelling. I do not go behind the conviction and the circumstances under which the conviction was obtained. He says this is not a matter which is calculated to be injurious to the business, and he has made an affidavit to that effect. An account of what had taken place before the police magistrate appeared in several of the daily papers. Although the literal accuracy of the report in the Daily Telegraph is not strictly proved, it is proved that this newspaper has published to the world remarks attributed to the magistrate showing that he was of opinion that the case was one of continued fraudulent conduct. The plaintiff does not challenge the accuracy of the accounts published, but he says that the name of the firm "Tudor Brothers" was not mentioned, nor the names of the partners, and that it was not generally known that he was a partner. On the other hand, I have the evidence of Mrs. Evans and of Mrs. Evans' husband, who himself was the proprietor of another large drapery business in London, to the effect that such an act would be most injurious; and, moreover, that the fact that the plaintiff was a partner in this business was largely known to customers, employees, and others. [His Lordship then referred to the evidence, and continued:] Now, apart from the question on the facts, I go to the actual clause itself, and, amongst other things, it provides that if Peter Carmichael should be guilty of any flagrant breach of any of the duties of a partner, then the clause is to operate. I conceive it to be one of the first duties of a partner to be an honest man, and that not merely in his accounts as between himself and his partners, but in relation to third persons; and I cannot imagine anything more in the teeth of the duty of one partner towards another than that he should do something to bring himself within the penalties of the criminal law. If this had been the case of picking a pocket, I do not suppose his counsel would have ventured to say that it was not a flagrant breach of his duty; and it is no part of my duty for this purpose to try and draw nice distinctions between the degree of moral turpitude to be attached to one or other of offences of this nature. I find that the man has been convicted, and convicted of fraud under circumstances which, so far as I can see, afford no reasonable ground for saying that it was not of its kind a bad case. Under those circumstances the argument was presented, and strongly presented, to me that upon motion the court was not in the habit of allowing clauses of this description to be acted upon, but left the matter to be determined at the trial, only taking care of the preservation of the rights in the meantime. But, as I have observed, the material facts in the present case are admitted. There is no contest as to the conviction or the circumstances under which the conviction took place; and in my judgment this is exactly one of those cases that come within the clause, and there was justification for giving the notice which was given. I was appealed to on the ground of balance of convenience. To my mind, in the present case, the balance of convenience and of justice points to non-interference at the instance of the plaintiff. It is not immaterial in considering this question to remember that I offered the parties to make arrangements that the whole case might be finally tried within a fortnight; but that was refused on behalf of the plaintiff, although the defendant was willing to accept that proposition if the plaintiff would take a holiday and keep away from the business till the matter could be determined. But I do not base my decision upon that. If it be true, as I think it is, that the conduct of the partner is detrimental to the partnership business, and likely to do serious injury, that injury would be going on during the interval between now and the trial; whereas the exclusion of the plaintiff from the business would not inflict irreparable injury upon him, and he would have his remedy, if at the trial it should turn out that he was right, and that he ought not to have been excluded. I agree that this is an exceptional case in its circumstances, but I do not feel justified in

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Tuesday, March 1.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ.)

ALTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (apps.) v. SPICER (resp.). (a)

Rate—General district—Sporting rights—Arable, meadow, or pasture lands and woodlands—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211.

The lessee of sporting rights over arable, meadow, pasture grounds and woodlands, such rights being let apart from the occupation of the land, is not entitled to be assessed in the proportion of one fourth part only of the net annual value to the general district rate by virtue of sect. 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act 1875.

CASE stated upon a complaint preferred by the appellants against the respondent for a general district rate made the 26th March 1903, at 1s. 11d. in the pound, rateable value 56l., on sporting rights over land.

The respondent rented, and had rented for many years, the shooting over certain lands, being arable, meadow, or pasture land and woodlands, situated within the appellants' jurisdiction.

The rate was properly made and was good on the face of it, and had been duly demanded from the respondent, but the respondent had never been in the habit of paying more than one-fourth thereof. He therefore declined to pay the whole rate, but made a legal tender of one-fourth, which was refused.

In March 1895 the predecessors of the appellants entered a complaint for the recovery from the respondent of the general district rate, but it was decided by the court of summary jurisdiction that the respondent was, under sect. 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act 1875, only liable to be assessed in respect of his right of sporting over the arable, meadow, or pasture ground and woodlands in the proportion of one fourth part only of the net annual value thereof, and that decision had never been questioned or appealed against.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the justices had no jurisdiction, and that, the rate having on its face been duly made, their duties were purely ministerial, and that they were obliged to make an order on the respondent for the full amount.

The justices' attention was called to sect. 256 of the Public Health Act 1875, and to the words "If no sufficient cause for nonpayment be shown, the court may make an order . . ." and also to Reg. v. Barclay and others (Essex Justices); Ex parte Weaver (46 L. T. Rep. 102), and, to the judgment of Cave, J., where he decided that, upon a proceeding before justices to enforce payment of a general district rate, it is competent to the justices to hear objections to the mode of assessment, inasmuch as it affects their right to enforce the rate.

The justices accordingly decided that they had jurisdiction to adjudicate, and they overruled the objection taken by the appellants.

After hearing the parties they decided that the sporting rate on the arable, meadow, or pasture land and woodlands was properly assessable only in the proportion of one fourth part of the net annual value thereof, and, as a legal tender had been made of this fourth part, they refused to make any order on the complaint.

By sect. 211 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) it is provided:

With respect to the assessment and levying of general district rates under this Act the following provision shall have effect—namely, . . . (b) the owner of any tithes, or of any tithe commutation rentcharge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only or as woodlands . . . shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one fourth part only of such net annual value thereof.

Foote, K.C. (Bernard with him) for the appellants.—The question raised here is whether shooting rights over land are an occupation of land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only or as woodlands so as to come within sect. 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act 1875. A right to shoot over land by a person who is not in occupation of the land is merely an incorporeal hereditament, and cannot come within the words of that section:

Eyton v. Mold Overseers, 43 L. T. Rep. 472; 6 Q. B. Div. 13.

The judgment of Field, J. in that case shows the nature of such rights. Until the Rating Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 54), shooting rights as such were not rateable, but by that statute the Poor Rate Acts were extended to rights of fowling and shooting, killing game and rabbits, and fishing when severed from the occupation of land, and when the right of sporting was severed from the occupation and let separately, either the owner or the lessee could be rated. The justices here were wrong in not holding the respondent liable for the whole rate.

M. M. Macnaghten for the respondent.—The sporting rights which the respondent rented were only over arable, meadow, pasture, and woodlands, and so the exemption granted by sect. 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act 1875 applies, and he is only liable to be assessed at one fourth part of the annual value. In order to exercise his right, which is a profit à prendre, he must go on the land, and quâ his right he is in occupation. He referred to Holywell Union v. Halkyn District Mines Drainage Company, 71 L. T. Rep. 818; (1895) A. C. 117.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Mr. Macnaghten is entitled to contend that you cannot exercise a right of shooting without going on the land, but that is a very long way off from showing that the person entitled to the shooting rights is the occupier of the land. When the statutes are looked at the point is clear. Prior to 1874 shooting rights were not rateable, but the Rating Act 1874 extended the Poor Rate Acts to rights of shooting and fishing when severed from the occupation of the land. Therefore a new rateable hereditament was created which was independent of the ordinary occupation of the land, and, by sect. 6 of the Act of 1874, where any right of sporting when severed from the occupation of the land is let, either the owner or the lessee thereof, according as the persons making the rate determine, may be rated as the occupier. That being so, having regard to the provisions of the Rating Act 1874, it could not be contended that the lessee of sporting rights was not liable to be rated. But it is said on behalf of the respondent here that he is entitled to take advantage of sect. 211 (1) (b) of the Public Health Act 1875 because he is the occupier of land used as arable, meadow, pasture ground, or woodlands, because he must go upon them to exercise his right of sporting. The answer, however, to that contention is that the respondent is not the occupier of land used as arable, meadow, pasture ground, or woodlands, but of a special rateable hereditament liable to be rated by the Rating Act 1874. The justices were therefore wrong in allowing a reduction of three-fourths of the net annual value.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the use of the word "occupier" in sect. 6 (2) of the Rating Act 1874 is due to the fact that the greater part of the legislation as to poor rates is based on occupation, and so sporting rights were considered as being occupied. The Public Health Act 1875 deals, however, with the occupation of land, and it is only the person who occupies the land, who gets the benefit of the reduction. The respondent here, however, is the statutory occupier of sporting rights and not the occupier of the land over which those rights exist.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

DUNN (app.) v. HOLT (resp.). (a)

Highway—Wilful obstruction—No obstruction in fact—Truck in street for purpose of cleaning house—Purpose, time, and space reasonable—Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 54.

A truck, 8ft. long by 2ft. 8in. wide, containing an apparatus for removing dust from houses, was placed by D. in a highway 30ft. wide for some hours while the dust was being removed from a certain house. There was no evidence that anyone was incommoded or that anyone was prevented from passing along the highway. It was found as a fact that the business, purpose, and time selected were reasonable, and that neither the time nor the space occupied were excessive, but that the system of cleaning was not necessary to the ordinary comfort or exigency of life and was still in the experimental stage, and that the noise of the apparatus and the collection of sightseers might cause discomfort or inconvenience to the occupiers of houses and people using the street.

Held, that there was no evidence of wilful obstruction within sect. 54 (6) of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47) for wilfully causing an obstruction in a thoroughfare by means of a truck.

On the 21st April, at about 10.30 a.m., the appellant caused a truck to be brought to a public thoroughfare called Trebovir-road, and caused the truck to be placed opposite No. 7 on the carriage-way.

The truck contained an apparatus for removing dust from and cleaning houses and their furniture, carpets, and contents. This apparatus consisted of a motor driven by petrol, which, by creating a vacuum, caused the dust and dirt to pass from the house through indiarubber tubes into a receptacle on the truck.

The indiarubber tubes were passed from the truck over the pavement for foot passengers, but in such a manner and at such a height as not to interfere with any persons using the pavement or carriage-way.

The noise made by the working of the motor was considerable, and not unlikely to frighten horses and prevent persons driving them from passing near.

The appellant was in the employment of the British Vacuum Cleaner Company Limited, the owners of the truck and apparatus, who were employed by the occupier of the house, No. 7, Trebovir-road, to remove the dust and dirt from and clean the house and furniture, carpets, and contents.

The van and apparatus remained opposite the house from 10.30 a.m. till 5.30 p.m., a period of seven hours, which was not a longer time than necessary to remove the dust and dirt into the receptacle on the truck and to clean the house and contents. The dirt and dust were placed in the receptacle on the truck by the process, which went on continuously. The truck and the apparatus and receptacle containing the dust was then driven away.

The carriage-way on which the truck stood was 30ft. wide. The pavement for foot passengers was 10ft. wide. The extreme length of the truck, which stood lengthwise beside the pavement, was 6ft., and the extreme width was 2ft. 8in.

Sufficient width of carriage-way was left to enable vehicles to pass, and there was no evidence that anyone was actually prevented from passing along the street, or that any individual was incommoded.

It was proved that during the period between the 1st June 1903 and the 2nd July 1903, 721 houses in the London area alone had been cleaned by the British Vacuum Cleaner Company in the above manner.

It was contended on the part of the respondent that the acts of the appellant amounted to wilfully causing an obstruction in a thoroughfare by the means specified in sect. 54 (6) of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was not liable to be convicted of the offence with which he was charged, because the facts proved did not show that the appellant did wilfully cause an obstruction or allow the truck to stand longer than was necessary for loading or unloading; that the appellant being employed by the occupier of the house, No. 7, Trebovir-road, for the purpose of removing the dust and dirt from and cleaning the house and contents in a reasonable and proper manner, and having kept the truck in Trebovir-road for no longer time than was reasonably necessary for such purposes, this was a reasonable and proper user of the highway, and the appellant had not wilfully obstructed the thoroughfare within the meaning of the section.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[K.B. Div.]

It was further contended by the appellant that the act of removing the dust and dirt from the house to the receptacle upon the truck by means of the vacuum apparatus was a loading of the dust and dirt upon the truck.

It was further contended upon behalf of the appellant that the obstruction referred to in the section is an actual obstruction rendering the passage through the thoroughfare impossible or troublesome.

It appeared to the magistrate that the acts of the appellant as constituting a voluntary infringement upon the public right of free passage amounted to wilful obstruction within 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54 (6), unless they could be justified as a reasonable temporary appropriation by him of part of the roadway for a reasonable purpose of business, unaccompanied by any unreasonableness in the time chosen for the operations, substantial excess in the time or space occupied by them, existence of undue noise or crowd arising from them, or other elements converting them into a common law nuisance, regard being had to the incidents of everyday life.

In his opinion upon the evidence (1) the business purpose was in itself reasonable; (2) the time selected for the operation was reasonable; (3) neither the time nor space occupied by it was excessive; (4) on the other hand, the system of carpet cleaning involved was in no sense necessary to the ordinary comfort or exigency of life; (5) it is still in the experimental stage, and cannot be regarded as an incident of everyday life; (6) the present noise of the machinery used and the collection of sightseers attracted by the working of it are or may be productive of discomfort and inconvenience to occupants of houses and people using the streets which can scarcely be dismissed as trivial or unsubstantial. He further did not adopt the contention that the removal of dust in the receptacle was a "loading" within the first part of sect. 54 (6), both because the information was founded on the second part of the section and because he thought the removal of the dust was a mere secondary incident in the operations.

On the above grounds he came upon the whole to the conclusion that the appellant had not made out any legal justification for his appropriation of the roadway, and he accordingly convicted him.

By the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 54:

Every person shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 40s. who within the limits of the metropolitan police district shall in any thoroughfare or public place commit any of the following offences; (that is to say) . . . (6) Every person who shall cause any cart, public carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, with or without horses, to stand any longer than may be necessary for loading or unloading, or for taking up or setting down passengers, except hackney carriages standing for hire in any place not forbidden by law, or who by means of any cart, carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, or any horse or other animal shall wilfully interrupt any public crossing, or wilfully cause any obstruction in any thoroughfare.

Danckwerts, K.C. (R. E. Vaughan Williams and D. H. Crompton with him) for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong, for before the magistrate could convict he must find that there was a material obstruction—that is, a common law obstruction:

Original Hartlepool Collieries Company v. Gibb, 36 L. T. Rep. 433; 5 Ch. Div. 713.

Each case must be considered on its merits, and no limit is placed by sect. 54 (6) of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 as to what is a necessary time for loading and unloading. A pantechmicon van might stand outside a house all day and be much more of an obstruction than this truck, but it could not be suggested that proceedings ought to be taken for that. If the use of the highway is reasonable and the space occupied not excessive there can be no offence.

Macmorran, K.C. (Arthur Gill with him) for the respondent.—Everybody has a right to a free and uninterrupted use of the whole of the highway, and it is no answer to say that persons by going round any obstruction could get past. He referred to

Attorney-General v. Brighton and Hove Co-operative Supply Association, 81 L. T. Rep. 762; (1900) 1 Ch. 276;

Horne v. Cadman, 54 L. T. Rep. 421; 16 Cox C. C. 51;

Chelsea Vestry v. Stoddard, 43 J. P. 782.

What the appellant claims here is to practically carry on his business in the highway. The conviction was right and should be affirmed.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think that every case of this kind where a person is summoned for wilfully causing an obstruction to a thoroughfare must depend upon its particular facts, and I have not the least intention of expressing any opinion that people have a right of appropriating a street for the purpose of carrying on their business, or that this company or anybody else have any right to put their machinery in the street anywhere, or that it may not be a wilful obstruction. All I say is that the magistrate seems to me to have stated facts to show that there was no evidence of an offence under this statute. He first finds that nobody was in fact obstructed; he then gives the width of the street, and that some 2ft. 8in. or 2ft. 10in.—I think it is out of a width of 30ft.—were obstructed for some hours in the day. I do not want to deal with this case in detail, which comes from a very experienced magistrate, because he says how he finds. He says he finds the business purpose was in itself reasonable—that is, it was reasonable to have the house cleaned at that time; the time selected for the operation was reasonable; neither the time nor space occupied by it was excessive. On the other hand, the system of carpet cleaning involved was in no sense necessary to the ordinary comfort or exigency of life; it is still in the experimental stage, and cannot be regarded as an incident of everyday life; the present noise of the machinery used and the collection of sightseers attracted by the working of it are or may be productive of discomfort and inconvenience to occupants of houses and people using the streets, &c. It seems to me all those three things might be very material indeed if he was dealing with a case where in fact he was able to say there had been wilful obstruction, or that the people or the road had been wilfully obstructed, but it seems to me, having found as he has that it was a reasonable use and there was no obstruction in fact, that to nullify the effect of those findings by saying that it was experimental or had not become part of the ordinary comfort and exigency of life is applying a test which ought not to be applied. I think that in this case there was no evidence of a wilful obstruction of the highway. I desire to repeat that I do not want anything I say to suggest or indicate that the company have the right of carrying on their business in every highway, or to appropriate any part of the highway independently of the inconvenience caused to other people. I think in this case there was no evidence on which we can properly find that there was wilful obstruction of the highway under sub-sect. 6 of sect. 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act, and I think the appeal should be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I agree.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that it must in each case be a question of degree, and, therefore, in this case, in order that we may do as I concur with my Lord and Wills, J. we ought to do—namely, reverse the decision—let us see whether there was anything to show such circumstances as justify the magistrate finding as he did. I think, from the very fair and full way that the case is stated, we have the means of seeing that there was nothing which ought to have led to this conviction on the facts. The learned magistrate has given us some reasons which do not, I confess, seem to be applicable. I do not think the noise of the machinery used, so as to possibly cause discomfort and inconvenience to occupants of neighbouring houses, is an obstruction of a highway, or is an element of the obstruction of a highway. Of course, if it causes a crowd, it would be otherwise. So, in the same way, I do not think it is very relevant to consider that the system of carpet cleaning involved is not necessary to the ordinary comfort or exigency of life. If that is to be considered, it is prohibitive of every new invention of the same kind, if there could be any justification to bring machinery there to clean carpets. It must be a matter of degree to justify a conviction for wilful obstruction of a highway, and when it is said by Mr. Macmorran in his argument that a trader has not got a right to use the streets for part of his trade, in a degree we all know, living, as we have to live, in a city, and making reasonable allowance for reasonable conduct, that there are people who, in selling things, do pass their trucks, I should think, down every street in London, certainly in the west of London, and, if they do not stop too long, I do not think you should condemn them because while a customer comes to them they are using the street for their trade. This is a big machine and a novel one, and might be a nuisance if used differently to the way in which the magistrate has stated it has been used on this occasion in this place.

Appeal allowed.

MOUNT LYTELL MINING AND RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a)

Revenue—Stamp duty—Company—English debenture—Colonial debenture—Substituted security—Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), schedule, "Marketable security" (3) (4); s. 82.

A colonial company was formed for the purpose of taking over the assets and liabilities of an English company, and by agreement the holders of debentures in the English company delivered them up, and accepted in lieu thereof debentures of an equivalent amount in the colonial company.

Held, that these debentures in the colonial company were not "given in substitution for a like security" within the Stamp Act 1891, schedule, "Marketable security" (4).

CASE stated by Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

In 1899 the North Mount Lyell Copper Company Limited (hereinafter called the North Company), being a company registered under the Companies Acts 1862 to 1893, issued under the seal of the company a series of debentures of varying amounts, whereby they promised to pay to bearer, or, when registered, to the registered holder, the respective amounts thereof.

In order to secure such debentures a trust deed was on the 7th Dec. 1898 executed between the North Company of the one part and General Sir Hugh Gough and William Jacks (as trustees for the debenture-holders) of the other part, containing the conditions usual in such trust deeds.

By an agreement, dated the 22nd May 1903, made between a company called the Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Company Limited (being a company registered under the laws of the State of Victoria) of the one part and the North Company of the other part it was provided that a new company should be incorporated to take over the assets and liabilities of the companies parties thereto, including the liability of the North Company to the debenture-holders, to whom debentures in the new company were to be given as therein provided.

By a subsidiary agreement, dated the 18th June 1903, made between Daniel James Mackay (on behalf of all the holders of the outstanding debentures of the North Company) of the one part and the North Company of the other part, it was (amongst other things) provided that every holder of debentures of the North Company should deliver up the debentures held by him and accept in lieu thereof debentures of an equivalent amount in the new company to be formed as aforesaid; such debentures were to be framed and secured as therein mentioned, and by clause 5 the delivery of such substituted debentures was to be accepted in satisfaction of the liability of the North Company to him under the debenture trust deed and debentures.

By an agreement dated the 6th Aug. 1903, and made between the aforesaid Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Company Limited, of the State of Victoria, of the first part, the North Company of the second part, and Alfred Mellor, on behalf of a new company which it was contemplated should be formed under the laws of the State of Victoria, under the style of the Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Company Limited (the appellant company) of the third part, it was agreed to sell the respective undertakings of the old companies to the appellant company when incorporated, and as to the assets of the said North Company subject to the existing mortgage debentures to be satisfied by the issue of debentures of the appellant company as therein provided.

On the 11th Aug. 1903 the appellant company was duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Victoria, in the Commonwealth of Australia, and by deed of that date it duly adopted under seal the last-mentioned agreement.

A holder of one of the above-mentioned debentures issued by the North Company surrendered such debenture at the office of the appellant company in London, and in lieu thereof received the debenture under the seal of the appellant company which is the subject of adjudication. In accepting such new debenture he acted under the agreement of the 18th June 1903, and he thereby released and gave up all right against the North Company and all rights in respect of the first-mentioned debenture.

The appellant company contended that the instrument in question falls to be charged only with substituted security duty at the rate of 6d. for every 20l. thereof.

The commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument in question was a marketable security, being a security transferable by delivery, and bearing date after the 6th Aug. 1885, by reference to the heading "Marketable Security" sub-head (3) in the first schedule to the Stamp Act 1891, and that it was not within the fourth sub-head of that heading, assessed the duty at 1s. for every 10l. and for every fractional part of 10l. of the money thereby secured—in all, 11s.

By the Stamp Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), schedule, "Marketable security":

(3) Marketable security (except a colonial Government security) being a security transferable by delivery and bearing date or signed or offered for subscription after the 6th August 1885. For every 10l., and also for any fractional part of 10l., of the money thereby secured, 1s. (4) Marketable security (except a colonial Government security) being such security as last aforesaid given in substitution for a like security duly stamped in conformity with the law in force at the time when it became subject to duty. For every 20l., and also for any fractional part of 20l., of the money thereby secured, 6d.

And by sect. 82:

(1) Marketable securities for the purpose of the charge of duty thereon include (a) a marketable security by or on behalf of any company or body of persons corporate or unincorporate formed or established in the United Kingdom; and (b) a marketable security by or on behalf of any foreign State or Government or foreign or colonial or municipal body, corporation, or company (hereinafter called a foreign security) bearing date or signed after the 3rd day of June 1862—(i.) Which is made or issued in the United Kingdom; or (ii.) which though originally issued out of the United Kingdom has been after the 6th Aug. 1885 or is offered for subscription and given or delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom; or (iii.) which, the interest thereon being payable in the United Kingdom, is assigned, transferred, or in any manner negotiated in the United Kingdom; (c) a marketable security by or on behalf of any colonial Government which if the borrower were a foreign Government would be a foreign security (hereinafter called a colonial Government security).

W. F. Hamilton, K.C. and E. J. Elgood for the appellants.—The debenture in question was "given in substitution for a like security"—that is, given in lieu of or in place of. The security need not be in the same company, but the words "in substitution" are used in the same sense as they are used in sect. 1 of the Stamp Act 1891, which says that the duties to be charged are to be in substitution for those heretofore chargeable. The new security takes the place of the old one, and so must be in substitution. This case is very different to City of London Brewery Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (79 L. T. Rep. 648; (1899) 1 Q. B. 121), for there the old security still existed, and it could not be said that the new one was in substitution.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) and Rowlatt for the respondents.—This in one sense may be a security given in substitution, but it cannot be said that a colonial security given for an English security is a security given in substitution for a like security. It is a new security, for there is a new debtor. It is a novation, not a substitution. Sect. 82 of the Stamp Act 1891 shows a difference is drawn by the statute between an English and a colonial marketable security. The appellants desire to read "given in substitution" as "taken in substitution."

W. F. Hamilton, K.C. in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I am not at all anxious to decide questions which I think I have not necessarily to decide. There are some portions of the Attorney-General's argument which I confess I am not prepared to accept without further consideration. They may be correct. It may be that I personally have formed an altogether erroneous view of what is meant by "substitution" in the Stamp Act 1891. I gave my opinion once before in one of these cases—City of London Brewery Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (sup.)—and I was corrected by the Court of Appeal. I confess I do not understand fully the grounds of that decision. I understand one of the grounds, but the other one I do not quite understand, so it may be I take an erroneous view of the matter. Consequently I do not propose to decide or say anything one way or the other about one of the points that the Attorney-General has raised, and which he says will govern a great many cases—namely, as to the distinction between giving and taking in substitution. I think I have to look at the exact wording of this schedule, and it is, "Marketable security except a colonial Government security being such security as last aforesaid given in substitution for a like security." The points that I do not feel sure about are that there is any "giving in substitution" and "taking in substitution," and so on. Those are the points, and I give no decision one way or the other. But it must be for a "like security" duly stamped, and it seems to me that "like security," occurring where it does in the schedule to this Stamp Act, means "for a security which is like this one for the purpose of stamping." When, however, you see that one of these is a debenture of an English company and the other of a colonial company, and that under sect. 82 of the Stamp Act, although when stampable may be stamped with the same amount of stamp, yet nevertheless the considerations under which they become liable to a stamp are not the same, it seems to me that there is a difficulty in holding that the one security is a like security with the other for stamp purposes. On that ground I think I must hold that this is not a substituted security. I say nothing about the other points one way or another.

Revenue—Estate duty—Settlement estate duty—Precatory trust—Letter with wishes of testator—Finance Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (c), 5 (1).

N. C., by his will dated the 13th Dec. 1901, devised and bequeathed all his estate and effects of every description to his brother, C. T. C., absolutely, and he appointed his said brother, H. J. M., and C. G. executors and trustees of his will.

On the 11th Jan. 1902 N. C. signed a document or letter (which has not been admitted to probate) which was headed: "Instructions to my executors Crawford, Morgan, and Gasquet.—Dear Brother Crawford (I dictated this to Gasquet).—Like many others who have gone before me, I have failed to make provision for the distribution of my property amongst my relatives and friends before it became too late to do it with care. For this reason I have left all my estate to you in the fullest reliance that you will, as far as possible and to the uttermost, carry out any wish that I may express in writing now or later, or which may be conveyed to you verbally by Gasquet or my good-hearted cousin Henry. I have made a settlement on P. D. which should suffice for him in the struggle of life which we all have to face. As regards our family, you will be the best judge how and when a suitable distribution should be made. I do not fetter your discretion in any way. You are an old man, and therefore do not delay the distribution." And then followed directions as to the disposal of certain property and amounts to be paid to certain persons. The document concluded: "Finally, these are the instructions referred to in my will. They are not in any way to fetter Crawford, and may probably be added to if I am spared, or I may carry some out in my own lifetime."

A copy of this document was sent to C. T. C., who, on the 14th Jan. 1902, wrote to C. G. a letter in which he said: "All I wish to say now is that every wish expressed by my brother shall be carried out to the very fullest extent so far as I am concerned, and as far as all we three executors are concerned, for his wishes are sacred, every word."

The effect of this letter was communicated to N. C. N. C. died on the 18th Feb. 1902, and his will was proved by all the executors, and estate duty and legacy duty was paid on his estate, including sums given or settled by the testator within twelve months of his death.

C. T. C. took possession as beneficial owner of the residuary personal estate and of the freehold and leasehold estate of N. C., and he made on the 13th May 1902 (within twelve months next before his death) a settlement of 5000l. on each of his four nephews and nieces. C. T. C. also gave and paid other sums to various persons in accordance with the instructions in the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902.

C. T. C. died on the 13th Dec. 1902.

Held, that no trust was created, and that the settlement of 5000l. so made was a gift made by C. T. C. within twelve months of his death, and so estate duty and settlement estate duty were payable in respect thereof.

INFORMATION.

Field-Marshal Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain, G.C.B., G.C.S.I., of Lordswood, near Southampton, by his will, dated the 13th Dec. 1901, devised and bequeathed all his estate and effects of every description to his brother, General Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, his heirs, executors, and administrators, absolutely, but if he should die in the lifetime of the testator, or become from any reason incapable of managing his affairs (the decision of the testator's executors thereon, or that of a majority, to be final), the testator directed his executors to hold his estate and effects upon such trusts as he should at any time make known to them, and the testator appointed his brother Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, Henry John Morgan, and Charles Gasquet executors and trustees of his will.

On the 11th Jan. 1902 the testator signed the following document or letter (which has not been admitted to probate):

Instructions to my executors Crawford, Morgan, and Gasquet.—Dear Brother Crawford (I dictated this to Gasquet).—(1) Like many others who have gone before me, I have failed to make provision for the distribution of my property amongst my relatives and friends before it has become too late to do it with care. For this reason I have left all my estate to you in the fullest reliance that you will as far as possible and to the uttermost carry out any wish that I may express in writing now or later, or which may be conveyed to you verbally by Gasquet or my good-hearted cousin Henry. I have made a settlement on P. D. which should suffice for him in the struggle of life which we all have to face. As regards our family, you will be the best judge how and when a suitable distribution should be made. I do not fetter your discretion in any way. You are an old man, and therefore do not delay the distribution. I should like you to prefer those who are least likely to be well off. Keep, of course, anything for yourself. As Sir Henry Chamberlain is what is usually called the head of the family and is not well off, I should like him to have 2000l. It may be desirable to tie up Hetty's share. (10) To the School for Officers' Daughters, I. Finally, these are the instructions referred to in my will. They are not in any way to fetter Crawford, and may probably be added to if I am spared, or I may carry some out in my own lifetime.—Lordeswood, January 11, 1902.—(Signed) NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN.

A copy of this document or letter was sent to Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, who wrote the following letter to the defendant Charles Gasquet:

Villa des Chameropa, Cannes, 14th January 1902.—Dear Mr. Gasquet,—Last evening I received from Henry Morgan a copy of the letter addressed to me by my brother, dictated by him. H. M. asks me to acknowledge it to yourself, and to make any suggestions. All I wish to say now is that every wish expressed by my brother shall be carried out to the very fullest extent so far as I am concerned, and as far as we all three executors are concerned, for his wishes are sacred, every word. Ill as I fear he is, I hope and pray that he may yet be spared and recover, and that it may be long ere a will shall be useful. He has, I am sure, suffered awfully, and it has been great pain to me not to be able to go to him as my heart longs to do. Lady C. is in very delicate health and a great invalid at present, and, unless Sir Neville's condition was such as to make my travelling at this season a necessity, I am hardly justified in running the risk, for I am under a doctor's hands just now, but nothing very special. Please do not let Sir N. know this if you feel it right to let him know you have heard from me of my acceptance to the very fullest of the trust he has reposed in me.—With every good wish to yourself, yours sincerely (sd.) C. T. CHAMBERLAIN.

The effect of the foregoing letter of the 14th Jan. 1902 was communicated (so far as the writer desired it should be) to the testator, Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain.

After the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902 the testator verbally expressed some further wishes or "instructions" to the defendant Charles Gasquet to the following effect—viz.:

The nurse to have 5*l.*; the poor woman named Bettridge to have 5*l.*; the clergyman to have 25*l.* for the funeral service; his medals to be kept together; the groom to have 20*l.* instead of 15*l.*; various publications of a political character to be given to the Liberal Association at Southampton; various friends to have small remembrances of him; and Mr. Basil Chamberlain's share and Mr. Houston Chamberlain's share to revert to the family.

He also made the following gifts for charitable purposes mentioned in the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902—viz.:

250*l.* to the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, for a new organ; 1000*l.* to the South Hants and Southampton Hospital; 1000*l.* to the Southampton Jubilee Nurses' Institute; 1000*l.* to the British and Foreign Unitarian Society.

Estate duty has been paid on these gifts as having been made within twelve months of the testator's death.

The testator, Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain, died on the 18th Feb. 1902, and his will, dated the 13th Dec. 1901, was proved by all the executors in the Principal Registry of the Probate Division of the High Court on the 11th March 1902. The testator left personal property valued at 88,525*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, and real and leasehold property valued at 4180*l.* Estate duty at 6 per cent. was paid on an amount exceeding 100,000*l.*, including sums given or settled by the testator within twelve months of his death.

On the 16th June 1902 the executors paid 2326*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* for legacy duty at 3 per cent. and interest on 77,449*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, the value of the testator's residuary personal estate after deducting estate duty, debts, funeral expenses, and expenses of administration.

The declaration by the executors at foot of the residuary account stated the sum of 77,449*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* as being the whole of the residue and moneys which "we intend to retain for the use of Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, G.C.I.E., C.S.I., being a brother of the deceased."

On the 16th June 1902 the executors also paid 122*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.* for succession duty (less discount) at 3 per cent. on 4180*l.*, the value of the real and leasehold property of the testator, stating by their declaration (at foot of the succession duty account).

That this is a just and true account of all the succession in real and leasehold property of General Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, G.C.I.E., C.S.I., upon the death of the before-named Field-Marshal Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain and that the General Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain is a brother of Field-Marshal Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain, the predecessor, from whom the property is derived.

The testator died a widower without issue. His father left issue by two marriages. Sir Henry Chamberlain, referred to in the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902, is a grandson of one of the testator's half-brothers.

At the date of the testator's will Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain was his only surviving brother and Mrs. Guthrie was his only surviving sister, both of them being of the whole blood. There were living five children of deceased brothers of the testator of the whole blood—viz., Basil Hall Chamberlain, the defendant Henry Chamberlain, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, and Harriet Sarah Chamberlain (children of testator's brother William Chamberlain), and Neville Francis Fitzgerald Chamberlain, a child of testator's brother Charles Chamberlain.

Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain took possession as beneficial owner of the residuary personal estate and of the freehold and leasehold estate of Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain, and he made (within twelve months next before his death) a settlement of 5000*l.* on each of his four nephews and niece in manner hereinafter mentioned.

The defendants alleged that the nephews and niece were told by or by the direction of Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, that these sums were gifts to them from Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHAMBERLAIN AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain also gave to Henry John Morgan (a first cousin of himself and of Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain) the sum of 5000*l.*, and to Sir Henry Chamberlain 2000*l.*; and he purchased an annuity of 30*l.* for Mary Stubbings, and Miss Helena Gambier 300*l.*, Miss Mabel Gambier 50*l.*, Meta Young 50*l.*, and Grace Hanwell 50*l.* He also paid to Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain's servants the amounts mentioned in the letter of the 11th Jan. 1902, and 1000*l.* to the British and Foreign Unitarian Society.

The settlements by Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain of 5000*l.* each on his four nephews and niece were made (except the settlement of Basil Hall Chamberlain, which was by agreement not under seal) by deeds all substantially in the same form and containing similar recitals. The settlement on the defendant Henry Chamberlain was made by an indenture dated the 13th May 1902, and between Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain of the first part, the defendant Henry Chamberlain of the second part, and the defendants Henry Chamberlain, Joseph Horace Noble, Henry Seymour Chamberlain, and Charles Gasquet of the third part, whereby, after reciting that Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain, being desirous of making such settlements in favour of the defendant Henry Chamberlain or his issue as is hereinafter contained, had recently paid the sum of 5000*l.* to the defendants Henry Chamberlain, Joseph Horace Noble, Henry Seymour Chamberlain, and Charles Gasquet, to the intent that the same should be held by them upon the trusts hereinafter declared, it was witnessed that, in pursuance of such desire and in consideration of the natural love and affection of Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain for his nephew, the defendant Henry Chamberlain, it was declared by the parties thereto that the defendants Henry Chamberlain, Joseph Horace Noble, Henry Seymour Chamberlain, and Charles Gasquet should invest the sum (after payment of certain costs) as therein mentioned, with power to vary investments, and should pay the income of the trust funds to the defendant Henry Chamberlain during his life, provided that if he should become bankrupt or should assign or charge the income or part thereof, or some other event should happen whereby such income if belonging to him would become vested in or charged in favour of some other person, the trustees should during the remainder of his life pay or apply all or any part of the income unto or for the personal support or benefit of all or any one or more of the following persons, viz., the defendant Henry Chamberlain, his wife and children, if any, and the persons for the time being interested in the trust funds under the trusts thereafter declared as the trustees should in their absolute discretion think proper; and subject to such discretionary trust should during such remainder of the life of the defendant Henry Chamberlain hold the income upon the trusts upon which the same would be held under the now stating indenture if the defendant Henry Chamberlain were then dead; and after his death should stand possessed of the trust funds in trust for the children or remoter issue of the defendant Henry Chamberlain as he should by deed or will appoint; and in default of appointment in trust for his children who being sons should attain twenty-one, or being daughters should attain that age or marry, in equal shares, and in default of children attaining a vested interest in trust for the defendant Henry Chamberlain absolutely, and the settlement contained a power for Henry Chamberlain to appoint a life interest in the trust funds to any widow who might survive him.

The sum of 5000*l.* was paid by Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain to the defendants as trustees of the last-mentioned settlement on or about the date thereof, and the investments representing the sum are now in their possession.

Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain by his will dated the 20th Oct. 1902, after making various specific and other gifts, devised and bequeathed all his real and residuary personal estate to his wife upon trust that she or other the trustees of his will should convert the same into money and should stand possessed of the proceeds (charged with an annuity of 200*l.*) in trust for his wife during her life, and after the death of his wife in trust for such of the four nephews and niece, Neville Francis Fitzgerald Chamberlain, Basil Hall Chamberlain, Henry Chamberlain, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, and Harriet Sarah Chamberlain, as should be living at the death of the survivor of the testator and his wife in equal shares with certain provisions for settlement of the shares of his niece and of Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain died on the 13th Dec. 1902, and his will was proved by his widow and executrix in the Principal Registry of the Probate Division of the High Court on the 9th Jan. 1903. Estate duty has been paid in respect of real and personal estate of the value of about 60,000*l.*, the greater part of which consisted of property derived by him under the will of Sir Neville Bowles Chamberlain.

Under the circumstances aforesaid it was claimed that estate duty and settlement estate duty under the Finance Act 1894, ss. 1, 2 (1) (c), and 5 (1), became payable on the property (namely, the sum of 5000*l.* or investments representing the same) comprised in the settlement of the 13th May 1902 as property passing on the death of Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain within the meaning of the Act.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue applied to the defendants for an account and payment of such duties, but the defendants have refused and still refuse to pay the duties, and contend that no such duties are payable.

The Attorney-General, on behalf of His Majesty, prayed that it might be declared that on the death of Sir Crawford Trotter Chamberlain estate duty and settlement estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act 1894 in respect of the principal value of the property comprised in the indenture of settlement of the 13th May 1902 as property passing on his death under the settlement within the meaning of the Act, and that the defendants are accountable for such duties accordingly.

By the Finance Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 1:

In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person a duty called "estate duty" at the graduated rates hereinafter mentioned, and the existing duties mentioned in the first schedule to this Act shall not be levied in respect of property chargeable with such estate duty.

And by sect. 2:

(1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following—that is to say, . . . (c) Property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under sect. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), as amended by sect. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property and the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily" and a reference to a "volunteer" were omitted therefrom.

By sect. 5:

(1) Where property in respect of which estate duty is leviable is settled by will of the deceased or having been settled by some other disposition passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property—(a) a further estate duty (called settlement estate duty) on the principal value of the settled property shall be levied at the rate hereinafter specified, except where the only life interest in the property after the death of the deceased is that of a wife or husband of the deceased; but (b) during the continuance of the settlement estate duty shall not be payable more than once.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12), s. 38:

(1) Stamp duties at the like rates as are by this Act charged on affidavits and inventories shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or movable property to be included therein according to the value thereof. (2) The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following description, viz.: (a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causa made by any person dying on or after the 1st June 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased. (b) Any property which a person dying on or after such a day, having been absolutely entitled thereto, has voluntarily caused, or may voluntarily cause, to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person jointly, whether by disposition or otherwise, so that the beneficial interest therein or in some part thereof passes or accrues by survivorship on his death to such other person. (c) Any property passing under any past or future voluntary settlement made by any person dying on or after such day by deed or any other instrument not taking effect as a will whereby an interest in such property for life or any other period determinable by reference to death is reserved, either expressly or by implication to the settlor, or whereby the settlor may have reserved to himself the right, by the exercise of any power to restore to himself, or to reclaim the absolute interest in such property.

By the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), s. 11:

(1) Sub-sect. 2 of sect. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12) is hereby amended as follows: The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word "twelve" were substituted for the word "three" therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforth retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise. The description of property marked (b) shall be construed as if the expression "to be transferred to or vested in himself and any other person" included also any purchase or investment effected by the person who was absolutely entitled to the property either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person. The description of the property marked (c) shall be construed as if the expression "voluntary settlement" included any trust, whether expressed in writing or otherwise, in favour of a volunteer, and if contained in a deed or other instrument effecting the settlement, whether such deed or other instrument was made for valuable consideration or not as between the settlor and any other person, and as if the expression "such property" wherever the same occurs, included the proceeds of sale thereof. The charge under the said section shall extend to money received under a policy of assurance effected by any person dying on or after the 1st June 1889 on his life where the policy is wholly kept up by him for the benefit of a donee, whether nominee or assignee, or a part of such money in proportion to the premiums paid by him where the policy is partially kept up by him for such benefit.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.—The defendants say that a trust was created here, but we contend that there was no trust. In order to constitute a trust the request, or whatever it is, must come to the notice of the devisee and be assented to by such devisee. The document in question was communicated to an executor to be sent to the devisee, and the acceptance, if it can be so called, was addressed to an executor. In the dictated letter Sir Neville Chamberlain says: "I do not fetter your discretion in any way." Lord Langdale in Knight v. Knight (3 Beav. 148; 52 R. R. 74) says, at p. 172: "As a general rule, it has been laid down that when property is given absolutely to any person and the same person is by the giver who has power to command recommended or entreated or wished to dispose of that property in favour of another, the recommendation, entreaty, or wish shall be held to create a trust, first if the words are so used that upon the whole they ought to be construed as imperative; secondly, if the subject of the recommendation or wish be certain; and thirdly, if the objects or persons intended to have the benefit of the recommendation or wish be also certain. . . . On the other hand, if the giver accompanies his expression of wish or request by other words from which it is to be collected that he did not intend the wish to be imperative; or if it appears from the context that the first taker was intended to have a discretionary power to withdraw any part of the subjects from the object of the wish or request; or if the objects are not such as may be ascertained with sufficient certainty, it has been held that no trust is created. Thus the words 'free and unfettered' accompanying the strongest expression of request were held to prevent the words of the request being imperative. Any words by which it is expressed or from which it may be implied that the first taker may apply any part of the subject to his own use are held to prevent the subject of the gift from being considered certain; and a vague description of the object—that is, a description by which the giver neither clearly defines the object himself nor names a distinct class out of which the first taker is to select, or which leaves it doubtful what interest the object or class of objects is to take—will prevent the objects from being certain within the meaning of the rule." They also referred to White and Tudor's Lead. Cas., 7th edit., vol. 2, p. 337 et seq.

All these wishes of Sir Neville Chamberlain are in the letter and not in the will. There is nothing here to create a precatory trust. There is an absolute gift to Sir Crawford Chamberlain, and the document or letter of the 11th Jan. 1902 creates no trust. They referred to Re Hanbury; Hanbury v. Fisher, 90 L. T. Rep. 66; (1904) 1 Ch. 415.

The defendants here must show an enforceable trust. The deeds of May 1902, under which the defendants take, are made by Sir Crawford Chamberlain as beneficial owner of the property of Sir Neville Chamberlain. There is no recital of the trust, and the consideration is natural love and affection. They referred to Finance Act 1894 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 30), s. 2 (1) (c).

An executor may make a gift even although he is an executor. In Stead v. Mellor (36 L. T. Rep. 498; 5 Ch. Div. 225) a testatrix gave all her personal estate to trustees upon trust, after payment of certain expenses, debts, and legacies, to hold the residue "in trust for such of my nieces A. and B. as shall be living at my death, my desire being that they shall distribute such residue as they think will be most agreeable to my wishes." A. and B. having survived the testatrix, it was held that they took the residue for their own benefit. They also referred to Haldane, K.C., Jenkins, K.C., and K. G. Metcalfe for the defendants.—If there is an intention to create a trust which fails, but the donee is only to take "on trust," then the donee holds for the next of kin or the heir-at-law. If the donee takes on a precatory trust which fails, then he takes absolutely. Sir Crawford Chamberlain was a trustee with a special power to select the beneficiaries. What he did was only done as trustee and in execution of that special power. The Crown to succeed must show that Sir Crawford Chamberlain had a beneficial interest. The words "in the fullest reliance" show that it was intended to create a trust. They referred to

The Attorney-General in reply.—In Meredith v. Heneage (1 Sim. 542; 10 Price, 306; 27 R. R. 243) a testator, after giving his real and personal estate to his wife in fee, said that he had so given the same to her unfettered and unlimited in full confidence that in her future disposition thereof she would distinguish the heirs of his late father by devising the whole of his estate together and entire to such of his father's heirs as she might think best deserved her preference, and this was held to create no trust. He also referred to Sullivan v. Sullivan, (1903) 1 Ir. Rep. 193 Ch.

CHANNELL, J.—I have not been encouraged by the authority that the Attorney-General quoted to me, which tells me this is about one of the most embarrassing questions that any judge can have to deal with; but, having had the opportunity of looking into, at any rate, one of these cases and considering this matter and having had the advantage of an admirably clear argument on both sides, I think it is better to dispose of it at once rather than take any time to consider and possibly be further embarrassed by the contradictory expressions which probably are to be found both in the authorities and in the different expressions of recommendation, or desire, or trust, or whatever else there may be in the various letters and documents in the cases. I think I have now the principles pretty fairly in my mind. Duty is claimed here on the ground that this settlement of the 5000*l.* was a gift, and I suppose the real question I have to consider is whether that settlement was made at a time when the settlor was under an enforceable obligation either to make that settlement or in some other way to execute the trusts which are alleged to have been imposed upon him. I have to decide that question in a different way and with less material than a court would generally have. It is quite clear that if there was any trust at all, any binding enforceable obligation, it was created not by the will or even by the letter of the testator alone, but by the assent to it which was given by Sir Crawford Chamberlain in his letter of the 14th Jan. Where the obligation arises in that way by assent given by the donee, it is clearly explained by the Lord Chancellor and by Lord Westbury in McCormick v. Grogan (L. Rep. 4 H. L. 82) that the ground of the jurisdiction is to prevent something in the nature of fraud; that when a donee has assented to certain directions, and communicated his assent to the testator, and thereupon the testator has either made a testamentary instrument or allowed to stand a testamentary instrument previously made, to depart from that would be something in the nature of fraud. If that is, as it obviously is, the ground upon which the court could enforce an obligation so incurred, it follows that in the ordinary way the court would have before it, when considering whether the particular man was committing either a fraud or something in the nature of a fraud, the circumstances of the refusal to perform the obligation, and would know what he was doing or proposing to do, and would judge whether or not that came within this jurisdiction to prevent frauds or things in the nature of fraud. But here I have not anything of the sort, because Sir Crawford Chamberlain desired from the first to comply with this obligation, whether it was merely a moral obligation or an enforceable obligation or not. He was doing his best, and I think he did throughout comply with the obligation, if there was one. The only thing that has been suggested in any way in reference to his deviating in fact from what he was requested or directed, as the case may be, to do, is that it is suggested possibly he appropriated to himself somewhat more than he ought to have done of the property of which he was entitled certainly to appropriate to himself some part. I do not think he even did that. It seems he more or less appropriated to himself and to his wife, for a time at any rate, about half of the property, but, even as to that half, the largest portion of it, at any rate, eventually went back after his wife's death, under his disposition of the property, to what would be the family of the Chamberlains—that is, of himself and his brother Sir Neville Chamberlain. Therefore I do not think there is the slightest ground for thinking that Sir Crawford Chamberlain did not absolutely comply in fact with this obligation, whether it was a moral obligation or only an enforceable obligation. Then there was a suggestion by Mr. Jenkins, I think, that it is a little hard upon the parties taking under this settlement if they have to pay this duty, because they would practically be paying it twice over. Where the question depends upon the construction of the Taxing Act of Parliament, it may be material to consider whether a particular construction inflicts hardship or inflicts what some constructions sometimes do, a duty twice over. But where it depends upon the facts, of course it is not material. The amount of duty that people have to pay when they get benefits from their deceased relations or friends depends upon what may be called an accident as to the mode in which they take it. Sometimes it is more, and sometimes it is less. Here the whole question is as to the mode in which these beneficiaries take. It happens not to make a very great deal of difference in this case. If the provisions which are suggested to be obligatory had been inserted in Sir Neville Chamberlain's will, the Crown would have taken the same duty as they have already had, because it happens that all parties are chargeable with a 3 per cent. duty. But whether the incidence of it would be the same would depend upon whether the 5000*l.* had been given free of duty or not. If it had been given free of duty, the duty would have fallen where it has fallen in the present case, upon the person in the position of residuary legatee; but, if not, it would have fallen upon the parties taking this 5000*l.* There are all sorts of things you cannot tell anything about in reference to that. Passing on to what is the real question, I think it must be put in this way: Whether this alleged obligation was enforceable at the time when this settlement was made. As I pointed out, there being no refusal in fact, I have not before me the circumstances of any refusal so as to judge whether it was fraudulent. I think what I have to consider is this: If at the time when Sir Crawford Chamberlain in fact made this settlement he had said, "I have been acting upon these directions up to the present time, but I consider I am only under a moral obligation to do it, at the outside; I have changed my mind; I have determined not to act upon them any more, and I propose to give the whole property away to some charity," or some person who was not in any sense the object of the bounty of Sir Neville Chamberlain, could the Court of Chancery either at the instance of Mr. Henry Chamberlain, who takes under this settlement, or any other member of the family, have granted any kind of order, either for an injunction to restrain him from so acting, or an order compelling him to execute the trusts, or anything of that kind? I think that is the question I have to consider and deal with. That depends upon the construction of the whole of the three documents. I leave out, because it does not add to it, the verbal instructions given, which, though they come in, do not affect the question really. The three documents are the will, the dictated letter of the 11th Jan., and the letter of Sir Crawford of the 14th Jan. The obligation, if there was one, of course arises from the letter of the 14th Jan., which says in substance, "I will carry out the wishes to the very fullest extent." But if there is in the other document of the 11th Jan. an express reservation of a full direction to Sir Crawford Chamberlain to carry the suggestions out or not, then the assent must be interpreted with reference to that, and it is just as if Sir Crawford Chamberlain had said, "I will carry out your wishes, but I understand those wishes to be that I may have a power, if I think fit, of not acting upon them according to circumstances, and it is upon that condition and in that view that I accept and tell you that I propose to carry out your wishes." Of course if that had been said, there is no binding obligation to do anything in point of fact, and the question, therefore, although the obligation is created by the letter of the 14th, depends really upon what is the true interpretation of the document of the 11th. That document of the 11th Jan. I think you must also construe in reference to the will which had been made a short time previously. It is true that the actual terms of that will do not appear, so far as I know, to have been known to Sir Crawford Chamberlain at the time he wrote his letter, but the general effect of the will was undoubtedly known, and the will is, in point of fact, referred to in the latter part of the letter of the 11th Jan. Therefore those two documents, it seems to me, have to be construed together. The letter of the 11th Jan., if you read part of it alone, is undoubtedly capable of creating a binding obligation. There are words in it which, according to the cases, would be amply sufficient, but a difficulty arises, and the whole question arises, about certain other words which come in. I will deal first with the words that would create the obligation. If we had simply the paragraph in the case, "I have left all my estate to you in the fullest reliance that you will, as far as possible and to the utmost, carry out any wish that I may express in writing now or later, or which may be conveyed to you verbally by Gasquet," and so on, and had gone on at the end of that sentence with, "I wish to be cremated and my remains interred. I wish the following amounts to be paid to my servants," and all those numbered things down to "to the School for Officers' Daughters, 1*l.*" (of course, the blank pounds would have made that inoperative)—if the thing had stood in that way I do not think there could be a possible doubt that within the cases it would have been a binding obligation. But there is the passage, which I have omitted, in reference to the family, and the passage at the end which I have also omitted. They are the two passages which make the difference. I think, when you have to consider those passages, you have to refer back to the will. Mr. Jenkins in his very clear argument has put a perfectly intelligible view of these two doubtful and difficult passages. He admits, quite frankly, that if the final passage, "Finally, these are the instructions referred to in my will. They are not in any way to fetter Crawford," relates to the whole of the document, then it prevents there being any binding obligation; but he suggests,

K.B. Div.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHAMBERLAIN AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

K.B. Div.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CHAMBERLAIN AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

and it is a perfectly plausible suggestion, that that passage refers back to the previous passage in which there has been said, "I do not fetter your discretion in any way." I do not think, for reasons which I will explain presently, that it is the correct view, but it is a perfectly possible one. It throws us back upon the consideration of the other passage which makes the difficulty: "I have made a settlement on P. D. which should suffice for him in the struggle of life we all have to face." That is information given in order to explain that there will not be any necessity for providing for P. D. "As regards our family," that I read as meaning "our own family," as this is from one brother to another, and as the gentleman who was writing it had no children and no wife their family would be the same. Whether the wife would come in with the "family" appears to be a doubtful question; but I think I could decide that, if I had to decide it. "As regards our family," under the circumstances clearly means the family of the two brothers. "As regards our family, you will be the best judge how and when a suitable distribution should be made. I do not fetter your discretion in any way. You are an old man, and therefore do not delay the distribution." That is a reference to a passage which has gone before which I will read directly. "I should like to prefer those who are least likely to be well off. Keep, of course, anything for yourself. As Sir Henry Chamberlain is what is usually called the head of the family and is not well off, I should like him to have 2000*l*. It may be desirable to tie up Hetty's share." Now, the question is whether those are suggestions made to the brother who is to have the absolute property for himself as to how he should when he dies dispose of it, or whether it is intended to be a binding obligation to distribute this property, which in that event would mean the residue of the property after giving specific amounts which are afterwards mentioned amongst a class, including in that class the donee himself—"Keep, of course, anything for yourself"—with an absolute discretion as to the amount of the shares and an absolute discretion as to the particular individuals who are to be given something as members of the family, but still a binding obligation not to give the property away from the class. I do not say it is impossible that the words could have that meaning. The thing is quite intelligible, and the words might have that meaning. But I think there is a difficulty in those words alone, even if one does not look at the other circumstances, and that arises in the passage "Keep, of course, anything for yourself." It does not seem to me such a very odd sort of power to give to anybody. It is a power to distribute amongst a class, including the person himself, who is to take as much as ever he likes. On the very face of it that looks discretionary rather than any obligation to divide. I think Mr. Jenkins told me that under the present law in reference to powers of appointment and so on, if a power of appointment is given without words to the contrary, you may now give the whole to one. I gather that is so by a comparatively modern statute, and that to a certain extent the old doctrine about illusory appointments has been trenchanted upon. I do not think I need go into it. This is not a case in which it is a statutory obligation, or in which the statute would apply. That language in itself is, to my mind, almost enough to say that the person writing that could not have meant anything more than a suggestion, and could not have meant any obligation, because otherwise he would have said something as to the proportion which he meant the person to whom he was giving this large power to take for himself. And now one must turn to matters which to my mind are pretty well conclusive of the other view. At this stage I think it is convenient to refer to a passage at p. 95 of the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in McCormick v. Grogan (sup.). That case throws a great light on what I have to decide here, although the actual decision throws no light at all. The actual decision proceeded upon this. In that case there was no assent proved on the part of the donees to the suggested directions of a certain letter. Of course, if that was so, the case came to an end. But as I gather, I have not seen the report in the Court of Appeal in Ireland, that had there proceeded possibly upon different grounds, certainly partially upon a different ground, and the Lords dealt with that different ground, and this passage occurs where they are dealing with the question of the intention of Mr. Craig, whose dispositions were in question: "I think the letter itself, and all the circumstances attending it, lead to the conclusion that it was the full intention of the testator, uninduced by anything except that it was his own wish so to deal with his property, to give Mr. Grogan full and complete control over the property and to leave the instructions simply as a guide which might assist him in the discretion which he would himself exercise. In fact, what I believe to have been his intention is better expressed than I can myself express it in the words of the Court of Appeal when reversing the decision of Lord Chancellor Blackburne. It is there said by the Lord Justice of Appeal: 'If we could look into the thoughts of Abraham Walker Craig as they were at the moment when he was inditing the will and letter, I am persuaded that what we should find there would be a purpose to this effect, to set up after his decease, not an executor or a trustee, but as it were a second self, whom, while he communicates to him confidentially his ideas as to the distribution of his property, he desires to invest with all his own irresponsibility in carrying them into effect.' That, I think, is not by any means an unjust description of the instrument in question." I myself think, when you come to read the whole of this, the will and the introductory part of this letter of instruction, that it is exactly what Sir Neville Chamberlain intended to do. You start with the will. He gave by the will all his estate to his brother Sir Crawford absolutely, "but if he should die in the lifetime of the testator, or become from any reason incapable of managing his affairs," the testator's executors were to hold his said estate and effects upon such trusts as he should at any time make known to them." There you begin with the fact that the executors, if the matter came to them under that "but if," were to be subject to a binding trust which was to be communicated, and Sir Crawford was to stand certainly in a different position. That is a very strong circumstance to begin with. It is quite possible that Sir Neville might, after making that will, have more or less changed his mind and have thought, "Well, after all, I had better bind Sir Crawford, and I

WIELAND (app.) v. BUTLER-HOGAN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

will write positive directions to him and get him to give his assent to these positive directions." He might have done so, but, when you come to look at the directions, did he? He begins in this way: "Like many others who have gone before me, I have failed to make provision for the distribution of my property amongst my relatives and friends before it has become too late to do it with care." He is regretting that he has not been able to make the will that he should like to make, and, regretting that, what is he to do? I think he is contemplating doing exactly what is said in McCormick v. Grogan (sup.) to create the second self whom he desires to invest with his powers of distributing this property absolutely, to give him those powers, and to make him something like the bon père de famille who is supposed to provide and create interests and that sort of thing when he divides his property up amongst his children. He is going to put him into the position to make the proper and best distribution amongst the family because he cannot do it himself, having put it off too late, and because his brother is alive whom he absolutely trusts to do what he thinks to be absolutely best, and he desires to leave it absolutely to his discretion. That is what those introductory words seem to mean. If you start with that, you then get to this passage—it is no doubt capable of making the trust and capable of not doing so—and come to the very large words of discretion which he gives him, repeating, "I do not fetter your discretion in any way" and "Keep, of course, anything for yourself." "Of course" is an expression which is commented upon in Sullivan v. Sullivan (1903) 1 Ir. Rep. 193 Ch.), where the Master of the Rolls in Ireland delivering the judgment there says, at p. 201: "Why 'of course'? 'Of course' she could not modify it if it imposed a binding trust, and, if not, 'of course' she could." That is what was said in that case, and the same thing is here—"Keep, of course, anything for yourself." The "of course" certainly, when you come to consider it, has some meaning. When you get to the bottom, "Finally, these are the instructions referred to in my will"—that is to say, these are the things that are to be obligatory upon the trustees and executors if it ever comes to them, but they are not in any way to fetter Crawford. That means to say, "My desire is that inasmuch as I cannot dispose of my property equitably and reasonably amongst people who have claims upon me and whom I should desire to benefit, and as I do not think I am capable now of positively instructing anybody to do it in the way that I should like, I will leave the whole thing to my brother. I know he is an honourable man, a man who when he dies will in all probability distribute the property just as I should, and do it better than I can in my present condition, and I will remind him not to get into the same difficulty as I am in, and not to put it off too late," and accordingly he puts in: "You are an old man, and therefore do not delay this distribution." He is getting his brother to do that which he cannot do himself by putting his brother in the same position that he is in—namely, giving him absolute control and disposition over the property altogether. I think that is the true interpretation of the document, and, as I pointed out, I think in accepting those words and accepting those directions Sir Crawford accepts them subject to the full power and limitation that there is in them, and that he takes therefore with absolute power to do anything that he likes with the property with, at the outside, a moral obligation which as an honourable man he would be likely to feel bound by, and which in point of fact I do not doubt in this case he did in fact feel bound by, an honourable obligation to regard those wishes expressed by his brother unless he saw reason to the contrary. As I illustrated the case yesterday, if any of those servants who were to have money had misbehaved themselves, he clearly would have had power, in my judgment, to say: "I do not think now my brother would if he were alive have given that man his 25*l.*, and I shall not give it." He clearly could do anything of that kind in the way it was left to him. That being my view of this case, it follows that the settlement that was made, although made in point of fact under a sense of moral obligation, was in point of fact a gift. The motive for making the gift does not at all affect the question of the thing being a gift. I think it was a gift, and I think it follows this particular duty in this particular case happens to be payable. If it was only substitution, it would have been paid if these instructions had gone into the will and been binding. The judgment will be therefore for the Crown. Judgment accordingly.

WIELAND (app.) v. BUTLER-HOGAN (resp.). (a)

Public health—Unsound meat—Meat going bad while stored—Meat not set out or offered for sale—"Intended for the food of man"—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 116, 117.

On a Monday morning, shortly after twelve o'clock at noon, an inspector of nuisances visited the shop where the appellant carried on the business of a butcher. The shop contained a safe which the inspector found closed. It was opened by him and found to contain some meat which showed signs of decomposition. Business was carried on at the appellant's shop up to midnight on the previous Saturday, when all the meat remaining unsold was placed in the safe, and was then sound and fit for the food of man. On the Monday in question the safe had not been opened after midnight on the previous Saturday until the inspector's visit, a period of thirty-six hours.

In the ordinary course of the appellant's business all the meat contained in the safe would have been examined before setting it out for sale, and any part found to have been unsound would have been removed.

Held, that there was no evidence that the meat was deposited on the appellant's premises for the purpose of sale and intended for the food of man.

WIELAND (app.) v. BUTLER-HOGAN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under the Public Health Act 1875 for that on the 12th Oct. 1903 certain meat in the possession of the appellant was deposited for the purpose of sale on his premises, and was intended for the food of man and was unsound.

The facts proved and admitted before the justices were as follows:

On Monday, the 12th Oct. 1903, shortly after twelve o'clock at noon, an inspector of nuisances for the district visited the shop where the appellant carried on the business of a butcher. One customer was present in the shop, which was being cleaned under the direction of the appellant's manager.

The shop contained a safe which the inspector found closed. It was opened by him and found to contain a large quantity of meat for the most part perfectly sound, but part of a neck of mutton weighing about 3lb., some sausages, and nine pieces of cooked meat in separate dishes showed signs of decomposition.

All these were seized by the inspector, and, after being submitted for inspection, were taken before and condemned by a justice on the same day as unsound and unfit for the food of man.

The meat condemned was unsound and unfit for the food of man at the time of seizure by reason only of decomposition or putrefaction.

Evidence on behalf of the appellant was adduced as follows:

Business was carried on at the appellant's shop up to midnight on the previous Saturday, when all the meat remaining unsold was placed in the safe, and was then sound and fit for the food of man.

The ordinary course of business at the appellant's shop was to devote the morning on Mondays, when very little trade takes place, to cleansing and preparatory work, and not to set out or examine the contents of the safe until the process is complete.

On the Monday in question the safe had not been opened after midnight on the previous Saturday until the inspector's visit, a period of thirty-six hours. Further, in the ordinary course of the appellant's business, all the meat contained in the safe would have been examined before setting it out for sale, and any part found to have been unsound would have been removed.

The justices were of opinion that the facts as above stated constituted an offence against sects. 116 and 117 of the Public Health Act 1875, and they convicted the appellant.

By the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 116:

Any medical officer of health or inspector of nuisances may at all reasonable times inspect and examine any animal, carcass, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, vegetables, corn, bread, flour, or milk exposed for sale or deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, or of preparation for sale, and intended for the food of man, the proof that the same was not exposed or deposited for any such purpose, or was not intended for the food of man, resting with the party charged; and if any such animal, carcass, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, vegetable, corn, bread, flour, or milk appears to such medical officer or inspector to be diseased or unsound or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, he may seize and carry away the same himself or by an assistant in order to have the same dealt with by a justice.

Vol. XC., 2330.

And by sect. 117:

If it appears to the justice that any animal, carcass, meat, poultry, game, flesh, fish, fruit, vegetables, corn, bread, flour, or milk so seized is diseased or unsound or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, he shall condemn the same and order it to be destroyed or so disposed of as to prevent it being exposed for sale or used for the food of man; and the person to whom the same belongs or did belong at the time of exposure for sale, or in whose possession or on whose premises the same was found, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20l. for every animal, carcass, or fish, or piece of meat, flesh, or fish, or any poultry or game, or for the parcel of fruit, vegetables, corn, bread, or flour, or for the milk so condemned, or, at the discretion of the justice, without the infliction of a fine to imprisonment for a term of not more than three months. The justice who under this section is empowered to convict the offender may be either the justice who may have ordered the article to be disposed of or destroyed or any other justice having jurisdiction in the place.

Clarke Hall for the appellant.—The justices were wrong, for on the case as stated by them it is clear that this meat was not deposited for sale and intended for the food of man. [He referred to the corresponding provisions in the Public Health (London) Act 1891 (sect. 47).] In no sense could it be said that this meat was intended for the food of man, and it cannot be said that because meat goes bad on the premises before the person owning the premises has the opportunity of examining it, that constitutes an offence within the Public Health Act 1875. The facts in Mallinson v. Carr (63 L. T. Rep. 459; 17 Cox C. C. 220; (1891) 1 Q. B. 48) are very different from the present case, for there the defendant kept the meat on his premises after he knew it was unsound and unfit. Here there was no evidence that the appellant meant to keep the meat after he discovered it was bad; in fact, the evidence shows it would have been examined before he set it out.

R. Cunningham Glen for the respondent.—Under sects. 116 and 117 the onus is on the appellant. The intention was for the justices to consider, and, although they have set out in the case the evidence given by the appellant, the fact that they convicted him shows that they did not believe him. Here the seizure was not until twelve o'clock, and there was a customer in the shop. The conviction was therefore right.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Of course if the argument put forward by Mr. Glen on behalf of the respondent is good on the case as it is stated, this conviction would have to stand. If the justices had only treated what they have set out in the case as evidence which they heard, but did not believe, he might be right; but I cannot think that the justices meant it to be understood that they did not believe the evidence given for the appellant. They say: "We were of opinion that the facts as above stated constituted an offence against the Public Health Act 1875, ss. 116, 117, and convicted the appellant." That statement, I think, shows that their findings amounted to that the meat had gone bad between Saturday and Monday, that the meat had not been dealt with up to the time on Monday when the inspector opened the safe, and that up to that time on the Monday the meat had not been handled or moved from the safe. That being so, I do not think that there was any evidence that meat in the possession of the appellant was deposited for the purpose of sale on his premises and was intended for the food of man in addition to being unsound. In Mallinson v. Carr (63 L. T. Rep. 459; 17 Cox C. C. 220; (1891) 1 Q. B. 48) the decision turned on the fact that the respondent had retained the meat on his premises after he knew that it was unsound and unfit. I think the justices here were wrong, and the appeal must be allowed.

MARKS v. SAMUEL.

[CT. OF APP.]

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. What the magistrates had to consider here was whether the meat was deposited for the purpose of sale on the premises, and was it intended for the food of man. The evidence given, and which we must take the magistrates believed, shows that it was not intended for the food of man, for they say: "In the ordinary course of appellant's business all the meat contained in the safe would have been examined before setting it out for sale, and any part found to have been unsound would have been removed." That shows the meat was not exposed in the business at all, and the evidence amounted to that, whatever the condition of the meat was at the time the safe was opened, at that time it was not intended for the food of man, for it would have had to have been examined first.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

MARKS v. SAMUEL. (a)

APPLICATION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Slander—Accusation of bringing "blackmailing" action—Imputation of criminal offence—Action for slander maintainable.

An action for slander founded upon an accusation that the plaintiff had brought a "blackmailing" action was held to be maintainable on the ground that the words spoken might fairly be interpreted by hearers as imputing to the plaintiff an indictable offence.

THE plaintiff, Arnold Jacobs Marks, who carried on business as a director of a public company, brought an action against the defendant, Henry Samuel, who also carried on business as a director of a public company, for an alleged slander.

The plaintiff alleged, by his statement of claim, that the defendant, at a meeting of the shareholders of a gold-mining company, stated that his counsel had accused the plaintiff of bringing a "blackmailing" action. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had originated the slander himself.

By his defence the defendant pleaded that the occasion on which the alleged words were spoken was privileged, the words having been spoken bonâ fide and without malice, and were themselves privileged by reason of their being spoken at a meeting of the shareholders of a company, at which both the plaintiff and the defendant were present as shareholders, and were spoken for the purpose of vindicating the defendant's character against an attack by the plaintiff, and in reasonable and necessary self-defence.

At the trial of the action in Nov. 1903, before Grantbarn, J. and a special jury, the jury stopped the case, and judgment was entered for the defendant.

Thereupon the plaintiff applied for a new trial of the action or that judgment might be entered for him.

Bray, K.C. and P. Rose Innes, for the plaintiff, supported the application.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. and A. Neilson, for the defendant, contended that the action was not maintainable at all, the words alleged to have been used not being actionable; that it was not suggested that anything was said with reference to the plaintiff's trade or calling; that the bringing of a "blackmailing" action was not a criminal offence, anyone being entitled to bring an action, however unfounded it might be; and that in the absence of special damage (which was not alleged) there was no cause of action.

Bray, K.C., in reply, contended that when a "blackmailing" action was spoken of any listener would naturally draw the deduction that the plaintiff was accused of being a "black-mailer"—imputing to him an indictable offence—which was actionable; and that therefore the mode in which the words would have been understood by a bystander had to be considered.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—On the whole, we think that there must be a new trial here. I will deal first with the point that was made by Mr. Rufus Isaacs. He, of course, was right in his submission that, unless this statement of claim is a statement of claim in which the alleged slander imputed or might impute a criminal offence, this action fails. There is no special damage alleged, and it is not a case in which there is any imputation of professional misconduct at all, or misconduct by a tradesman in his trade, or anything of that sort. It is just one of those cases in which spoken words are not actionable unless they are spoken words which impute or might impute a crime in the opinion of the tribunal which ultimately deals with the matter. If they appear to have been words not necessarily which were intended by the speaker to impute a crime, but which the hearers might understand as imputing a crime, they may be actionable. Now, the words, as set forth in the second paragraph of the statement of claim, are these: "On the 30th May 1902, at a meeting of shareholders of the Elandsfontein No. 2 Gold Mining Company, held on such date at the Institute of Accountants, Moorgate-street, E.C., the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff the following words: 'On that occasion (meaning upon the hearing of certain arbitration proceedings arising out of the said action in the Mayor's Court) Mr. Marks (meaning the plaintiff) was taxed with having brought a blackmailing action (meaning the said action in the Mayor's Court) against me. He was awfully indignant about it, and wanted to know if it was by instructions of mine that my counsel accused him (meaning the plaintiff) of having brought a blackmailing action. My counsel said it was upon his (meaning the plaintiff) own evidence." Now, the next paragraph, No. 3, contains the innuendo. But I will first say a word upon the matter, without any reference to the innuendo at all. I am not at all prepared to say that even without any innuendo it would be right to say that these words actually used could not be reasonably understood by the hearers as imputing to the plaintiff a criminal offence. I mean by that a criminal offence in making a claim, supporting it by an action, and supporting it in that action by criminal means—that is to say, either by false evidence given by the plaintiff himself, or by false evidence obtained by him for the purpose of the action. If there was such an action brought and thus supported, it seems to me that it would be a blackmailing action, and a blackmailing action brought by such means and in such manner as to constitute an indictable offence. When one comes to look at the third paragraph of the statement of claim and see what the innuendo is, that paragraph confirms what I have said, because the meaning which it is suggested that these words conveyed to the hearers is very much the same as that which I have just stated; and, as it seems to me, the words might reasonably have been understood to mean by the hearers that which I have just stated. The words of the innuendo are as follows: "The meaning of the said words was that the plaintiff was a blackmailer and had brought an unfounded action against the defendant, had been guilty of an indictable offence or offences, and of endeavouring to obtain moneys by means of threats from the defendant, and was further guilty of a misdemeanour in supporting his claim by giving false evidence, and had so admitted in his evidence given upon oath before the said court." Now, taking those last words, "And was further guilty of a misdemeanour in supporting his claim by giving false evidence, and had so admitted in his evidence given upon oath before the said court," I think that the hearers might well have understood that that was the imputation which was being made by Mr. Samuel upon Mr. Marks, especially when one has regard to the concluding words of par. 2 complained of: "My counsel said it was upon his (meaning the plaintiff's) own evidence." It certainly suggests there that that evidence was untrue evidence given on oath by the plaintiff. Now, having said that, I have pointed out that we should not refuse a new trial upon this point taken by Mr. Isaacs, and I now proceed to deal with the reasons why I think that there ought to be a new trial here. I have no doubt but that in this action Grantham, J. did not for one moment intend to tell the jury that if they arrived at the conclusion that it was a case in which the plaintiff and the defendant respectively were abusing one another, and that the plaintiff was the beginner, there was an end of the action. I do not think that the learned judge meant to tell the jury anything of the sort. But unfortunately the learned judge did not, in my opinion, explain to the jury what were the issues which they really had to try in the action. It seems to me that if he left matters with the jury in such a way that they might very well have supposed that if they thought this was a case of cross imputations, made by the plaintiff and the defendant one against the other at a public meeting, no action would lie, and that it did not matter whether the imputations made by the defendant and the plaintiff were true or were false. I cannot help saying that the jury may very well have thought that this was the view of the law intended to be put before them by the learned judge. The learned judge did not in fact explain to them at all what the issues were. More than once in the course of the trial when the plaintiff wished to bring before the court and jury what happened at the arbitration at which this imputation was first made, for the purpose of showing that there could be no ground whatsoever for the defendant believing in the truth of any such allegation as that this was a blackmailing action or an action brought by the plaintiff which he supported by false evidence, the learned judge told the jury that he thought these matters ought not to be gone into, and refused to allow the plaintiff to go into the matters any further. The learned judge pointed out that that which the defendant alleged—that is, that his counsel had said this and said that—was perfectly true. It seems to me that there again, although the learned judge knew himself perfectly well what the issues were and what was relevant and what was not, the jury may very well have supposed that the learned judge thought the evidence showed that the defendant could not possibly have believed in the truth of the statements he made which were complained of by the plaintiff. Under these circumstances it seems to me that, although the jury practically on the invitation of the learned judge stopped the case, yet we ought not to allow this verdict to stand. The result is there will be a new trial. The costs of this application and in the court below will abide the result of the new trial.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place, as regards the point that was raised by Mr. Rufus Isaacs that the action was not maintainable at all, it seems to me that that cannot be relied on. It is impossible, I think, to come to the conclusion that the words set out in the second paragraph of the statement of claim were not such as the persons hearing them might fairly interpret as imputing an indictable offence to the plaintiff. If that be so, the action is maintainable, and the question must be asked of the jury as to the sense and meaning which ought to have been put upon them. Therefore the question comes to this, whether there ought to be a new trial. Upon that, I agree with what my Lord has said. I think that the jury in this case acted upon the suggestion which was made by the learned judge in the court below, that it was merely a case of recriminations between two persons, who neither of them exactly meant what they said. It is a misfortune, it seems to me, that the learned judge did not explain, as he naturally would have done if he had given a more formal summing up, the issues which the jury were called upon to try, and ask them for a formal verdict. I agree with what my Lord has said, that, under the circumstances, the

HAMILTON v. SEAL. (a)

APPLICATION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Practice—Costs—Application for judgment or new trial—Costs of successful applicant—Discretion of court.

Where an application is made to the Court of Appeal for judgment or a new trial on appeal from a judgment and verdict at a trial before a judge and jury, on the ground of misdirection or otherwise, and such application is opposed by the other side, but a new trial is granted, although there is no absolute rule applicable to all such cases, and the court has a discretion either to give or refrain from giving, or to reserve the costs of the successful application to abide the result of the new trial, yet, in the absence of special circumstances, prima facie the costs of the successful application ought to be borne by the party who opposed it.

The order made in Bray v. Ford (73 L. T. Rep. 609; (1896) A. C. 44) is not to be considered as an order laying down any general rule upon the point, but merely as an order in that particular case.

AN application was made by the defendant in this action for judgment or new trial, on appeal from a verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before Grantham, J. and a special jury, the ground of the application being that there had been a misdirection by the learned judge.

The court having ordered a new trial, the question arose whether the costs of the successful application ought to abide the result of the new trial, or whether the defendant ought to have his costs in any event.

Scott Fox, K.C. and Thorn Drury for the defendant.—Although an order was made in Bray v. Ford (73 L. T. Rep. 609; (1892) A. C. 44) that the costs of the application there to the Court of Appeal for a new trial ought to abide the result of the new trial, yet there is no general rule to that effect. And in Fletcher v. London and North-Western Railway (65 L. T. Rep. 605; (1892) 1 Q. B. 122) the application for a new trial was allowed with costs.

Kemp, K.C. and F. M. Abrahams, for the plaintiff, contra.—[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is stated in the Annual Practice 1904, p. 548, that where the new trial is granted on the ground of misdirection the court will, as a general rule, order the costs of the application to abide the event of the new trial, and Bray v. Ford (ubi sup.) and Jones v. Richards (15 Times L. Rep. 398) are referred to. There is no reason for departing from the rule here, if there is any general rule. We will consult our colleagues as to what is the general rule.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have consulted with the other members of the court, and it seems that in practice the order that was made in Bray v. Ford (73 L. T. Rep. 609; (1896) A. C. 44) in the House of Lords has not been considered as an order laying down any general rule, but merely as an order made in that particular case. Beyond that, it seems that the Court of Appeal has, in dealing with these common law cases, generally dealt with them upon the basis that there is no absolute rule applicable in all cases, but the court has a discretion, and that it will in the exercise of its discretion either give or refrain from giving or reserve the costs. We have to exercise that discretion to-day; and, speaking for myself, although I cannot find that there is any general rule which is to be applied in these cases, I am entitled to say, and I do say, that, so far as I am concerned, in the absence of special circumstances in any particular case, if there is an appeal which asks for a new trial, and that is successful, then in my judgment, if the other side has opposed the granting of the new trial, the costs of the successful appeal ought prima facie to be borne by those who opposed it quite irrespective of the results. That is my view, and, in the absence of any rule to the contrary, I shall act upon it. In this case there has been an application for a new trial, and a new trial has been granted. It was opposed; and the party who moved for it, and obtained it notwithstanding the opposition, should have his costs. The defendant, therefore, must have his costs of the application. The costs of the first trial must abide the result of the second trial subject to any direction which may be given by the judge.

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Lunatic—Application of property for maintenance of—Jurisdiction of Chancery Division—Lunacy Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 116.

Where a person of unsound mind not so found, who was detained in an asylum abroad, was absolutely entitled to certain trust property in this country, and directions were desired as to her maintenance thereout, the Court of Appeal (acting under the jurisdiction in Chancery), upon an undertaking by the trustees to bring the trust property into court, ordered that the interest thereof should, during the lifetime of the lunatic, or until further order, be paid to the lunatic's sister, who was one of the trustees, she undertaking to apply the same for the maintenance of the lunatic.

Re CARR'S TRUSTS; CARR v. CARR.

[CT. OF APP.]

By a marriage settlement, dated the 10th June 1829, the survivor of the husband and wife was empowered to appoint the trust funds by will among the children of the marriage.

On the 21st Dec. 1859 the wife died.

By his will, dated the 24th April 1880, the husband appointed that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of the trust funds upon trust as to the sum of 4500*l.* for his daughter Caroline Emily Carr, subject, however, to the following proviso, that the trustees should stand possessed of the sum of 4500*l.* thereinbefore appointed to the testator's daughter upon trust for investment as therein mentioned, and should during the period of twenty-one years from the testator's death apply the income of the sum of 4500*l.* or of the investments thereof for the benefit of his daughter in such manner as the trustees should in their or his discretion think fit, his intent and meaning being that the trustees should have absolute discretion either to apply the income of the sum of 4500*l.* or any part thereof immediately for the purposes aforesaid, or pay the same or any part thereof at such times and in such manner and way as they might think fit into the hands of the daughter, if they in their uncontrolled judgment were of opinion that the daughter was able to manage her own affairs.

On the 10th Dec. 1882 the testator died.

Caroline Emily Carr was a person of unsound mind, not so found by inquisition. In 1878 she had been placed by her father in an institution for persons of unsound mind in Germany, pursuant to a certificate duly signed by a physician, and she had been detained there ever since.

The trustees of the settlement had applied the whole of the income (except a sum of 164*l.* 18*s.* 5*d.*) of the investments representing the 4500*l.*—which now consisted partly of India Stock and partly of a mortgage—in the maintenance and for the benefit of Caroline Emily Carr during the period of twenty-one years from the death of her father, the testator.

The period of twenty-one years having expired, an originating summons was taken out on behalf of Caroline Emily Carr by a next friend against the trustees of the settlement and a son of the testator (as representing the persons who might ultimately be entitled to the fund on one possible construction of the settlement and will), asking for a declaration that she was absolutely entitled to the fund and for directions as to her maintenance out of the income, and as to the application of the residue of the income and of so much (if any) of the capital as the court should think fit for her comfort and benefit.

The summons also asked that, if necessary, the trusts, so far as regarded the 4500*l.*, might be administered by the court.

There was evidence of the unsoundness of mind of Caroline Emily Carr, and that she was not likely to recover. There was also evidence to the effect that personal service upon her of a summons or other proceedings in Lunacy would cause violent excitement and inflict upon her deep and enduring distress; and that, if the names of her sisters and the next friend, or any of them, appeared on any such proceedings, her excitement and distress would be intensified, and she would begin to distrust them, and the consequences would be most disastrous so far as her health and peace of mind and comfort were concerned.

The summons came on to be heard before Joyce, J. sitting in chambers, when his Lordship made a declaration that, according to the true construction of the settlement and will, Caroline Emily Carr was absolutely entitled to the trust fund, but the learned judge, being of opinion that, having regard to sect. 116 of the Lunacy Act 1890, the application for maintenance would more properly be dealt with under the jurisdiction in Lunacy, did not think fit to make any order with respect thereto, except to sanction the payment of a sum of 39*l.* made by the trustees for that purpose.

From that decision Caroline Emily Carr by her next friend now appealed.

Micklem, K.C. (with him Harry Greenwood) for the appellant.—It is most desirable that if possible no service in Lunacy should be made upon this lady, as the evidence shows she would be seriously disturbed if she became aware that proceedings under that jurisdiction were being taken on her behalf. If, as I submit, the Chancery Division has jurisdiction to make the order now asked for, and the lady could thus be saved the service in Lunacy, the case is an exceptionally proper one for the exercise of that jurisdiction, and it would be of immense advantage to her. The court will be in effect administering the trusts. A person lawfully detained out of England as a lunatic is not a person "lawfully detained as a lunatic" within sect. 116, subsect. 1 (c), of the Lunacy Act 1890:

Re Watkins, 74 L. T. Rep. 504; (1896) 2 Ch. 336.

In that case Lindley, L.J. suggested the proper method of getting over the difficulty which occurred there. The jurisdiction of the Chancery Division is clear from several cases. The most recent is Re Tuer's Will Trusts, 54 L. T. Rep. 910; 32 Ch. Div. 39.

Earlier cases were

Re Bligh, 41 L. T. Rep. 570; 12 Ch. Div. 364.

In an unreported case very similar to the present, which came recently before Kekewich, J., that learned judge made an order such as is asked for here. But Joyce, J. declined to follow that case for the reason that he was of opinion that the application for maintenance would more properly be made under the jurisdiction in Lunacy. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Re Barlow's Will (57 L. T. Rep. 95; 36 Ch. Div. 287), which case, his Lordship remarked, had been discussed very recently and distinguished in Didisheim v. London and Westminster Bank (82 L. T. Rep. 733; (1900) 2 Ch. 15).]

L. F. Potts, for the respondents, the trustees of the settlement, referred to

New York Security and Trust Company v. Keyser, 84 L. T. Rep. 43; (1901) 1 Ch. 666.

The COURT (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), without delivering any formal judgments, ordered that the order of Joyce, J. should be discharged so far as it declined to give any directions for the maintenance, comfort, and benefit of Caroline Emily APPEAL IN BANKRUPTCY.

Bankruptcy — Bankruptcy notice — Address of creditor — Power of Court of Bankruptcy to go behind judgment — Form of judgment — Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4, sub-s. 1 (g), s. 7, sub-s. 3 — Bankruptcy Rules 1886 to 1890, Appendix, form 6.

The fact that a judgment may be irregular or wrong in form is not a sufficient reason for the Court in Bankruptcy to exercise its power to go behind the judgment. The judgment is conclusive unless the consideration can be questioned.

It is not sufficient for a creditor who issues a bankruptcy notice to give in the notice an address at which he can be heard of; it must be an address at which the debt can be paid or secured or compounded for, and of a place at which the creditor is to be found during the seven days limited by the notice, whether the address is of the residence or place of business of the creditor.

If the address given in the notice is such an address at the date of the service of the notice, the occasional absence of the creditor from the place, even for a whole day, will not render the notice inefficient, unless the absence is such as to deprive the debtor of a reasonable opportunity of paying or securing or compounding for the sum due.

It would not make any difference that the address was the temporary home of the creditor, who had no permanent home; or that his absence occurred on the last day of the seven.

But if the creditor, after the service of the notice, abandons his place of address, so that it ceases to be a place where at reasonable times he, or some authorised agent on his behalf, can be found to receive payment of the debt, or to deal with the question of security, the bankruptcy notice will cease to be efficient.

(a) Reported by W. O. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Re Stogdon (73 L. T. Rep. 279; (1895) 2 Q. B. 534) considered.

In July 1901 an action for libel was commenced, the defendant being described in the writ and the pleadings as "a married woman." At that date a decree nisi had been made for the dissolution of the defendant's marriage, and in Nov. 1901 the decree was made absolute.

On the 30th Oct. 1902 the libel action was tried, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff with 5000l. damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

In June 1903, on the application of the defendant, the Court of Appeal ordered a new trial unless the plaintiff consented to the damages being reduced to 1500l. The plaintiff consented, and the judgment was on the 19th July amended accordingly, but the date of the 30th Oct. was not altered. The judgment as drawn up was in the ordinary form of a judgment against an unmarried woman.

The 1500l. not having been paid, the plaintiff, on the 28th July, served a bankruptcy notice on the defendant claiming payment of the 1500l., with interest from the 30th Oct. 1902, the address of the creditor being given at an hotel in London, where she was then staying, and where she was in the habit of staying, but she did not permanently retain a room there.

On the 4th Aug., the last of the seven days limited for compliance with the notice, the creditor left the hotel at 10.15 a.m., leaving no address. She went to Newhaven and thence to France, and did not return to England till the end of September.

The debtor not having complied with the bankruptcy notice, on the 24th Aug. the creditor presented a bankruptcy petition against her, and a receiving order was made.

Held, that, as at the date of the trial the defendant had been divorced and a judgment could have been obtained against her creating a personal debt, the fact that she was described in the writ and pleadings as a married woman, and the judgment was drawn up in the form applicable to an unmarried woman, was a matter of form only, and the Court of Bankruptcy had no power to go behind the judgment.

Held also, that an objection that interest was claimed from the 30th Oct. 1902 instead of the 19th July 1903 was concluded by the judgment.

Held also, that the address given in the notice was sufficient, and that the creditor did not abandon it when she left the hotel.

APPEAL by the debtor against a receiving order in bankruptcy made against her by Mr. Registrar Giffard on the petition of Mrs. Watt.

On the 7th May 1901 a decree nisi was made for the dissolution of debtor's marriage on the ground of her adultery with Mr. Watt.

On the 25th July 1901 Mrs. Watt commenced an action against the debtor for libel, and in the writ and pleadings the defendant was described as "a married woman."

On the 25th Nov. 1901 the decree nisi was made absolute.

On the 30th Oct. 1901 the trial of the libel action took place and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff with 5000l. damages, and judgment was given accordingly. The judgment as entered was headed with the title of the action, in which the defendant was described as "a married woman," and it was adjudged "that the plaintiff recover against the defendant 5000*l.* and her costs to be taxed."

An application was made by the defendant to the Court of Appeal for a new trial on the ground (inter alia) that the damages were excessive, and on the 17th June 1903 the Court of Appeal ordered that there should be a new trial unless the plaintiff would consent to the damages being reduced to 1500*l.* The plaintiff having consented, the judgment was amended by substituting 1500*l.* for 5000*l.*, the original date of the judgment, the 30th Oct. 1902, not being altered.

The judgment as drawn up was in the usual form of a judgment against an unmarried woman, and not in the form of a judgment against a married woman in respect of her separate estate as settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley (57 L. T. Rep. 919; 20 Q. B. Div. 120).

An appeal by the debtor to the House of Lords against this judgment was pending.

The 1500*l.* was not paid, and on the 28th July the plaintiff served a bankruptcy notice on the defendant in form No. 6 of the Bankruptcy Rules 1886 and describing the debtor as unmarried, requiring payment of the sum of 1769*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* as the amount due for principal, interest, and costs on a final judgment obtained by her against the debtor in the King's Bench Division, dated the 30th Oct. 1902, amended by order of the Court of Appeal dated the 17th June 1903. Interest was claimed from the 30th Oct. 1902.

In the notice the plaintiff was described as "of Hans-crescent Hotel, in the county of London." She was at that time staying at the hotel, and was in the habit of staying there whenever she came to London, but she did not continuously keep a room there.

On the morning of the 4th Aug. 1903, the last of the seven days limited by the bankruptcy notice, the plaintiff left the hotel at 10.15 in a motor-car and went to Newhaven and thence to Dieppe, leaving no address, though she had told her solicitors where she was going. She did not return to England until the end of September.

The defendant not having complied with the bankruptcy notice, the plaintiff, on the 24th Aug. 1903, presented a bankruptcy petition against her, and on the 31st Oct. a receiving order was made, and the debtor appealed.

Herbert Reed, K.C. and Frank Mellor for the appellant.—The creditor of a married woman has now two rights if she commits a tort. He can bring an action against her alone under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, of the Married Women's Property Act 1882, when only her separate estate will be affected, or he can bring an action in the ordinary way against both husband and wife:

Earle v. Kingscote, 83 L. T. Rep. 377; (1900) 2 Ch. 585.

Here the action was brought against the married woman alone, seeking to make her liable as to her separate estate, and it is not competent for the plaintiff to make her a bankrupt, as she has sued her in respect of her separate property. A married woman cannot be committed for her default in paying a sum for which judgment has been recovered against her by virtue of sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, of the Married Women's Property Act 1882. That Act only makes the separate estate of the married woman the debtor, not the married woman herself:

Scott v. Morley, 57 L. T. Rep. 919; 20 Q. B. Div. 120.

The only judgment, therefore, to which the plaintiff was entitled was one in the form settled in Scott v. Morley (ubi sup.). The fact that a judgment is useless in that form is no reason for altering it:

Softlaw v. Welch, 81 L. T. Rep. 64; (1899) 2 Q. B. 419, 424.

A married woman cannot be made a bankrupt on a judgment in the form in Scott v. Morley (ubi sup.), and, whatever the form of the judgment against her may be, it can only have the effect of a judgment against her separate estate:

Re Lynes, 68 L. T. Rep. 739; (1893) 2 Q. B. 113;
Re Frances Handford and Co., 80 L. T. Rep. 125; (1899) 1 Q. B. 366, 570.

No distinction is drawn in Scott v. Morley (ubi sup.) between an action in contract and in tort. Before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act 1882 it had been held that a married woman was not personally liable in an action in contract or in tort, her separate estate being alone liable:

Wainford v. Heyl, 33 L. T. Rep. 155; L. Rep. 20 Eq. 321, 324.

This judgment is in the ordinary form of a judgment against an unmarried woman, although it is against a defendant described in the action as a married woman. It is therefore wrong in form, and the plaintiff is not entitled to proceed under it. The Court of Bankruptcy can go behind a judgment and inquire whether there is a liability on which a bankruptcy petition can be founded. The fact that the defendant became discover after the commencement of the action makes no difference, as the object of the action when commenced was to bind her separate estate. On the application for a new trial the only questions for the Court of Appeal were whether the judge had misdirected the jury and whether the damages were excessive; the form of the judgment was not before the court. The judgment can only take effect under the Married Women's Property Act, and therefore a fi. fa. could not issue upon it. A further objection to the receiving order is that interest is claimed on the 1500*l.* from the 30th Oct. 1902, the date of the judgment in the action, but there was no judgment for 1500*l.* until the 19th July, when the judgment was altered by the master. The 1500*l.* is claimed under the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The plaintiff did not at once consent to the reduction of the damages, and pending her consent there was no judgment. There was no antecedent debt as in Fisher v. Dudding (3 Man. & G. 238). A further objection is that the creditor was not at the address given in the bankruptcy notice for the seven days from the service of the notice. If the debtor late on the seventh day had desired to pay the debt she would not have found the creditor there, and would not have been able to discover where the creditor was. The nonpayment of the debt, therefore, within the seven days did not constitute an act of bankruptcy:

[CT. OF APP.]

It is not sufficient that the creditor could have communicated with the creditor's solicitor. When the creditor left the hotel she must be taken to have abandoned her temporary residence there.

Muir Mackenzie, for the creditor, was called on with reference to the last point only.—If there has been any irregularity it has caused no injustice, and therefore the proceedings are not invalid:

Bankruptcy Act 1883, s. 143.

There is no provision in the Act that the address of the creditor must be stated in the bankruptcy notice; it is only contained in form No. 6 in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules. The objection is technical, and ought not to succeed when no injury has resulted to the debtor. She has not been in any way prejudiced or misled, and made no attempt to pay, secure, or compound for the debt:

Re Murrieta, 3 Man. 35, 39;

Re Low; Ex parte Gibson, 72 L. T. Rep. 450; (1895) 1 Q. B. 734.

The address given in Re Stogden (ubi sup.) was really no address at all. The creditor did not reside at the club he gave as his address, and was out of England during the whole of the seven days limited by the notice for the payment of the debt. Here the address given was the only permanent address the creditor had, and she left the address to which she was going with her solicitors. She was at the address for a reasonable time, and was not bound to be there for the whole of the seven days.

Reed, K.C. in reply.—This is not a technical objection; it may be of great importance to the debtor to be able to find the creditor on the last of the seven days. In Re Howes (67 L. T. Rep. 213; (1892) 2 Q. B. 628) Bowen, L.J. said: "Bankruptcy proceedings are of a peculiar character. They involve quasi penal consequences to the debtor, and it is essential that all those forms, the object of which is to prevent injustice, should be strictly followed." The onus is on the creditor to show he has complied with the forms and the substance of the Act and rules. The address must be the true address—that is, one at which the creditor can be ordinarily found, not merely heard of. If a London man having a shooting box in Scotland, which he only visited during the shooting season, gave that as his address in a bankruptcy notice it would not be sufficient. The address must be one at which the creditor is personally present, or at which, if he is absent, the creditor can ascertain the time of his return or present whereabouts. It must be an effective address, not only at the date of the issue of the notice, but also at the date of the service, and during the whole of the seven days.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. read the judgment of the court as follows:—This is an appeal against a receiving order made against a divorced wife, who at the time of the making of the order was a single woman. The objections raised are three. First, that there is no judgment debt effectual as against the Court of Bankruptcy, which does not regard estoppel binding the debtor, but has a right to inquire into the real debt. Secondly, it is objected that there is no act of bankruptcy, because the act of bankruptcy relied on, which is failure to comply with a bankruptcy notice, is invalidated by the fact, as alleged, that the notice contained no such address of the judgment creditor as was intended by the Act should be given. Thirdly, it was objected that the bankruptcy notice was bad, because the amount of the judgment as therein stated was wrong by reason of including interest prior to the date when the Court of Appeal amended the judgment by reducing the damages from 5000*l.* to 1500*l.* As to the first point, undoubtedly the Court of Bankruptcy has the power on the hearing of a bankruptcy petition to go behind the judgment and to inquire into the consideration for the judgment debt, not only at the instance of the trustee, but also at the instance of the judgment debtor himself. This power is founded on sect. 7, sub-sect. 3, of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, which gives the Court of Bankruptcy, on the hearing of a bankruptcy petition, a discretion for "any sufficient cause" to dismiss the petition. But, in my judgment, the fact that the judgment may be irregular or wrong in form is no sufficient reason for going behind the judgment and dismissing the petition. The action in the present case is an action for a tort committed by a woman during coverture; it is for a libel published by her while she was a married woman. Now, by the common law, independently of the Married Women's Property Act 1882, a married woman was liable to be sued for a wrong committed by her, and the husband, strictly speaking, was not liable to be sued at all for such tort. His only liability was to be sued jointly with her, because of the universal rule that the wife during coverture cannot be either a sole plaintiff or a sole defendant; and it was decided in Capel v. Powell (11 L. T. Rep. 421; 17 C. B. N. S. 743) that a husband who has obtained a divorce is not liable to be joined in an action of tort for a tort committed by his wife during coverture. It is manifest, therefore, that in the present case, in which the defendant at the date of the trial and judgment had been divorced, she alone remained liable for the tort, and the amendments, if any, which were required in the writ or pleadings went merely to the form and not to the substance of the cause of action. The case is very different from the case of a breach of a contract entered into by a wife during coverture. In such a case coverture is a plea in bar and not in abatement, and the cause of action given by the Married Women's Property Act 1882 and the remedy thereon are new, being created by Act of Parliament; whence it follows that, if the husband dies or obtains a divorce, this will not affect the statutory cause of action or the remedy thereof, but the remedy will remain a remedy against the wife's separate property, and the judgment in such an action will not create a personal debt from her, and therefore will not support a bankruptcy notice under the Bankruptcy Act 1883, s. 4, sub-s. 1 (g). It is true that in the present case we have not to deal with the setting aside of a bankruptcy notice, because the judgment in form creates a personal debt; but if in substance the action had been one in which no judgment could have been obtained creating a personal debt by the wife, I am disposed to think there would have been sufficient cause to dismiss the petition. But in the present case no such question arises. It is plain that the objection to the judgment, if any, is one of form only, and that the power of the Court of Bankruptcy to go behind a judgment is a power to inquire into the consideration and not into the form of the judgment. The judgment, to my mind, is conclusive unless the consideration can be questioned. The first objection therefore fails. The third objection—that is to say, the “interest” objection—is also concluded by the judgment. The Court of Bankruptcy cannot, I think, question the discretion of the court in such a matter. The only remaining objection is the objection founded on the insufficiency of the address given by the judgment creditor in the bankruptcy notice. The objection is based upon the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Re Stogdon (ubi sup.). Now in that case the judgment creditor, who was out of England at the time the notice was served, and so continued during the seven days that it was running, inserted in the bankruptcy notice as his address “White’s Club, St. James’, S.W.”; and the Court of Appeal decided that the bankruptcy notice was bad, holding that the notice must describe the creditor as of an address where the sum claimed can be paid to him or secured or compounded for, not merely where he could be heard of, and that the address of “White’s Club” was not under the circumstances such an address; and the question which we have now to decide is whether the address given by Mrs. Watt is such an address as is required by the Act, having regard to the decision in Re Stogdon. Now, what are the facts? Mrs. Watt appears to have been in the habit for some time of staying at the Hans-crescent Hotel whenever she came to London, but she did not continuously keep a room there. Sometimes she left an address to which her letters could be sent, sometimes she did not. At the date of the issue of the bankruptcy notice she was not in fact at the Hans-crescent Hotel; she seems to have come there on the evening of the 28th July, so that the seven days mentioned in the notice would not run out till the end of the 4th Aug. She left the hotel on the morning of the 4th Aug. in a motor-car, and went to Newhaven and thence to Dieppe; she did not return to England till the end of September, and she went on the 30th Sept. to the Hans-crescent Hotel. She left on the 4th Aug. no address to which her letters could be sent, and in fact they were not sent after her. In order to see whether this address fulfils the conditions laid down in Re Stogdon, one must ascertain what is the principle of that decision; and it is the more necessary to do so because it will govern the practice of the Bankruptcy Court hereafter. It is plain that it is not sufficient for the creditor merely to give an address where he can be heard of, but it must be an address where he can be paid, or where by agreement the debt can be secured or compounded. Now what does this mean? Suppose a creditor gives as his address his home where he permanently lives. Is he bound to remain at home all day, or never go out without leaving word where he proposes to go, but, for the matter of that, might not succeed in going? This is impossible. What then are the necessary conditions of the address? I think that the address must be of a place where the creditor is to be found during the seven days, and this is so whether such address is of the residence or of the place of business of the creditor; and I think that, if the address given in the bankruptcy notice is such an address at the date of the service of the notice, occasional absence of the creditor from such place, even for a whole day, will not render the bankruptcy notice inefficient, unless the absence is such as to deprive the debtor of a reasonable opportunity of paying or securing or compounding for the sum due according to the terms of the notice. And I do not think that it would make any difference that the address was the temporary home of the creditor who happened to have no permanent home, or that the absence relied on as depriving the bankruptcy notice of its efficiency happened to occur on the last day of the seven. On the other hand I think that, if the creditor, after the service of the notice, abandoned his place of address, so that it ceased to be a place where at reasonable times the creditor could be found (or some authorised agent on his behalf) to receive payment of the judgment debt, or to deal with the question of security, the bankruptcy notice would cease to be efficient. It was urged in the present case that when Mrs. Watt started on her journey to the Continent she abandoned her temporary address, and ceased to have any address where she, or any agent authorised to act on her behalf in the matter, could be found. My brethren think that, having regard to the practice of residing at the Hans-crescent Hotel, and that her letters would be likely to be delivered there after her departure, this contention on behalf of the debtor fails in fact; and I do not think I ought to differ from them on a question of fact; so this appeal will be dismissed with costs. I wish to add that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Stogdon seems to me, so far as the observations contained in the judgments are concerned, to be difficult of practical application. Perhaps it might be considered whether the rules and forms might not be somewhat altered.

The court gave the debtor leave to appeal to the House of Lords, and stayed proceedings under the receiving order in the meantime, on her undertaking to present her petition of appeal within fourteen days.

GORDON v. GORDON. (a)

Divorce—Person in contempt—Appeal—Right to hearing—Married woman—Separate estate—Restraint in anticipation—Jurisdiction to order payment of costs—“Proceeding instituted”—Married Women’s Property Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.

A decree nisi for the dissolution of a marriage on the ground of the wife’s adultery directed that the child of the marriage should remain in the custody of the husband until further order, and should not be removed out of the jurisdiction of the court. On the same day an order, was made ex parte in chambers that the child should be forthwith delivered to the husband. At that time the wife was abroad with the child.

(a) Reported by W. C. BISS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.]

GORDON v. GORDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

After the decree nisi had been made absolute she returned to England with the child, and was for the first time served personally with the orders with reference to the custody of the child. She then took out a summons asking that the decree nisi and the ex parte order might be varied and the custody of the child given to her. During the hearing of the summons the wife gave an undertaking not to remove the child out of the jurisdiction of the court.

On the 10th March 1903 the summons was dismissed and the wife was ordered to pay the costs out of her separate property, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation, and she was also ordered to deliver the child to the husband forthwith. It was then discovered that she had sent the child out of the jurisdiction two or three days before the 10th March and had since gone abroad herself, and she had remained abroad with the child ever since. On the 12th March an order was made for her committal for contempt of court and directing a writ of attachment should issue against her.

The wife gave notice of appeal from so much of the order of the 10th March as directed the costs to be paid out of her separate estate, and it was contended that the court had no jurisdiction to make it.

Held, that the rule that a person who is in contempt cannot be heard, prima facie applies to voluntary applications on his part, to cases where he is asking for something and not to cases in which all he seeks is to be heard in matters of defence; that the appellant objected to the order on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it; and its legality ought to be determined, and therefore the appeal must be heard.

Held also, that the summons was not a "proceeding instituted" by the married woman within sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act 1893, but an application in the divorce suit, and there was no jurisdiction to order her to pay the costs out of her separate estate which was subject to a restraint on anticipation.

APPEAL against an order of the President (Sir F. Jenne) that certain costs should be paid out of the separate property of Margaret Gordon, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation.

On the 25th Nov. 1901, on the petition of the husband, a decree nisi was pronounced for the dissolution of the marriage of M. Gordon (the present appellant) and her husband, and it was ordered that the only child of the marriage should remain in the custody of the husband until further order; but it was directed that the child should not be removed out of the jurisdiction without the sanction of the court. The child was, however, then with the appellant, who was abroad. The same day an order was made ex parte in chambers directing that the child should be forthwith delivered up and should remain in the custody of the husband until further order of the court.

On the 2nd June 1902 the decree nisi was made absolute, and in August the respondent was married to the co-respondent.

In Oct. 1902 the appellant returned to England, bringing the child with her, and was for the first time served personally with the orders with reference to the custody of the child, and on the 15th Oct. she took out a summons entitled in the suit calling on the husband to show cause why so much of the decree nisi as ordered that the child should remain in the custody of the husband until further order of the court and the order of the 25th Nov. 1901 should not be varied, and in lieu thereof that the custody of the child should be given to her. She afterwards by her counsel gave an undertaking not to remove the child out of the jurisdiction without the permission of the court.

On the 10th March the President dismissed the summons (89 L. T. Rep. 73; (1904) P. 141), and ordered that the respondent "do pay to the petitioner his costs of and incident to the summons, such costs to be payable out of the respondent's separate property, notwithstanding that such property is subject to a restraint on anticipation." He further ordered that the child should be forthwith delivered up by the appellant to the husband, and that it should remain in the custody of the husband until further order; and that such child should not be removed out of the jurisdiction of the court without its sanction. This order was entitled in the divorce suit. When an attempt was made to serve this order on the respondent, it was discovered that she had gone away with the child.

On the 12th March 1903 the President made an order pronouncing the appellant "to be contumacious and in contempt for breach of and non-compliance with her undertaking . . . not to take the child out of London," and he ordered her to be attached for such contempt.

On the same day another order was made that the respondent do stand committed to Holloway Prison for her contempt in not complying with the order of the 25th Nov. 1901 directing that the child should not be removed out of the jurisdiction of the court without its sanction, and the next day a writ of attachment was issued against the respondent and a warrant granted for her arrest, but, as she had remained abroad with the child, she had not been arrested.

On the 12th May 1903 she gave notice of appeal against so much of the order of the 10th March as ordered payment of costs out of her separate property, notwithstanding that it was subject to a restraint on anticipation.

In opposition to the appeal an affidavit was made by the husband's solicitor, in which he said: "Notwithstanding the undertaking of the respondent not to remove the said child out of the jurisdiction of the court, and in defiance thereof, the respondent, two or three days before the decision of the court, surreptitiously sent the child out of the country, and on the day the court gave judgment she herself left England, and she has since remained abroad with the said child and has been joined by the co-respondent, and they are living abroad with the said child."

That affidavit was not contradicted.

Duke, K.C. and Priestley, K.C., for the petitioner, took the preliminary objection that, the respondent being in contempt, the court would not hear the appeal until she had purged her contempt.

Bargrave Deane, K.C. and Methold for the respondent.—The fact that a person is in contempt does not preclude him from appealing against an order which is irregular, though he could not be heard to make any application of his own. He may appeal from the order which places him in contempt:

King v. Bryant, 3 My. & Cr. 191;
Wilson v. Bates, 3 My. & Cr. 197;
Fry v. Ernest, 9 L. T. Rep. 321.

Here the appellant contends that the court has no jurisdiction under sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act 1883 to make this order as to costs. In a note to Chuck v. Cremer (1 Coop. temp. Cott. 205) a large number of cases are collected with reference to the right of a person in contempt to be heard. They show he may defend himself against an irregular order, and among them are:

Green v. Green, 2 Sim. 394;
Barker v. Dawson, 1 Coop. 207;
Parry v. Perryman, 1 Coop. 207;
Ricketts v. Mornington, 7 Sim. 200;
Re Brady, 1 Moll. 254;
Hawkins v. Hall, 1 Beav. 73;
Anon v. Lord Gort, 1 Hog. 77;
Morrison v. Morrison, 4 Haro. 590;
Plumbe v. Plumb, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 622;
Cattel v. Simons, 5 Beav. 396; 6 Beav. 304.

Besides which the following later cases are important:

Ex parte Chadwick, 15 Jur. 597;
Chatterton v. Thomas, 36 L. J. 592, Ch.;
Futrope v. Kennard, 3 L. T. Rep. 687; 2 Giff. 110.

In Barker v. Dawson (ubi sup.) Lord Cottenham said that there was a wide distinction between a case where the order alleged to be irregular was obtained prior to the contempt, and where it was obtained subsequent to the contempt. That where it was obtained prior to the contempt, and was not the order which placed the party in contempt, the rule was that the contempt must be cleared before the party could make any application to the court. But he never would extend the rule to a case where the order, sought to be set aside on the ground of irregularity, was made subsequently to the contempt. Such an extension of the rule would place the party in contempt too much at the mercy of his adversary. The affidavit of the petitioner's solicitor shows that here the contempt was committed two or three days before the order appealed from was made. But there is no distinction between an order made before and an order made after the contempt. Although the order is invalid, the trustees of the settlement cannot safely pay the income to the appellant. There is a proper punishment for the contempt, and pressure ought not to be put on the appellant by the existence of an invalid order.

Duke, K.C. and Priestley, K.C. for the petitioner.—While a person is in contempt with reference to a particular order he cannot be heard to contest that order until he has purged the contempt:

Chuck v. Cremer (ubi sup.).

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Barnardo v. Ford (67 L. T. Rep. 1; (1892) A. C. 326).] As a rule, a litigant who is in contempt cannot take any step of his own in the action or cause in which he is in contempt:

Garstin v. Garstin, 4 Sw. & Tr. 73;
Cavendish v. Cavendish, 15 W. R. 182;
Curtis v. Curtis, 5 Moo. P. C. 252, 256;
Howard v. Newman, 1 Moll. 221, 222.

This case does not come within any of the exceptions to the general rule. The contention here is not that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order, but that under the circumstances it ought not to have been made, and that is not really a question of jurisdiction. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Ex parte Fernandez (4 L. T. Rep. 324; 10 C. B. N. S. 3).] That was a proceeding by way of habeas corpus, and the right to challenge imprisonment is different from a right to appeal in a suit. If an attempt was made to enforce this order, the appellant or the trustees could raise the question as to its validity. This objection that the appellant is in contempt may be the only way of obtaining the delivery up of the child, and the court will not readily assist the appellant in disobeying the order. Although it is not expressly stated in the order of the 12th March that the appellant is in contempt with reference to the order of the 10th March, yet that order had been in fact disobeyed, and the contempt continues up to the present time. In Garstin v. Garstin (ubi sup.) and Cavendish v. Cavendish (ubi sup.) there had been no adjudication that the party was in contempt, yet the court refused to hear him. Wilson v. Bates (ubi sup.) only applies to the facts of that case, and does not deal with any general principle. There may be a distinction where the order which it is contended is irregular is made subsequently to the contempt:

King v. Bryant (ubi sup.).

But that is not the case here. In Lord Chief Baron Gilbert's Forum Romanum, p. 102 (vide Daniell's Chancery Practice, 7th edit., vol. 1, p. 724), it is said: "It is to be observed, as a general rule, that the contemnor, who is in contempt, is never to be heard, by motion or otherwise, till he has cleared his contempt and paid the costs." This is confirmed by Hewitt v. McCartney (13 Ves. 560) and Lord Wenman v. Osbaldeston (2 Bro. P. C. 276). The onus is on the appellant to show that one of the exceptions to the general principle applies to this case, and that has not been done.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—A preliminary objection has been taken to this appeal—namely, that the appellant is in contempt, and that therefore the appeal ought not to be heard. The appeal is only against so much of the order of the 10th March 1903 as directs that the costs incident to a summons in chambers taken out by the appellant and adjourned into court should be payable out of her separate property, notwithstanding that such property is subject to a restraint on anticipation. The contempt which is relied upon as debarring the appellant from appealing against that part of the order is thus set forth in the affidavit of Sir George Lewis: "Notwithstanding the undertaking of the respondent not to remove the said child out of the jurisdiction of the court, and in defiance thereof, the respondent, two or three days before the decision of the court, surreptitiously sent the child out of the country, and on the day the court gave judgment she herself left England." The undertaking was given antecedently to the hearing of the summons in court, and the question which we have to determine is whether the objection that the appellant is in contempt ought to prevail. I think it ought not to prevail. We have heard

GORDON v. GORDON.

a great deal about cases which were decided in the Courts of Chancery and of the rules and principles which were laid down by various judges, including Lord Cottenham, in reference to this matter of contempt, and when it should and when it should not debar a would-be appellant, or applicant, from being heard. The greater part of the cases are set out in the notes to Chuck v. Cremer (ubi sup.), but I do not think it is necessary for me to go through those cases. I think that there are general principles which apply to this case, and which are not really affected by the decisions to which our attention has been particularly called. What I mean is that, taking it generally, it has not been disputed in the discussion before us that this rule that a person who is in contempt cannot be heard, prima facie applies to voluntary applications on his part, to cases where he comes and asks for something, and not to cases in which all that he is seeking is to be heard in respect of matters of defence. I do not for one moment suggest that it is every matter of defence which entitles a person in contempt to be heard; for instance, if an order has been made in the exercise of the discretion of the court, and someone who is oppressed, or thinks himself oppressed, by that order appeals, saying that the court has exercised its discretion wrongly, that person if he is in contempt cannot be heard to say anything of the sort until he has purged his contempt. Garstin v. Garstin (ubi sup.) is an instance of that kind. But when you come to the case of an order which it is suggested may have been made without jurisdiction, if, upon looking at the order one can see that that really is the ground of the appeal, it seems to me that such a case has always been treated as one in which the court will entertain the objection to the order, though the person making the objection is in contempt. It was admitted, and could not be otherwise than admitted, that if the objection was to the very order which had created the contempt and the objection was one of the character which I have described, the fact that the person taking the objection was in contempt would not deprive him of the right to be heard. I do not propose to consider the rule laid down by Lord Cottenham in Barker v. Dawson (ubi sup.), for the reason that the order of events here, as stated in Sir George Lewis' affidavit, was different from that with reference to which Lord Cottenham laid down the rule that a person in contempt could not be heard. In the present case the contempt was committed before, not after, the order appealed from, and his rule has, therefore, no application to the present case. That being so, the simple point which we have to decide now is this: Here is an order, the objection to which is obviously of a character which does not depend upon an exercise of the discretion of the court. It is said that it is unlawful to make such an order in respect of the separate property of a woman which is subject to a restraint on anticipation—that is to say, unlawful for the court by which the order was made and on the occasion on which it was made—and it is said that we ought not to look at the order because this lady, this divorced wife, is in contempt. In my judgment that is not so. Having regard to the nature of the objection, in my opinion the present appellant is merely coming here to say: "This order which has been made against me is an illegal order, and it appears to be so upon the face of the order itself." That being so, I am of opinion that no rule has been brought to our notice which should prevent her from being heard. I wish only to add that, supposing this order is in fact an illegal order, and we were to refuse to hear the appellant now, it by no means follows that there would not be any opportunity hereafter of questioning the order. But be that how it may, I think that, having regard to the fact that the objection is to the legality of the order, it would not be right to allow an order to be enforced without first determining the question of its legality. I think, under these circumstances, we ought to hear the appeal.

STIRLING, L.J.—I also think that the appeal ought to be heard. The counsel for the husband have relied very much on the decision of Lord Cottenham in Chuck v. Cremer (ubi sup.). If I thought our decision involved a departure from what was there laid down by Lord Cottenham, I should desire to consider the matter further, but when the sequence of events is ascertained it appears to me that the present case is not identical with Chuck v. Cremer. In that case the order of events was this: The defendant moved that an injunction granted ex parte might be dissolved; his application was unsuccessful, and he gave notice of motion by way of appeal. Previously to the notice of the appeal motion being given, an attachment was issued against the defendant for not having put in his answer. Upon the motion being opened, it was objected that the defendant was in contempt, and could not be heard. The Lord Chancellor gave effect to the objection, but he said: "That a party was entitled to be heard if his object was to get rid of the order, or other proceeding which placed him in contempt, and he was also entitled to be heard for the purpose of resisting or setting aside for irregularity any proceedings subsequent to his contempt." Here, according to the affidavit which the husband has himself put forward, the contempt began two or three days before the order in question was made. Therefore, if we allow the appeal to be heard, we shall in no way contravene what Lord Cottenham there said. Here the question is not merely one of irregularity in the order, but one of want of jurisdiction in the court. Having regard to that, I entirely agree that the appeal ought to be heard.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. Until recently no court had jurisdiction, to direct the payment of costs out of the separate estate of a married woman subject to restraint on anticipation; but the Married Women's Property Act 1893 has by sect. 2 in terms enacted that in certain cases the court shall have jurisdiction from time to time to direct payment of costs out of the separate estate of a married woman which is subject to a restraint on anticipation. This is plainly a limited jurisdiction, and the only object of this appeal, as I understand it, is to raise the contention that this is not one of the limited class of cases in which that jurisdiction is given to the court by sect. 2 of the Act. That being so, I entirely agree with my learned brethren that the preliminary objection ought to be disallowed. But I desire to limit my judgment to a case in which the appellant contends that the order complained of is outside the jurisdiction of the court, as distinguished from the case of an order which, although it is within the jurisdiction of the court, ought not, it is said, to have been made. So far as I can see, there is no principle opposed to the view which we are taking, nor do I think that there is any authority against it. Speaking for myself, I have been unable to discover what principle, if any, is at the root of the distinction, which has been taken in some of the cases cited to us, between contempt committed before and contempt committed after the making of the order which it is sought to set aside.

Bargrave Deane, K.C. and Methold for the appellant.—There was no jurisdiction to make this order for the payment of costs out of the appellant's separate estate subject to a restraint on anticipation. It does not come within sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act 1893, which gives power to make such an order only "in any action or proceeding now or hereafter instituted by a woman or by a next friend on her behalf." That means an action or proceeding in the nature of an action initiated by a married woman as plaintiff; and does not include any motion or step made or taken by a married woman in an action in which she is defendant:

An appeal by a woman from a judgment in an action in which she is defendant is not a "proceeding instituted" within the meaning of that section:

Hood-Barrs v. Heriot, 76 L. T. Rep. 299; (1897) A. C. 177.

This summons was a step in the divorce suit, and was not an action or proceeding taken by the appellant.

Duke, K.C. and Priestley, K.C. for the petitioner.—When the summons was taken out the decree nisi had been made absolute, and the divorce suit was at an end. The summons ought not to have been entitled in the suit. The court has a statutory jurisdiction with reference to the custody of children independently of divorce proceedings under sect. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61). That provides that an application for the custody of children may be made by petition after a final decree. It is an independent proceeding, and there is nothing to show by whom such petition may be presented. The question litigated on this summons was whether the petitioner was the father of the child, and that is a matter outside the divorce proceedings. The summons was therefore a proceeding initiated by the appellant:

Nunn and Co. v. Tyson, 85 L. T. Rep. 123; (1901) 2 K. B. 487.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have not the slightest doubt that this summons was a step in the divorce suit, and that it did not initiate any new litigation. Under these circumstances it is plain, having regard to the decisions in Hood-Barrs v. Cathcart (ubi sup.) and Hood-Barrs v. Heriot (ubi sup.), and the other cases, that there is no jurisdiction to make this order for the payment of costs out of this lady's separate property which is subject to a restraint on anticipation. I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more. It is admitted that costs cannot be ordered to be paid out of funds as to which a married woman is restrained from anticipation unless those costs come within the words of sect. 2—that is, unless they are costs of a proceeding initiated by the married woman. I am of opinion that this summons was not initiated by the married woman, but was a mere step in the previous litigation.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Two orders were made by the Divorce Court on the 25th Nov. 1901. The first was the decree nisi in the suit by which, after the provisions with reference to the dissolution of the marriage, it was ordered that the only child of the marriage "do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court, but it is directed that such child be not removed out of the jurisdiction of the court without its sanction." The other order of the 25th Nov. 1901 was that the child be "forthwith delivered up to and do remain in the custody of the petitioner until further order of the court." Both orders were of a temporary nature, "until further order." Afterwards, on the 15th Oct. 1902, the wife took out a summons asking that those orders should be varied. The question we have to decide is this: whether within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Married Women's Property Act 1893 this was a proceeding "instituted" by the wife. It has been held by the House of Lords as well as by this court that, as Lord Herschell said in Hood-Barrs v. Heriot (76 L. T. Rep. 299; (1897) A. C. 179), these words refer "to an action or some other litigation initiated by the married woman." Can it, then, be said that this summons was "an action or some other litigation initiated by the married woman"? I think not. It seems to me to be simply a continuation of the litigation which had been commenced by the husband by the institution of the suit for the dissolution of the marriage, in which from the very first the question of the custody of the child was a subject of litigation, and was not finally determined by the two orders to which I have referred.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that, both in form and in substance, this application by the appellant was made by her in the suit of Gordon v. Gordon, and was not an independent proceeding initiated by her.

BRITISH HOME AND HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES v. ROYAL HOSPITAL FOR INCURABLES. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Will—Charitable gift—Ambiguity—Uncertainty of object—Erroneous recital in codicil.

A testatrix by will made in 1897, among other legacies to charitable institutions, bequeathed to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., mentioning accurately the name of its secretary and address of its office, 250l. By codicil made in 1902, after reciting twice incorrectly that she had given by will 500l. to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W. . . . and, amongst others, to St. M.'s Orphanage, Bayswater, 100l., she revoked all the legacies, "and instead thereof" bequeathed 500l. each to the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., and to St. M.'s Orphanage.

The legacy of 500l. was claimed by the Royal Hospital for Incurables and by the plaintiff institution, founded in 1861 by the name of the British Home for Incurables, and in 1899 incorporated by Royal Charter by its present name.

Held, that, having regard to entries in a book kept by the testatrix containing particulars of her charitable contributions, she distinguished the two institutions as the "Royal" and the "British," and, therefore, on the true construction of the codicil, the Royal Hospital for Incurables was entitled to the legacy.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (89 L. T. Rep. 495) reversed.

MARGARET ANN LOCHLAN, by her will dated the 19th July 1897, among other charitable legacies, bequeathed "to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W. (present secretary, R. G. Salmon, Esquire, 72, Cheapside, London, E.C.), two hundred and fifty pounds."

On the 11th Feb. 1902 the testatrix executed a codicil to her will which, so far as material, was in the following terms:

Whereas I have by my said will given the following legacies, subject to duty, videlicet, to the London Hospital in Whitechapel-road, London, E., 500l.; to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., 500l.; to the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., 500l.; to St. Mary's Hospital, Cambridge-place, Paddington, W., 100l.; and to St. Matthew's Orphanage, Bayswater, London, W., 100l. Now I hereby revoke all the said legacies, and instead thereof I give 500l. each, subject to duty, to the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., and to St. Matthew's Orphanage aforesaid, to be paid to the treasurer or other proper officer of the respective institutions for the general purposes thereof.

The testatrix died on the 22nd Feb. 1902, and her will and codicil were proved by the executors on the 3rd April 1902, and they paid 500l. to the defendant institution, and the plaintiff institution then commenced an action claiming the 500l.

The plaintiff institution was founded in 1861 by the name of the British Home for Incurables. Since 1894 it had been situated at Streatham, S.W. Its secretary and office were correctly designated in the will. It was in Nov. 1899 incorporated by Royal Charter by the name of the British Home and Hospital for Incurables.

The Royal Hospital for Incurables was founded in 1854, and is situated at West Hill, Putney Heath.

There was evidence, which Kekewich, J. held admissible, to the effect that for the three last years of her life testatrix had subscribed to both societies under the respective names, as shown by her diary and the counterfoils of her cheque-book, of the "British Home" and the "Royal Home" or "Hos" (short for hospital) except during the year 1901, when she paid 3l. 3s. to the defendant institution and nothing to the plaintiff institution. In 1900 she subscribed 3l. 3s. to each, and in 1899 3l. 3s. to the plaintiff and 2l. 2s. to the defendant institution.

Kekewich, J. held that the British Home and Hospital for Incurables was entitled to the legacy, and from this decision the defendant institution appealed.

Warrington, K.C., Howard Wright, and Marten for the appellants.—The testatrix was accustomed, when referring to these institutions in her books, to call them "British" and "Royal," and therefore the use of the word "Royal" shows she intended the legacy for the defendant institution, although she made a mistake as to the address.

Stewart-Smith, K.C. and G. H. Devonshire for the plaintiff institution.—Between the date of the will and codicil a Royal Charter had been granted to this institution, and circulars announcing that fact were sent to all the subscribers, so that the testatrix might well have used the word "Royal" when referring to that institution. She refers to the legatee as the "Home," and the defendant institution is not called a "Home," and it is not at Streatham. The testatrix knew the proper address of both, and in her book of subscriptions describes the defendant institution as of Putney. In favour of the plaintiff institution is the word "Home" and the address as against the word "Royal" in favour of the other institution.

—Marten for the executors.

Warrington, K.C. in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This appeal is a rehearing. The conclusion of Kekewich, J. is not a conclusion based upon the value which the learned judge put upon the testimony which was before him; it is merely a question of the inference to be drawn from a document and from undisputed facts. In such a case, even if we think there was strong ground for the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived, yet, if we think it is clear that there is strong ground for the other conclusion, our duty in a court of equity is to decide in accordance with the way in which we think the balance plainly lies, and my conclusion here is that having regard to this codicil the balance is in favour, and I think strongly in favour, of the Royal. Now, with regard to the words of the will itself, we must consider which shall prevail—the word "Royal" or the address. I wish to say here that in the argument presented to us by counsel for the plaintiff institution they rather contended that we had not to balance "Royal" against the address; that one had, in addition to the address in favour of the "British," the words "Home for Incurables," which, it was said, was appropriate to the "British" and not to the "Royal," the Royal being a hospital and not a home. As to that, I think an examination of the documents in this lady's own handwriting makes the matter quite conclusive, and shows quite conclusively that she called both these institutions "Home for Incurables"; and therefore I think that the right way of looking at this codicil is to ask oneself which is to prevail—the name "Royal" or the address "Streatham"? As I have said, not only does this lady in these documents speak of them and write of them both as being "Home for Incurables," but it is obvious that in her mind the distinction between the two is in the first name. The one is the "British" and the other is the "Royal." It seems to me that, if one tries to put oneself as far as possible in the state of mind and state of habit of this lady when dealing with these charities, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that she distinguishes these institutions as being one the "British" and the other the "Royal." Now, that being so, I should on those grounds decide in favour of the "Royal." It seems to me extremely improbable that the testatrix would have made a mistake when she mentioned the "Royal"; and, whilst speaking on this point, I cannot help bearing in mind that the Royal was a name which, having regard to what she was doing, she was very little likely to have on her tongue, or to mention by unconscious cerebration, or to have mentioned at all, unless she was going to give the legacy; because it is to be remembered that she knew what her antecedent will was, and the name of the Royal would not be running in her head as an institution the legacy to which was to be revoked. One cannot see why she should have "Royal" running in her mind at all except for the purpose of giving a legacy to the Royal. Now, if that is the right conclusion, is there anything else to make one depart from it? I think not. If you look at the whole character of this codicil, it is obvious that she is making this codicil on this basis: "I will revoke my old legacies to these charities and will revoke some of them for the purpose of revoking them altogether and depriving the charities of the benefit, and I will revoke others for the purpose of increasing them." That being so, there is no reason in the nature of things why she should not have revoked the legacy to the "British" on the ground that she meant to revoke it altogether and not for the purpose of increasing it. If she really meant to increase it, it is an odd thing, to say the least of it, that the figure she mentions when she comes to give the legacies is identical with the figure of the legacy which she mentions in the revoking clause. Under these circumstances I must say I think that the balance is strongly in favour of the Royal, and that we ought to decide in favour of that institution.

SIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I am unfortunate enough to differ from Kekewich, J. as to the construction that he places on the codicil, he approaching it without any regard to the evidence which has been given as to the mode in which this lady dealt with these two societies. The learned judge, as I read his judgment, appears to have placed great weight on the use of the word "aforesaid," which he treats as being, according to the true grammatical construction of the codicil, used in connection both with "the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W.," and "the St. Matthew's Orphanage." I am unable to take that view. It seems to me that when you look to the fact that the gift is in these terms, "the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W.," and to "St. Matthew's Orphanage aforesaid," the "aforesaid" naturally goes with St. Matthew's Orphanage in accordance with the construction of the grammatical meaning. No doubt the omission of the second "to" would make a great difference, but there the preposition is twice inserted—first, before the "Royal Home," and, secondly, before "St. Matthew's Orphanage." That seems to me to lie at the foundation of the learned judge's judgment as I read it, and on that point I am unable to agree with him. Now, approaching the construction of the codicil, bearing in mind the facts which are in evidence, how does it stand? The testatrix gives by her will a legacy to the British Home for Incurables. She then recites, by a codicil made nearly five years afterwards, that she had given certain legacies, and, amongst others, one to "the British Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W., 500l." The amount is incorrect, no doubt, but still she had given one to that institution. She proceeds: "I hereby revoke all the said legacies, and instead thereof I give 500l. each, subject to duty, to the Royal Home for Incurables, Streatham, S.W." The lady was perfectly well aware of the existence of the two institutions, one called in strictness "the British Home and Hospital for Incurables," and the other "the Royal Hospital for Incurables." She had been in the habit for years of giving donations to both; and we have in a memorandum-book in which she recorded her benefactions, occurring repeatedly and in successive lines, gifts to these two institutions. In the year 1899 she enters "British Home In." three guineas, and under "Royal In." two guineas. Exactly the same thing takes place in the year 1900; in which case it is "British Home Incurables," three guineas; "Royal ditto," three guineas; and in the last year in which there is an entry she began evidently "British Home for Incurables," and then that is written over by the name of another society, and then "Royal ditto" as before, so that it appears to me (and this is confirmed by the entry which she made on the counterfoil of the cheque) that she recognised the existence of these two societies, and yet in her own mind distinguished the one as "the British" and the other as "the Royal." Now, when we come to apply that knowledge to the construction of the codicil, it seems to me that the fact of reciting first the gift to the British and then giving a legacy to the Royal is very strong, and outweighs the fact that in the first place the address is at Streatham; and there is also the fact that she describes the Royal as "the Royal Home," it being strictly "the Royal Hospital for Incurables." I am unable, therefore, to agree with Kekewich, J. in the conclusion he came to, and think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I cannot bring myself to doubt that the distinction between these two charities, as indicated by the lady's own use of the name on the counterfoils and the books, was that the one was "the British" and the other was "the Royal." I draw the same conclusion from the codicil itself, where, having accurately described "the British," she revokes the legacy to "the British" and gives an increased legacy to "the Royal." It is true that the Royal is called "Home for Incurables," and is not called by its full title "Hospital for Incurables," but it is manifest from the books, to which Mr. Warrington has referred, that she repeatedly called the appellant charity "the Royal Home for Incurables" and not "the Royal Hospital for Incurables." There is only one more point, which is one that was made by Mr. Marten in his very clear address to us, that, although the word "Streatham" was wrong, "S. W." was quite right; and, if she had put "the Royal Home for Incurables," there would really have been no ambiguity. I respectfully

KILGOUR v. GADDES. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Prescription—Easement—Right of way—Forty years' enjoyment—Two tenements held under same owner—Prescription by one tenant against another tenant of same owner—Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 2.

A tenant cannot, by enjoyment for a period of forty years, acquire a prescriptive right to an easement, such as a right of way, under sect. 2 of the Prescription Act 1832, as against another tenant of the same landlord.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Walton, J., upon further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant claiming damages for trespass to land and an injunction.

The plaintiff and the defendant occupied adjoining houses in Longtown. The plaintiff was the assignee of a lease granted by Sir James Graham on the 13th July 1850 for the term of ninety-nine years; and the defendant was the assignee of a lease granted by Sir James Graham on the 10th Jan. 1850.

The reversions on these two leases were always vested in one and the same owner.

Between the two houses there was a passage over which the occupiers of both houses had a right of way to the back yards of their respective houses.

In the yard at the back of the plaintiff's house there was a pump. This yard opened into the said passage.

Until 1902 there was no fence separating the plaintiff's yard from the common passage, and the pump was as accessible from the back of the defendant's premises as from the back of the plaintiff's premises.

A dispute having arisen with regard to the use of the passage, the plaintiff in 1902 erected a screen and door which prevented the plaintiff from using the pump. The defendant broke the door, and thereby obtained access to the pump.

The plaintiff thereupon brought this action claiming damages and an injunction.

The defendant denied that the place where the pump was situate was the property of or in the possession of the plaintiff; and he claimed a prescriptive right to use the pump by user for forty years, under the Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71); and he counter-claimed a declaration of his right to use the pump, and damages, and an injunction.

The action was tried before Walton, J. with a jury. The jury found, in answer to questions left to them by the learned judge: (1) That the pump had been used as of right by the occupiers of the defendant's premises for forty years before action; and (2) that it was so used at and before the grant of the defendant's lease.

The argument of the questions of law was reserved for further consideration, the plaintiff having leave to amend his reply by pleading specially, under sect. 5 of the Prescription Act, that the alleged servient tenement had been held under a lease during the whole period of forty years; the learned judge having power to decide all questions of law and fact subject to the findings of the jury.

The learned judge, upon further consideration, found that the pump was upon land included in the plaintiff's lease; and that there was no definite path or way at any time from the defendant's premises to the pump affording any apparent sign of the easement claimed. The learned judge, therefore, held that the defendant had not any easement by express or implied grant; but he held that the defendant had acquired a prescriptive right against the plaintiff by forty years' enjoyment, under sect. 2 of the Prescription Act, and gave judgment in the defendant's favour for damages and an injunction (89 L. T. Rep. 444).

The Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) provides:

Sect. 2. No claim which may be lawfully made at the common law, by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or the use of any water, to be enjoyed or derived upon, over, or from any land or water of our said lord the King, his heirs or successors, or being parcel of the Duchy of Lancaster or of the Duchy of Cornwall, or being the property of any ecclesiastical or lay person or body corporate, when such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been actually enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period of twenty years, shall be defeated or destroyed by showing only that such way or other matter was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years, but, nevertheless, such claim may be defeated in any other way by which the same is now liable to be defeated; and where such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been so enjoyed as aforesaid for the full period of forty years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing.

Sect. 5. In all actions upon the case and other pleadings, wherein the party claiming may now by law allege his right generally, without averring the existence of such right from time immemorial, such general allegation shall still be deemed sufficient, and if the same shall be denied, all and every the matters in this Act mentioned and provided, which shall be applicable to the case, shall be admissible in evidence to sustain or rebut such allegation; and in all pleadings to actions of trespass, and in all other pleadings wherein before the passing of this Act it would have been necessary to allege the right to have existed from time immemorial, it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof of right by the occupiers of the tenement in respect whereof the same is claimed for and during such of the periods mentioned in this Act as may be applicable to the case, and without claiming in the name or right of the owner of the fee, as is now usually done; and if the other party shall intend to rely on any proviso, exception, incapacity, disability, contract, agreement, or other matter hereinbefore mentioned, or on any clause or matter of fact or of law not inconsistent with the simple fact of enjoyment, the same shall be specially alleged and set forth in answer to the allegation of the party claiming, and shall not be received in evidence on any general traverse or denial of such allegation.

The plaintiff appealed.

L. Sanderson, K.C. and J. Lumb for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the defendant could claim a right of way under the Prescription Act. That right can be claimed under the Act only under sect. 2. To acquire a right under sect. 2, the enjoyment must be "as of right." A man cannot enjoy a right of way over his own land, and a tenant cannot enjoy as of right an easement over other land of his landlord. A man cannot prescribe for a right of way or other easement over his own land:

Large v. Pitt, Peake Add. Cas. 152.

Under the Act the enjoyment of an easement within sect. 2 must be "as of right," whether it has been for a period of twenty years or for the full period of forty years. This is made clear by the provisions of sect. 5 of the Act which prescribe the rules of pleading and of proof. The provisions of sect. 3, which relate only to light, do not use the words "as of right," and the right to light is made indefeasible by any enjoyment for twenty years unless it be under a written consent or agreement. The cases, therefore, which have been decided under sect. 3 have no application to a case within sect. 2. A right of way cannot be acquired by prescription for a term of years; it can only be acquired by or on behalf of the owner of the fee of one tenement against the owner in fee of another tenement. The possession of the tenant is in contemplation of law the possession of his landlord, and therefore one tenant cannot prescribe against another tenant of the same landlord:

Gayford v. Moffatt, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 133;

Timmons v. Hewitt, 22 L. Rep. Ir. 627.

The learned judge relied upon the judgment of Chitty, J. in Harris v. De Pinna (54 L. T. Rep. 38; 33 Ch. Div. 238). That case was decided upon the authority of two Irish cases:

Beggan v. McDonald, Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 362; 2 L. Rep. Ir. 560;

Fahey v. Dwyer, 4 L. Rep. Ir. 271.

The former of these two cases is no authority for the decision in this case, because it was a case of two tenants holding under different owners in fee; and Fahey v. Dwyer (ubi sup.) was decided upon a misapprehension of Beggan v. McDonald (ubi sup.) and of Frewen v. Philipps (11 C. B. N. S. 449), which was a decision under sect. 3 of the Act as to the right to light. The judgment of Chitty, J. in Harris v. De Pinna (ubi sup.) is inconsistent with the case in the Court of Appeal of Wheaton v. Maple and Co. (69 L. T. Rep. 208; (1893) 3 Ch. 48), in which Lindley, L.J. clearly states the law to be that a right of way cannot be claimed by prescription for a term of years. That was the principle of the decision in Bright v. Walker (1 C. M. & R. 211; 40 R. R. 536), which was adopted by the Court of Appeal in Wheaton v. Maple and Co. (ubi sup.) The Prescription Act has only shortened the time of prescription, and prevented the claim to an easement by prescription from being defeated by proof of the origin of the user; it has not altered the mode in which prescriptive rights may be acquired, except in the case of light:

James v. Plant, 4 A. & E. 749; 43 R. R. 465.

Cavanagh for the respondent.—The learned judge rightly decided that the defendant had acquired the right claimed by prescription. There is no decision upon this point in the English courts, but there is an express decision in Ireland, in favour of the defendant's contention, in Fahey v. Dwyer (ubi sup.). In Bright v. Walker (ubi sup.) the observations upon this question were merely obiter; and in Wheaton v. Maple and Co. (ubi sup.) the actual decision was with regard to a right to light under sect. 3, the observations of Lindley, L.J., which have been relied on, being unnecessary to the decision. Although at common law such an easement as is here claimed could not be acquired by prescription, yet under sect. 2 of the Prescription Act it can be acquired. In sect. 2 the words "by any person claiming right thereto" refer only to the enjoyment for the shorter period of twenty years, and do not affect the last part of the section, which confers an absolute indefeasible right after enjoyment for forty years unless the enjoyment has been under a written consent or agreement. The provisions of sect. 3 are the same as those of the last part of sect. 2. Therefore a right of way can be acquired under any circumstances and for a term of years, by forty years' enjoyment, just as in the case of light:

Frewen v. Philipps (ubi sup.).

In Harris v. De Pinna (ubi sup.) Chitty, J. expressly held that under sect. 2 of the Act a tenant can, by enjoyment for forty years, acquire an easement against another tenant of the same landlord. Sect. 8 of the Act provides that, in the case of forty years' enjoyment, when the land is in lease the reversioner shall have three years after the determination of the tenancy within which to dispute the right, and that shows that the easement may be acquired by forty years' user which is good against all the world except the reversioner. Enjoyment as of right, in the first part of sect. 2, means only that the enjoyment must have been had openly and without any leave or licence:

Gardner v. Hodgson's Kingston Brewery Company, 88 L. T. Rep. 698; (1903) A. C. 229;

Tickle v. Brown, 4 A. & E. 369; 43 R. R. 358.

L. Sanderson, K.C. was not called upon to reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—The argument in this case has covered a very wide area, but the point when properly understood is a short one. The question is whether as between two termors under the same landlord a right of way by prescription can be acquired for the owner by the one termor against the other. I say "for the owner," because under the Prescription Act 1842 an easement of that kind must be acquired for the owner in fee. In this case, as I have pointed out, the tenants of the so-called dominant and servient tenements held under the same landlord. If that proposition is right, this prescriptive easement must under the Prescription Act be acquired for the owner of the fee. If that were not so, the anomalous result would follow that the tenant of the owner of land would acquire an easement by user of land for the owner of that land. That cannot be so. I have limited what I have said to the case of a right of way and similar rights. In this case we are not concerned with the case of a prescriptive right to light, which stands upon a totally different footing

[CT. OF APP.]

KILGOUR v. GADDES.

[CT. OF APP.]

under the provisions of sect. 3 of the Prescription Act. We have here to deal with a right of way, and easements of that kind, under sect. 2 of the Act. Sect. 2 provides that: "No claim which may be made at the common law by custom, prescription, or grant, to any way or other easement, or to any watercourse, or the use of any water, to be enjoyed or derived upon, over, or from any land or water . . . when such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been actually enjoyed by any person claiming right thereto without interruption for the full period of twenty years shall be defeated or destroyed by showing only that such way or other matter was first enjoyed at any time prior to such period of twenty years, but, nevertheless, such claim may be defeated in any other way by which the same is now liable to be defeated; and where such way or other matter as herein last before mentioned shall have been so enjoyed as aforesaid for the full period of forty years, the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose by deed or writing." On the words of that section it appears that the easement must in all cases have been enjoyed as of right, and that is made clear by the provisions of sect. 5, which prescribes the rules for pleading the right to easements of this kind and enacts that: "In all pleadings to actions of trespass, and in all other pleadings wherein before the passing of this Act it would have been necessary to allege the right to have existed from time immemorial, it shall be sufficient to allege the enjoyment thereof as of right by the occupiers of the tenement in respect whereof the same is claimed for and during such of the periods mentioned in this Act as may be applicable to the case, and without claiming in the name or right of the owner of the fee, as is now usually done." That is a perfectly clear enactment that the enjoyment for the period of twenty years or of forty years must be as of right. The point was taken long since that sect. 5 applied to a claim for a prescriptive right to light, but it was held that it did not. As has been pointed out by Romer, L.J. in the present case, and almost in the same language as that used by Palles, C.B., in explaining why the occupier cannot acquire the right for the owner, the reason is that the enjoyment and user cannot be as of right. In Timmons v. Hewitt (22 L. Rep. Ir. 627, 635) Palles, C.B. said: "These extracts from the judgments in Beggan v. McDonald (Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 362; 2 L. Rep. Ir. 560) appear to me to show that the case is no authority upon the question at present before us. Where the two tenements are held by termors under the same landlord, prescription does not apply; because, as pointed out by Lord Cairns, in Gayford v. Moffatt (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 135), 'the possession of the tenant of the demised close is the possession of his landlord; and it seems to me an utter violation of the first principles of the relation of landlord and tenant to suppose that the tenant, whose occupation of close A was the occupation of his landlord, could by that occupation acquire an easement over close B, also belonging to his landlord.' This doctrine was approved and acted upon by the Court of Common Pleas in this country in Clancy v. Byrne (Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 355). If I am asked how it is consistent with the Prescription Act, I answer that such user and enjoyment is not as of right within the meaning of the 2nd section. It is a user by a termor, who, if he acquire the right, must acquire it as incident to the land of which he is termor, and thus for the benefit of his reversioner. Such user cannot be as of right, unless a reversioner can in law by user acquire a right against himself." So stands the law upon the question. That seems to me to be conclusive of this case. There has been a long argument as to the possibility of a termor under one landlord acquiring a prescriptive right of way as against the termor under another owner of other land. That raises an interesting question. It has been decided in Ireland that such a right can be acquired. That is contrary to the view which has been expressed in this country, and is contrary to the cases of Bright v. Walker (1 C. M. & R. 211; 40 R. R. 536) and Wheaton v. Maple (69 L. T. Rep. 208; (1893) 3 Ch. 48), though the point was not absolutely necessary to the decision in those two cases. That question, however, has nothing whatever to do with the question in the present case. The judgment of Walton, J. in the present case is based entirely upon the authority of the judgment of Chitty, J. in Harris v. De Pinna (54 L. T. Rep. 38; 33 Ch. Div. 238). In that case it was a subsidiary point, but Chitty, J. expressed the opinion that an easement such as this could be acquired by prescription by one tenant of a landlord over land in the occupation of another tenant of the same landlord. When those observations of Chitty, J. are examined they seem to me to be based upon an unsound foundation. His opinion was based upon two cases decided in Ireland—Fahey v. Dwyer (4 L. Rep. Ir. 271) and Beggan v. McDonald (Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 362; 2 L. Rep. Ir. 560). The case of Beggan v. McDonald was not an authority for any proposition of the kind. In that case it was decided that by uninterrupted enjoyment for a period of forty years a right of way might be acquired against a lessee whose lease had been in existence during the whole of that period, the dominant and servient tenements being held under different owners, though the period of three years after the termination of the lease had not expired and it was unknown whether the reversioner would during those three years exercise his right, under sect. 8 of the Act, of resisting the claim. That was a decision in a case in which there were different owners of the two tenements, and not a case of two termors under the same owner, and therefore is no authority that an easement can be acquired by prescription by one termor against another termor under the same owner. Then came the case of Fahey v. Dwyer (ubi sup.), the other case upon which Chitty, J. relied. That case does purport to be a decision as to the possibility of the acquisition of a prescriptive right of way by one tenant against another tenant of the same landlord. The headnote to that case is: "A prescriptive right of way may be acquired in respect of one tenement, by user for forty years, against another held for a term of years under the same landlord; and such right is not necessarily determined upon the expiration of the lease, when the tenant of the servient tenement continues in occupation upon the same terms as before." Upon examining that case we find that the decision was based upon a misconception of the previous case of Beggan v. McDonald (ubi sup.). In delivering the judgment, Lawson, J. said: "We think that in this case the defendant is entitled to maintain the verdict which he has got. He has a right of way, which he has been in the enjoyment of, as of right, for a period of forty years, as found by the jury. I see no reason why the Prescription Act should not apply as between two tenants of adjoining lands. Mr. Gibson has argued that it cannot. That is met by the case of Frewen v. Philipps (11 C. B. N. S. 449) and the observations of Kindersley, V.C. in Daniel v. Anderson (7 L. T. Rep. 183). There is no reason why it should not apply as between two tenants so as to bind them, though the landlord should not be bound. But if there was any difficulty about the case, Beggan v. McDonald (ubi sup.) appears to remove it; for it decided that a period of forty years' enjoyment is absolute and indefeasible, and that Bright v. Walker (1 C. M. & R. 211) applies only to a twenty years' enjoyment." Therefore Chitty, J. based his opinion upon those cases. He was misled, in applying the case of Frewen v. Philipps (11 C. B. N. S. 449), by the headnote to the report into supposing that it decided that the fact that two tenements are occupied under distinct leases both held under the same landlord is not material, and that one tenant or lessee acquires, notwithstanding the unity of seisin, an easement as against the other. The case did not decide that, but only that under sect. 3 of the Act an indefeasible right to light can be acquired by twenty years' enjoyment, although both tenements belong to the same owner; that decision had nothing to do with the acquisition of a right of way or water, and did not decide that such a right could be acquired under the Act by one tenant against another tenant of the same owner. The case of Beggan v. McDonald (ubi sup.), as I have already explained, does not apply to the claim of an easement by prescription by one tenant against another tenant of the same owner. Therefore that case is not an adequate foundation for the conclusion at which Chitty, J. arrived; and for the reasons which I have given I cannot approve of that opinion. Then, in Wheaton v. Maple (ubi sup.), we find the rule laid down, and very clearly stated, by Lindley, L.J. He there deals with the possibility of tenants acquiring easements against each other by prescription, and says: "It is true that it has been said that, after an uninterrupted enjoyment of light for twenty years, a covenant not to interrupt will be presumed. But I am not aware of any authority for presuming, as a matter of law, a lost grant by a lessee for years in the case of ordinary easements, or a lost covenant by such a person not to interrupt in the case of light, and I am certainly not prepared to introduce another fiction to support a claim to a novel prescriptive right. The whole theory of prescription at common law is against presuming any grant or covenant not to interrupt, by or with anyone except an owner in fee. A right claimed by prescription must be claimed as appendant or appurtenant to land, and not as annexed to it for a term of years. Although, therefore, a grant by a lessee of the Crown, commensurate with his lease, might be inferred as a fact, if there was evidence to justify the inference, there is no legal presumption, as distinguished from an inference in fact, in favour of such a grant. This view of the common law is in entire accordance with Bright v. Walker (ubi sup.), where this doctrine of presumption is carefully examined." That, indeed, deals with the question of implied grant, and not with the Prescription Act. In another part of his judgment, however, he does deal with the Prescription Act, and says: "I come now to the last question—viz., whether sect. 3 has conferred an easement as against the Crown's lessees. So far as mere language is concerned, and apart from the nature of the subject-matter with which the section is dealing, I should see no difficulty in applying sect. 3 to all English subjects, whether lessees of the Crown or other people; I should see no difficulty in reading 'absolute and indefeasible' as meaning absolute and indefeasible against all persons to whom the section is applicable. But if the section is so read, the consequence will necessarily be to create, by mere occupation and enjoyment, a class of easements which at common law could never have been acquired by prescription, but only by express agreement or grant. An easement for a term of years may, of course, be created by grant; but such an easement cannot be gained by prescription, and, not being capable of being so acquired, it does not fall within the scope of the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71. The expression 'absolute and indefeasible,' as applied to easements of all kinds, coupled with the declared object of the Act, which is to shorten the time of prescription, shows that the easements dealt with were easements appendant or appurtenant to land, and which, when acquired, imposed a burden for ever on the servient tenement." This view of the statute was clearly expressed, soon after it was passed, in Bright v. Walker (ubi sup.), and, although some passages in Parke, B.'s judgment in that case have been criticised, and even dissented from, the broad view which underlies the judgment has never been disapproved." That is a clear authority for the proposition that, when the easement is not one of light, and the claim is made under the Prescription Act, the claim to an easement can be made in respect of the fee alone. That is a sufficient answer to the defendant's claim in this case. That opinion of the Court of Appeal is inconsistent with the view of Chitty, J. expressed in Harris v. De Pinna (ubi sup.). I am therefore of opinion that the decision of Walton, J. was wrong, and that this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In Wheaton v. Maple (ubi sup.) it was pointed out that under the Prescription Act an easement could not be acquired for a term of years. It must, with regard to both the dominant and servient tenement, be acquired in respect of the fee. In this case the easement is claimed under sect. 2 of the Act, and the enjoyment referred to in that section must be enjoyment as of right, and in that respect it is different from the easement of light dealt with by sect. 3 of the Act. Now, when such an easement as this is sought to be established, how can the enjoyment be said to be as of right when there is a common owner of the fee of both tenements? As was pointed out by Lord Cairns, in Gayford v. Moffatt (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 133), the occupation of the tenant is in law that of his landlord, and when the owner goes cr.

adjoining land of his landlord, he does not do so as of right in respect of an alleged dominant tenement, the land being the freeholder's own land. Upon that short ground I think that this appeal must succeed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The simple point raised on this appeal has not been satisfactorily answered by the respondent. That point is that there was a common owner of the two tenements, and that, therefore, the alleged easement could not be acquired. An easement at common law can only be acquired by prescription when the dominant and servient tenements belong to different owners. There must be enjoyment as of right in respect of the dominant tenement over the servient tenement. That rule of law has been clearly laid down in Wheaton v. Maple (ubi sup.). How can the enjoyment be as of right when both tenements are owned by the same person? Test the question by the case where it is said that there is a presumption of a lost grant. There cannot be a lost grant by the owner of the land to himself. That seems to me to be conclusive of the whole question. Under the Prescription Act it is said that there can be a statutory easement which could not be acquired at common law. There is, however, a distinction between an easement of this kind and an easement of light, which has been pointed out; and an easement of this kind cannot be acquired under the Act where there is common ownership of the two tenements. I agree that this appeal must be allowed.

KAUFMAN v. GERSON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Contract made in France—Duress and undue influence—Agreement not to prosecute—Contract not invalid in France—Validity of contract in England.

The courts of this country will not enforce a contract made in a foreign civilised country between persons domiciled in that country, if it has been obtained by coercion, whether moral or physical, even though the contract is valid and enforceable by the law of the country in which it was made.

APPEAL of the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of 134*l.* alleged to be due under an agreement.

The plaintiff had intrusted a sum of money to the defendant's husband, in France, to be used for a particular purpose in France. All the parties were then domiciled in France.

The defendant's husband appropriated the money to his own use instead of applying it to the purpose for which it had been handed to him.

His conduct was criminal according to the law of France, and the plaintiff threatened a prosecution.

Under the influence of threats made by the plaintiff, and in order to prevent the prosecution of her husband and to protect the good name of her children, the defendant, who had property of her own, signed an agreement in Paris, upon the terms that there should be no prosecution of her husband, by which she agreed that she would by instalments spread over three years pay the plaintiff the amount which her husband had misappropriated.

An expert in French law, whose evidence was not contradicted, gave evidence that such an agreement was not invalid by the law of France either upon the ground that it was made in order to stifle a criminal prosecution or upon the ground that it was obtained by duress or undue influence.

The defendant by various instalments paid to the plaintiff the sum of 80*l.*, leaving a balance of 134*l.* due under the agreement.

The defendant having come to reside in England, the plaintiff brought this action to recover the balance of 134*l.*

The defendant set up a counter-claim claiming repayment of the money which she had paid under the agreement.

The action was tried before Wright, J., without a jury, and the learned judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff: (88 L. T. Rep. 691).

The defendant appealed.

Montague Shearman, K.C. and Eustace G. Hills for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that this contract can be enforced in the courts of this country. This contract will not be enforced by English courts, because it was made for the purpose of interfering with the course of justice, and also because it was obtained by moral pressure amounting to coercion or duress. The general rule is that a contract which is valid by the law of the country in which it is made is held to be valid in the courts of this country, but there are exceptions to that rule:

Robinson v. Bland, 1 Wm. Black. 257; 2 Burr. 1077;

Biggs v. Lawrence, 3 T. R. 454; 1 R. R. 740.

If a contract made in a foreign country and valid by the law of that country is contrary to what the law of this country deems to be a general principle of morality, the courts of this country will not enforce it:

Re Missouri Steamship Company, 61 L. T. Rep. 316; 42 Ch. Div. 321;

Roussillon v. Roussillon, 42 L. T. Rep. 679; 14 Ch. Div. 351.

A contract which is obtained by coercion of any kind, whether by violence or by unfair moral pressure, is deemed by English law to be contrary to general moral principles and will not be enforced, wherever it was made:

Santos v. Midge, 3 L. T. Rep. 155; 6 C. B. N. S. 841; 8 Id. 861;

Grell v. Levy, 9 L. T. Rep. 721; 16 C. B. N. S. 73;

Hope v. Hope, 8 De G. M. & G. 731;

Quarrier v. Colston, 1 Phillips, 147; 65 R. R. 351.

It is clear upon the evidence that this contract was obtained from the defendant by such moral pressure as to amount to coercion; and the courts of this country will not enforce a contract obtained by coercion, wherever it was made.

Lush, K.C. and Israel Davis for the respondent.—The decision of the learned judge was right. The courts of this country will enforce a contract which is valid according to the law of the country where it was made and was to be performed, unless it violates some principle of morality which is accepted by all civilised countries:

Re Missouri Steamship Company (ubi sup.).

This contract is not within that exception. A contract to stifle a criminal prosecution clearly does not come within that exception. A contract such as this, which is said to be a blackmailing contract, is not such an immoral contract as is meant in that exception. There was no force or physical violence or any coercion of that kind, assuming that the courts of this country would not in any case enforce a contract so obtained. The learned judge has found as a fact that there was not any coercion which was immoral and such as to prevent the contract being enforced in the courts of any civilised country. The courts in France would enforce this contract, and therefore it cannot be said to be a contract so immoral that the courts of no civilised country would enforce it. Coercion, if it can be so called, by threats to institute a criminal prosecution is not immoral in that sense:

Jones v. Merionethshire Permanent Benefit Building Society, 65 L. T. Rep. 685; (1892) 1 Ch. 173.

The courts do not refuse to enforce contracts not to prosecute upon any general moral considerations, but because it is a rule of English law that such contracts will not be enforced:

Williams v. Bayley, 14 L. T. Rep. 802; L. Rep. 1 H. L. 200.

The question is not whether this is a contract which can be enforced by the law of this country. If the French law takes a different view of public policy in matters of this kind from that which is taken by the English law, the courts of this country will give effect to a French contract which is not contrary to the public policy of that country. If the French courts will enforce the contract as not being contrary to public policy, the courts in England will not refuse to enforce it upon the ground that it is contrary to public policy as understood in the English courts. In France the courts would not hold this to be an unfair and invalid contract, and therefore the English courts will not refuse to enforce it. The alleged illegality or immorality must be such as to be contrary to the laws of all civilised countries; such that it would be contrary to the law of natural justice to enforce the contract, as is the rule in the case of foreign judgments:

Story on Conflict of Laws, sects. 245, 258, 7th edit.; Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 32, 766.

[ROMER, L.J. referred to Westlake on Private International Law, sect. 215, 3rd edit.] The defendant secured a benefit by entering into this contract; she thereby acquired the liberty to remove with her property to this country. According to the law of France there was community of goods between her and her husband, and her property could have been made liable for his debts. The defendant has acted upon this contract for a long time after it was made, and therefore she cannot now set up this defence:

Montague Shearman, K.C. was not called upon to reply. He intimated that the appellant's counter-claim would not now be pressed, but without prejudice to the right to insist upon it if the plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Wright, J., and it undoubtedly raises a very important question. The appellant, who is the wife of E. Gerson, was induced, as the learned judge has found, by threats of a criminal prosecution in France against her husband to give an undertaking to the plaintiff to pay to him the money which her husband had misappropriated. During the series of years which followed the making of the agreement, the defendant paid various sums to the plaintiff amounting to 80*l.*, leaving a balance unpaid to the amount of 134*l.* The plaintiff and the defendant both being in England, the plaintiff has sued the defendant here to recover that balance. Two points have been taken on behalf of the defendant. The first, that the agreement was bad because it was an agreement to stifle a criminal prosecution; and the second, that the agreement cannot be enforced in this country because it was obtained by duress or undue influence. The learned judge, after hearing the evidence of a witness who was an expert in French law, came to the conclusion upon the first point that according to the law of France there is nothing wrong about an agreement for valuable consideration to stifle a criminal prosecution; and that as the contract was made in France between parties resident in France, and was intended to be performed in France, the defence that the contract was bad because it was an agreement to stifle a prosecution was not a ground upon which the courts in England ought to stay its hand. The other point is that the circumstances under which this agreement was made were such that the courts in England ought not to enforce it, because the defendant had been coerced by threats into making it. That point raises first the question of fact, whether the defendant has established that the agreement was obtained by coercion. It seems to me that the learned judge has found that it was so obtained. He says: "Gerson appropriated part of the money to his own use instead of applying it in buying skins. His conduct was criminal in France, and a prosecution was threatened. In order to avoid a prosecution and to protect the good name of Gerson's children, his wife, the present defendant, under the influence of Kaufman's threat and at his instance, agreed in writing to make good by instalments out of her own property the amount of the defalcation, on the express terms that there should be no prosecution on the part of Kaufman." When we look at the evidence given by the defendant at the trial, it appears to be perfectly clear that it was under threats of a criminal prosecution that she agreed to sign the undertaking to pay. It is said that there are two answers to the suggestion that this contract cannot be enforced in an English court. The first answer is that the defendant and her husband were domiciled in France and were married without a settlement and under the

[CT. OF APP.]

KAUFMAN v. GERSON.

[CT. OF APP.]

French law as to community of goods of husband and wife, and that therefore the wife was civilly liable with her husband for his debts. However that may be, it is obvious that the plaintiff was not content with that remedy and sought to obtain more from her, and that by exercising the strongest possible moral pressure he sought to get more security from her, and that she, yielding to that pressure, was constrained into giving the guarantee which it is now sought to enforce, and paid money under it. It is quite obvious from the correspondence that under continued threats of a prosecution of her husband she made the payments which she did make, until she was finally driven by the proceedings in this action to set up the defence which she has now set up. I think that the real point in this case is whether an agreement obtained under such circumstances can be enforced in an English court. I will not deal with the first point raised on behalf of the defendant, that any contract to interfere with the course of justice cannot be enforced in the courts of this country. The law of France appears to be different from English law upon that question, and I am not prepared to say that, if such a contract is a good contract in France, it might not be enforced in the courts of this country. I am not prepared to say now that it cannot be enforced, but it is not necessary to give a final opinion upon that point in the present case. I come then to the real point in this case upon which I propose to decide this appeal. It is said that by the law of France an agreement obtained by moral pressure can be enforced in that country. Wright, J., in his judgment, deals with that question, and, although he clearly thought that some pressure had been exercised, yet he came to the conclusion that the agreement could be enforced in France, and that it could, therefore, also be enforced in the courts of this country. He said: "The second ground on which the contract in the present case is impeached is that it was obtained by the undue influence or duress of a threat to prosecute the husband for crime. If this objection is to be regarded as based on considerations of public policy, the same answer applies as in the case of the first objection. It seems, however, to be more in the nature of an objection to the proof of consent of the defendant to the contract, a consent induced by duress or undue influence being by English law treated as no consent. If this be the correct view, it would seem that the law of the country in which the contract is made and is to be performed, and in which the parties are domiciled, ought to prevail unless there is such duress as must be considered to avoid the contract under any but unreasonable and uncivilised institutions of law—a description which would be applicable to such a case as that of consent obtained, e.g., by physical torture, or by the use of drugs, but which cannot properly be applied to this case." The whole point of the learned judge's judgment upon that part of the case is contained in the last few lines of that passage. The learned judge admits that, if the contract was obtained by physical violence, it could not be enforced in the courts of this country, whatever the view of the courts of the other country might be. What can it matter what may be the form of coercion used? It is coercion just the same whether it is physical or moral. Why was it not coercion to threaten to dishonour her and her children by prosecuting her husband? But it is contended that unless the principle is one which is universally applied and recognised by the law of all civilised countries, under which the courts of those countries would refuse to enforce such a contract, we are not entitled to apply it in an English court to a contract enforceable in a foreign court, and that therefore, when it is shown that another civilised country does not accept that principle, an English court is debarred from applying it to a foreign contract. The authorities do not bear out that proposition. In Story on Conflict of Laws, sect. 258, the rule is stated as follows: "The second class of excepted contracts comprehends those against good morals, or religion, or public rights. Such are contracts made in a foreign country for future illicit cohabitation and prostitution . . . and, in short, all contracts which in their own nature are founded in moral turpitude and are inconsistent with the good order and solid interests of society. All such contracts, even though they might be held valid in the country where they are made, would be held void elsewhere, or at least ought to be, if the dictates of Christian morality, or of even natural justice, are allowed to have their due force and influence in the administration of international jurisprudence." In the English courts the principle is that a party who seeks a remedy must come with clean hands; and, if a suitor has to aver something which upon grounds of public morality ought to debar him from obtaining the assistance of the court, he is not entitled to obtain relief upon the ground that the courts of the other country would allow him to sue in such a case. The passage in Westlake on Private International Law, sect. 215 (3rd edit.), which was referred to by Romer, L.J., states: "Where a contract conflicts with what are deemed in England to be essential public or moral interests, it cannot be enforced here, notwithstanding that it may have been valid by its proper law. The plaintiff in such a case encounters that reservation in favour of any stringent domestic policy with which alone any maxims for giving effect to foreign laws can be received. . . . The difficulty in every particular instance cannot be with regard to the principle, but merely whether the public or moral interests are essential enough to call it into operation; and where a breach of English law is not contemplated this is necessarily a question upon which there is room for much difference of opinion among judges." In the present case the point is whether a contract obtained by such moral pressure is one which an English court will enforce. In my opinion it is a universal principle of the courts of this country that they will not enforce any contract which has been brought about by coercion. That rule is not inconsistent with any authority which has been cited. It is clearly consistent with many of the cases and with what has been said by the judges in some of the cases, especially by Turner, L.J., and I think also by Knight-Bruce, L.J. in Hope v. Hope (8 De G. M. & G. 731). In Roussillon v. Roussillon (42 L. T. Rep. 679; 14 Ch. Div. 351) Fry, J. acted upon a similar principle. Upon the broad principle which I have stated, I am of opinion that the law in this country is such that the appellant is entitled to the protection of an English court in refusing to enforce a contract obtained in the way in which this contract was obtained. This appeal must, therefore, be allowed and judgment be entered for the defendant.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my opinion the principle of law which is applicable to this kind of case is succinctly and accurately stated by Mr. Westlake in the passage which has been read by the Master of the Rolls. The only question, then, is as to the application of that principle to the facts of the present case. What are the facts of this case? Shortly stated, the facts are that the plaintiff extorted this contract from the wife by threats of a criminal prosecution against the husband, the threatened proceedings being of such a kind that, if taken, they would ruin the husband and also socially disgrace the wife and children. The plaintiff seeks in this action to enforce the contract which was so obtained. To enforce such a contract would be to do something conflicting with the essential moral interests of the community. This court cannot properly be asked by the plaintiff in this case to assist him in enforcing an agreement so arrived at. It has been suggested that the defendant affirmed the contract after the improper pressure and its effects had been removed. As to that, I will only say that it was neither pleaded nor proved. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The policy of the English courts in such a case as this is that a litigant is not permitted by unfair or unjust means to arm himself with a right which the law does not allow to be enforced in these courts. What were the means employed by the plaintiff to obtain this agreement? The facts show that moral torture, and nothing less, was applied to the wife in order to obtain it. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be a violation of the principles applied in the English courts if we were to allow such a contract as this to be enforced. Then it was suggested that this contract was made long ago and has been since acted upon; but the case is just the same now as if this defence had been raised before anything was paid under it. There is no evidence at all of any ratification by the defendant. The pressure was steadily maintained by the plaintiff down to the year 1902. There is no evidence that the defendant affirmed the contract, and it was not attempted in the court below to show that she had done so. I agree that the appeal must succeed.

Appeal allowed.

ANDREW v. FAILSWORTH INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Accident arising "out of" employment—Injury by lightning—Risk incidental to particular employment—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1.

A bricklayer employed upon the construction of a building exceeding 30ft. in height was killed by lightning when working upon a scaffolding at a height of 23ft. from the ground.

Evidence was given that a man working in that position incurred a risk substantially greater than the normal risk of being struck by lightning, and the County Court judge found that the accident arose "out of" the employment.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that the County Court judge had properly found that the accident arose "out of" the employment.

APPEAL of the defendants from the award of the County Court judge at Oldham in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff was the widow of a workman who was killed by lightning in the course of his employment by the defendants.

The deceased workman was a bricklayer who was employed upon a building exceeding 30ft. in height which was being constructed by means of a scaffolding.

The deceased was working upon the scaffolding at a height of about 23ft. above the level of the ground when he was struck by lightning and killed.

The plaintiff claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The defendants contended that the accident did not arise "out of" the employment.

At the hearing before the County Court judge an expert witness, who was an engineer and electrician, gave evidence on behalf of the plaintiff to the following effect:

I have been told of the place and circumstances in which the deceased man was working. He was on a scaffold 23ft. from the ground. I consider that a very exposed position. The main fact is the elevation above the earth. Another factor is that he would constitute a well-defined point at which a discharge would be more likely to occur. Buildings and other erections afford a protection over a space which diminishes as you ascend vertically. If you draw a line at an angle of 45 degrees from the highest point of an erection to the earth, persons within that cone are protected, and it is therefore clear that, as you ascend, the zone of safety diminishes. I consider that a man working on an elevated scaffold runs an appreciably greater risk from that fact.

The County Court judge gave his decision as follows:

The question is, Did the accident arise out of the employment? It no doubt arose in the course of the employment, but that is not sufficient; it must also arise out of the employment. It seems to me that that is not a question of law; it is a question of fact, and in each case the judge has to consider the facts, and say, as a question of fact, did it arise out of the employment. No doubt, if there is no evidence at all upon which a judge could come to that conclusion, he must find for the respondents; but, if there is evidence upon which he can reasonably come to the conclusion that the accident arose out of the employment, then he is entitled to find for the applicant. The words "arising out of the employment" may be looked at in two ways. Mr. Elliott says the accident must arise out of the work which the man was doing, and he says that, if there is no connection between the work and the accident, then it does not arise out of the employment. I am bound to say that I cannot agree with that. Though it may not be connected with or have any relation to the work the man was doing, yet if in point of fact the position in which the man was doing the work, and the place he must necessarily occupy whilst doing the work, are a position and place of danger which caused the accident, it may fairly be said that it arose out of the employment, not because of the work, but because of the position. Let me put an illustration, though illustrations are not always much good. Take the case of a mariner in a ship at sea: a storm gets up and the vessel founders and the man's life is lost. It is not because he was doing any particular work at any particular time on the ship, but because his location was a dangerous location. The place and the circumstances constitute it a dangerous employment, and if, owing to a storm, a mariner is drowned at sea, it would be impossible to say that the accident did not arise out of the employment. In this case, therefore, if I come to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the position in which the man was working was dangerous, and that in consequence of the dangerous position the accident occurred, I could fairly hold that the accident arose out of the employment. Now, was it a dangerous position? Was the man exposed to something more than the normal risk which everybody, so to speak, incurs at any time and in any place during a thunderstorm? We know that lightning is erratic, and possibly no position and circumstances can afford absolute safety. But if there is under particular circumstances in a particular vocation something appreciably and substantially beyond the ordinary normal risk, which ordinary people run, and which is a necessary concomitant of the occupation the man is engaged in, then I am entitled to say that that extra danger to which the man is exposed is something arising out of his employment; and if in consequence of that extra danger a fatality occurs, I am entitled to say that the section applies and the applicant is entitled to recover. I have had some evidence on the point, and the evidence, especially that of Dr. Garrard, seems to me to entitle me properly to come to the conclusion that in this case under the circumstances there was a substantial, abnormally increased risk, owing to the position in which the man had to work; and, in accordance with the principles before stated, which I think should govern the case, I find that the accident did arise out of the employment, and I give judgment for the widow for 300l.

The defendants appealed.

A. Powell, K.C. and Adshead Elliott for the appellants.—There was no evidence upon which the County Court judge could properly find that the accident arose "out of" the employment in this case. An accident arising "out of" the employment must be one which arises out of the work upon which the workman is employed; it must be a risk incidental to that work, and a risk normally incidental to the employment. It must be a risk which might not improbably occur in such an employment as that in which the workman is engaged. This accident was owing to an act of God, and it no more arises "out of" the employment than an accident caused by the wrongful act of a fellow-servant. In the Scotch case of Falconer v. London and Glasgow Engineering Company (3 Fraser, 564) Lord Trayner said: "A servant engaged in a factory and struck by lightning in the course of his employment would have no claim to compensation under the Act. There must be some connection between the accident and the employment." That case was referred to in Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (86 L. T. Rep. 883; (1902) 2 K. B. 178), where it was held that an accident which happened to a workman through the tortious act of a fellow-workman did not arise "out of" the employment.

C. A. Russell, K.C. and H. Holman Gregory, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—This seems to me to be a particularly clear case. The apparent difficulty has been dealt with in the remarkably lucid judgment of the learned County Court judge. It seems to me that I can say nothing to improve or to enlarge upon that judgment, and I will adopt it. I will refer to one passage of that judgment in which the judge exposes the fallacies of the argument on behalf of the defendants. He said: "If I come to the conclusion that, as a matter of fact, the position in which the man was working was dangerous, and that in consequence of the dangerous position the accident occurred, I could fairly hold that the accident arose out of the employment. Now, was it a dangerous position? Was the man exposed to something more than the normal risk which everybody, so to speak, incurs at any time and in any place during a thunderstorm? We know that lightning is erratic, and possibly no position and circumstances can afford absolute safety. But if there is under particular circumstances in a particular vocation something appreciably and substantially beyond the ordinary normal risk, which ordinary people run, and which is a necessary concomitant of the occupation the man is engaged in, then I am entitled to say that that extra danger to which the man is exposed is something arising out of his employment; and if in consequence of that a fatality occurs, I am entitled to say the section applies and the applicant is entitled to recover." I certainly think that it would be impossible to frame a more accurate direction to a jury than that judgment of the County Court judge. Having so directed himself, the judge applied himself to the facts in order to see whether the accident did arise out of the employment, and he did find that the accident arose out of the employment. I say, therefore, that this case is singularly free from difficulty, and that there is no ground for this appeal. It is true that being struck by lightning has been referred to by judges in some of the cases as a typical instance of an accident which does not arise out of the employment. They did so, no doubt, because that is a risk which is very seldom incidental to an employment, and in using that illustration they eliminated the condition that it is a risk incidental to the particular employment. That illustration, therefore, cannot be strained so as to apply to a case like this, where the risk of being struck by lightning is in fact incidental to the particular employment.

DYER v. SWIFT CYCLE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)
APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Employment—"Factory"—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7 (2).

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, by sect. 7 (2), provides that "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Act of 1901 is applied.

By sect. 105 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 certain provisions of the Act are to "have effect as if any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, were included in the word 'factory.'"

Held (allowing the appeal), that a building of the description specified in sect. 105 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 is not a "factory," within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, merely because some provisions of the Act of 1901 are applied thereto.

APPEAL of the defendants from the award of the judge of the City of London Court in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants, and claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The plaintiff was employed on the London premises of the defendants at Holborn Viaduct, where their bicycles were shown for sale and orders were received and repairs were executed.

The building exceeded 30ft. in height, and more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, were employed therein for wages. There was no machinery or plant worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power upon the premises.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides:

Sect. 7 (2). In this Act "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshops Acts 1878 to 1891, and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, and every laundry worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power.

The Factory and Workshop Act 1901 (1 Edw. 7, c. 22), which repealed and consolidated all the previous Factory Acts, provides:

Sect. 105 (2). The provisions of this Act with respect to notice of accidents and the formal investigation of accidents shall have effect as if (b) any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, were included in the word "factory," and as if . . . the occupier of the building were the occupier of a factory.

Sect. 149 (1). The expression "factory" means textile factory and non-textile factory, or either of those descriptions of factories.

The County Court judge held that, as the premises exceeded 30ft. in height and more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, were employed therein for wages, the building was a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and accordingly made an award in favour of the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

W. Addington Willis for the appellants.—The County Court judge was wrong in holding that the case came within the Workmen's Compensation Act. In this case in order to entitle the workman to compensation his employment must be on, in, or about a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. "Factory" is defined by sect. 7 (2) of the Act. This building was not a "factory" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, which is now substituted for the earlier Factory and Workshop Acts. In the Act of 1901 "factory" is defined in sect. 149, and this building certainly does not come within that definition. Therefore, if it is a "factory" at all within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, it can only be so because some provision of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 is applied thereto. But sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act does not enact that every building or thing to which any provision of the Factory and Workshop Act is applied shall be a "factory"; it only enacts that certain specified buildings and things shall be factories in that case. This building does not come within the category mentioned in sub-sect. 7 (2) at all, and therefore is not a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, although certain provisions of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 are, by sect. 105 (2), applied thereto. It was not suggested in the County Court that the building was a "warehouse"; and it has been found as a fact that there was no machinery or plant therein worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power.

Cairns for the respondent.—The learned County Court judge rightly decided that this building was a "factory." The definition of "factory" in sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act is now to be read as if it referred to the Factory and Workshop Act 1901 instead of to the earlier Factory Acts:

Stevens v. General Steam Navigation Company, 88 L. T. Rep. 542; (1903) 1 K. B. 890.

Sect. 7 (2) therefore enacts that "factory" has the same meaning as in the Factory and Workshop Act 1901. Now, sect. 105 (2) provides that certain provisions of that Act shall apply to a building of this description, and thereby extends the meaning of "factory" in that Act beyond the definition contained in sect. 149. This building,

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

DYER v. SWIFT CYCLE COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

therefore, was a "factory" within the Act of 1901, and consequently a "factory" within the meaning of sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. This building was a "warehouse" within the meaning of sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. There was evidence that the building was used for storing bicycles and materials:

Watson v. Cotton, 5 C. B. 51.

W. Addington Willis was not called upon to reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the City of London Court in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The facts of the case were not in dispute. Upon the admissions of fact made by the parties the judge arrived at two conclusions—first, that there was no machinery or plant driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power upon the premises, and that therefore the case was not within the Act upon that ground; secondly, that as the building exceeded 30ft. in height, and more than twenty persons were employed therein, it was a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. The question, therefore, is whether the accident occurred to a workman who was employed in a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. If the workman was not so employed, his case must fail. It was contended at the hearing that by reason of machinery being used upon the premises the place was a "factory," but the judge has found that this was not so. Therefore so far the plaintiff did not succeed in showing that the place was a "factory" within the meaning of that Act. Another contention made on behalf of the plaintiff was adopted by the judge, which was that, although the place was not a "factory" within the definition in sect. 149 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, yet by referring to another section of that Act—sect. 105 (2)—it appeared that the place was a "factory" within the meaning of that Act. Sect. 105 (2) provides that "the provisions of this Act with respect to notice of accidents and the formal investigation of accidents shall have effect as if (b) any building which exceeds thirty feet in height, and in which more than twenty persons, not being domestic servants, are employed for wages, were included in the word 'factory' and as if . . . the occupier of the building were the occupier of a factory." The judge found that this building came within that provision, and held that therefore it was a "factory." But when that section is read carefully, it is clear that it distinctly negatives such a building being a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. It says that two specified provisions shall apply "as if" the building were a "factory," and that is tantamount to saying that the building is not a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. There is no doubt a provision that, for the purpose of giving notice of accidents and of investigating accidents, such a building shall be treated as a factory. The question is whether that provision can make the building a "factory" within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The definition of a "factory" in sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act is: "'Factory' has the same meaning as in the 'Factory and Workshop Act 1901,' and also includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant, to which any provision of the 'Factory and Workshop Act 1901' is applied. Now, it is admitted that this building is not within the definition of "factory" contained in the Act of 1901, and it is not one of those places which is specifically mentioned in sect. 7 (2). It is not one of that class of buildings which are within the category given in sect. 7 (2), and it is only buildings within that category which can be made factories within the Workmen's Compensation Act by reason of some provision of the Factory Act being applied thereto. That conclusively shows that the decision of the learned judge was wrong upon the point upon which he decided this case. The counsel for the respondent has endeavoured here to support that judgment upon another ground—viz., that this building was a "warehouse." But that case was not made before the County Court judge, and no evidence was given to support it. That point, therefore, cannot be raised now. The case must be dealt with upon the facts as they were before the County Court judge. This appeal therefore succeeds, and must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The onus was on the workman to show that his case came within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. He could only do that by establishing that the building in which he was employed was a "factory" within the definition contained in sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act. When that definition is carefully looked at, it is clear that the workman did not establish that this building came within the definition at all, and I gather that the County Court judge really so held. But the County Court judge appears to have held that this building was a "factory" by reference to the provisions of sect. 105 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1901. But, as has been pointed out by the Master of the Rolls, sect. 105 (2) does not provide that any building exceeding 30ft. in height in which more than twenty persons are employed is a "factory"; in effect it points out that such a building is not a "factory," and only directs that certain provisions of the Act shall apply thereto "as if it were included in the word 'factory,'" and those provisions have no relation whatever to the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The decision of the County Court judge was, therefore, wrong. The workman has failed to bring this case within the Workmen's Compensation Act, and this appeal must be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The ground upon which the County Court judge decided this case was wrong; and there is no evidence upon which the contention that the building was a "warehouse" can be established.

Appeal allowed.

Company — Prospectus — Untrue statements — Omission of contracts — Liability of directors — Directors' Liability Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3 — Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.

Upon the faith of the statements contained in a prospectus issued by the defendants and their co-directors, the plaintiffs became shareholders in a company.

The prospectus contained certain untrue statements, and also omitted to specify the dates and names of the parties to a certain contract that had been entered into by or on behalf of the company.

Held, as regards the untrue statements, that, even though they constituted material misrepresentations and remained untrue to the date of the notice of allotment, yet, the defendants having reasonable ground to believe that the statements were true, the plaintiffs were not entitled to compensation from the defendants under sect. 3 of the Directors' Liability Act 1890; and, as regards the omission to specify the dates and names of the parties to the contracts, that, the contracts being material to be known, the prospectus was to be deemed to be fraudulent on the part of the defendants within the meaning of sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1867, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages accordingly.

ACTIONS in which the plaintiffs were shareholders in the Standard Exploration Company Limited and the defendants directors thereof.

The plaintiffs in their respective actions claimed compensation for the loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of untrue statements contained in the prospectus of the Standard Exploration Company Limited, issued by the defendants, on the faith of which the plaintiffs subscribed for shares in the company; and a declaration that the said prospectus was fraudulent on the part of the defendants within the meaning of sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1867, and damages for the loss sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of their having been induced to subscribe for the said shares on the faith of such prospectus.

The actions were in respect of the same prospectus as that which was the subject of the action of McConnel v. Wright (88 L. T. Rep. 431; (1903) 1 Ch. 546).

The facts will be found sufficiently and conveniently set forth in his Lordship's judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

JOYCE, J.—These are actions against two directors of the Standard Exploration Company by two persons each of whom subscribed for fifty shares in the company on the faith of a prospectus dated the 12th May 1899. They allege that such prospectus contained material misstatements, by which they were induced to take the shares, and was fraudulent in law under sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1867 by reason of the omission to specify therein the dates and names of the parties to certain contracts, and upon this ground they claim to have an inquiry in the appropriate form as to damages and payment of the amount to be thereby ascertained. No charge of actual fraud is made or suggested against either of the defendants. They may have been careless or negligent, but there is no imputation upon their personal integrity or honour; their only liability, if any, is under the statutory provisions of the Directors' Liability Act 1890 and the section I have mentioned of the Act of 1867. There is no doubt that each of the plaintiffs was induced to subscribe for his shares by the perusal of the prospectus, and did so upon the faith of the statements which it contained taken as a whole. The company was formed for various objects, which were obviously of a highly speculative nature, and included trafficking upon the Stock Exchange. Each of the plaintiffs, I think, took his shares as a speculation. The financial failure of the company was not in any sense due to any matter misrepresented in the prospectus. It was brought about in the year 1901 by the calamitous result of enormous speculations, in particular in Lake View shares, and the date of the winding-up order is the 16th Jan. of that year. The plaintiffs, however, made no complaint, nor had it occurred to either of them that he had any ground of action against the defendants until he was sought out by a so-called association of shareholders or the solicitors who advised or managed this association. The statements of claim, which are practically identical in their terms, allege several misstatements in the prospectus; but, having regard to what has taken place in a former action of McConnel v. Wright (88 L. T. Rep. 431; (1903) 1 Ch. 546), only two of such misstatements were actually discussed and insisted upon before me. They were, first and principally, what is the subject of the allegation in par. 4 (B) of the statement of claim in reference to the establishment of a share department for the acquisition and disposition of shares, and so on, with a statement that the directors had already acquired large holdings in various promising companies, including the following, particularly the London and Globe and others there named, and that, "Taken at this day's market quotations these shares already show a profit more than sufficient to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. on the total capital of this company for the current year"; and, secondly, the statement which is the subject of the same paragraph of the statement of claim, under sub-clause D, which is to the effect that "Contracts dated the 12th May 1899 have been entered into by the company for the acquisition from each of the companies and the liquidators thereof of the properties above-mentioned under the head of 'Properties to be acquired' for a total consideration of 775,000 fully-paid-up shares." In respect of each of these alleged misstatements, each of the plaintiffs claims to be entitled to relief under the Directors' Liability Act. It was also contended that the prospectus was to be deemed to be fraudulent under the 38th section of the Act of 1867, by reason of the omission to specify in it the dates and parties to the three contracts first particularly mentioned in par. 5 of the statement of claim. As to the alleged misstatements, it will be convenient to deal first with the one secondly mentioned—namely, par. 4 (D) of the statement of claim. Now, the statement in the prospectus was that, "Contracts dated the 12th May 1899 have been entered into by the company for the acquisition from each of the companies and the liquidators thereof of the properties above-mentioned under the head of 'Properties to be acquired' for a total consideration of 775,000 fully-paid-up shares," and inspection of copies of these contracts was offered at the offices of the solicitors of the company. The real fact was, however, that of those 775,000 shares, 40,000—namely, those which formed the consideration for the acquisition of 5000 fully-paid-up deferred shares in the Austin Friars Syndicate—were, in pursuance of an agreement dated the 27th Oct. 1898, transferred or issued, not directly to the owners of the shares or to the companies or the liquidators thereof, but to the nominees of the London and Globe, which company had previously, and with a view to the formation and establishment of the Standard Company, bought up these shares upon advantageous terms for the benefit of the Standard Company. The London and Globe were the avowed promoters of the Standard Company, as appears by the prospectus, and it has been suggested that, notwithstanding the statement in the prospectus that there were no promoter's profits in any shape or form whatever, the London and Globe Company did, by reason of this transaction, indirectly obtain a secret profit or advantage. Upon investigation and consideration of the facts in reference to this transaction, I am convinced that there is no foundation for this suggestion. In my opinion, the misstatement, such as it is, was not made intentionally, but was an accidental inaccuracy, which in no way ought to have influenced or did influence either of the plaintiffs in subscribing for shares in the company. If the precise facts as to the acquisition of these deferred shares in the Austin Friars Syndicate had been set forth with perfect exactness they would not, in my opinion, have been calculated to deter, and would not have deterred, either of the plaintiffs from taking shares. I have not the slightest doubt that each of the plaintiffs would have subscribed for his fifty shares, and risked his 50*l.* in the concern all the same. That is to say, I hold this misstatement not to have been material, or, in other words, that the plaintiffs have not sustained any loss or damage by reason of this untrue or inaccurate statement in the prospectus. The principal misstatement which is alleged, and which I will next consider, is under the heading of "Share Department," and is to the effect that in furtherance of the object of the company the directors have already acquired large holdings in various promising companies, including British America, Le Roi, and London and Globe, and so on. Now, having regard to what took place in the Court of Appeal in the case of McConnel v. Wright (ubi sup.) already mentioned, I was not asked upon this occasion to decide or consider any question with respect to the company's holding—that is, the Standard Company's holding—in British America shares. But the real contest was in reference to the shares, roundly 200,000 in number, in the London and Globe, which admittedly were referred to in this paragraph of the prospectus, and which are the subject of a minute under date the 25th May 1899 in the directors' minute-book of the London and Globe. That minute is as follows:—"Resolved: That the allotment of 199,993 shares in this corporation at par to the Standard Exploration Company be, and is, hereby confirmed. The distinctive numbers being "so and so. It is curious that the date of this minute is referred to in the judgment of the judges of the Court of Appeal as being the 27th May, two days later than it really was. Upon the 25th May 1899, if not before, these shares were acquired by the Standard Company. But this was two days after the plaintiff De La Cour received notice of the allotment of the fifty shares which he subscribed for, and four days after the plaintiff Trechmann received the similar notice in respect of his fifty shares; for the application of the plaintiff De La Cour for shares is dated the 18th May, and the notice of allotment the 22nd May, and the application of the plaintiff Trechmann is dated the 17th May, and the notice of allotment to him the 20th May. Each of the plaintiffs lived in the country, and presumably would receive his notice of allotment upon the day after it bore date. The form of the minute of the 25th May suggests that there had been a previous allotment, either informal or otherwise questionable, for some reason or other. For my own part, I think that Mr. Whitaker Wright, under the power which a previous minute conferred upon him, had in some way affected to make this allotment, but it being suggested, and not without reason, that his power to allot did not authorise any allotment except to shareholders in the London and Globe, it was thought advisable to have a formal confirmation of the allotment to the Standard Company. It was proved before me that the minute-books of the two companies concerned were ill-kept; important business was often done in fact, and given effect to in the account-books of the company, without any entry concerning it appearing in the minute-books. Now, the London and Globe Company were the promoters of the Standard, and issued the prospectus, thereby stating, as the fact was, that the directors of the London and Globe were authorised to offer, and did offer, the shares of the Standard for subscription on the terms of that prospectus, one of which was, in effect, that the Standard Company had acquired a holding of (in round numbers) 200,000 shares in the London and Globe. Three of the directors of the London and Globe were also directors of the Standard. There had been a general understanding all along that the Standard should have these shares, and that they were reserved for that company; and under the circumstances it is difficult to see how it would have been possible, after the allotment of the shares of the Standard, for the London and Globe to resile from the position that the Standard had or must have these 200,000 shares in the London and Globe. In my opinion, upon the evidence before me, it was practically certain upon the 23rd, and even upon the 21st May 1899, that these London and Globe shares would be, if they had not already been, acquired, or at least, that the acquisition of these shares was practically secured, and such acquisition was certainly perfected on the 25th May, if not before. I cannot think that the allotment of these 200,000 shares to the Standard at par was any breach of duty on the part of the directors of the London and Globe, although the shares that had been issued of that company were then saleable at a premium. As Lord Davey observes at p. 480 of the Appeal Cases, 1902: "I am not aware of any law which obliges a company to issue its shares above par because they are saleable at a premium in the market. It depends on the circumstances of each case whether it will be prudent, or even possible to do so, and it is a question for the directors to decide," and I may add that in this particular case the London and Globe were the promoters of the Standard, and had a direct pecuniary interest in the formation and success of that company. In such an action as this—that is to say, under the Directors' Liability Act—it is an essential factor that the plaintiff should prove substantial damage, the measure of which is well settled to be the difference between the price paid by the plaintiff for his shares and their real value at the date of the allotment being posted to or reaching him, and as a matter of convenience the date is taken to be that of the day after the posting of the notice of allotment. See judgment in Cackett v. Keswick, affirmed by Court of Appeal (87 L. T. Rep. 11; (1902) 2 Ch. 456). Now in the case of McConnel v. Wright (ubi sup.), which was an action by another shareholder against another director, in respect of the very prospectus in question here, it was held by the Court of Appeal upon similar, but not the same, materials as are before me, that there was a material misrepresentation in the prospectus with respect to the acquisition of the Standard Company's holding in the London and Globe, and that, having regard to such misrepresentation and to the subsequent liquidation, there was sufficient evidence of substantial damage to the plaintiff. Under the circumstances, I do not consider myself free to decide otherwise in the present case, though I am perhaps not technically bound to do so. Therefore, out of deference to the Court of Appeal, I hold that there was a material misrepresentation in the prospectus with reference to the acquisition of the London and Globe shares, and that there is sufficient evidence of damage to each of the plaintiffs by reason of such misrepresentation, although at the same time I think I am bound, in justice to the defendants, to say that I probably should have come to a different conclusion if I had been at liberty to follow my own opinion. Now, with reference to the several other companies mentioned in the prospectus under the head of "Share Department," it is probably not very material to consider when the shares or holdings in them were actually acquired. I think it is sufficient to say that the plaintiffs have not satisfied me that the holdings in such companies were not all acquired by the date upon which the respective notices of allotment were posted to the plaintiffs. It was decided in the case of Ship v. Crosskill (22 L. T. Rep. 355; 10 Eq. 73) that if a statement in a prospectus, although untrue at the time the prospectus was issued, be true at the time of the application for shares, the applicant cannot maintain an action for damages in respect of misrepresentations by such untrue statement, and I am not aware that this decision has ever been questioned. And it would probably be held that the same result would follow if the statement in question was true at the date of the notice of allotment. Assuming, however, as was held in McConnel v. Wright (ubi sup.), that these shares in the London and Globe had not been acquired on the 23rd or 21st May 1899, and, in fact, were not acquired before the 25th of that month, the question arises whether the defendants believed, and had reasonable ground for believing, that these shares had been acquired, or that their acquisition was so secured as to justify the statement in the prospectus so far as the London and Globe shares were concerned. The question is not whether the defendants exercised extreme caution and thoroughly investigated the truth of all the several statements of the prospectus, whether they were capable and experienced financiers, whether they were wise or foolish, or what were the motives which influenced them in becoming directors; but simply whether they had reasonable ground for believing that these London and Globe shares had been acquired by the Standard Company. Upon consideration of the defendants' own evidence and that of the other witnesses called on their behalf, I think, upon the whole, it would be wrong to conclude that the defendants had not reasonable ground for believing the statements in the prospectus under the head of "Share Department," the correctness of which is questioned by the plaintiffs, and in particular as to the holding of 200,000 shares in the London and Globe, to be true. If I am right in this the defendants are excused from all liability under the Directors' Liability Act. But, unfortunately for the defendants, this does not dispose of the whole case. There remains the question of non-compliance with the provisions of sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1867. It is contended that the prospectus must be deemed to be fraudulent by reason of the omission to state therein the dates and the names of the parties to various contracts. [His Lordship specified the contracts referred to, including an agreement dated the 27th Oct. 1898 between the London and Globe Finance Corporation Limited and the Standard Exploration Company Limited, and continued:] Now, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to establish any liability on the defendants in respect of the omission to specify any of these contracts, it must be shown, among other things, that the contracts were material to be known, although the Act requires only the dates and parties to be stated, and that the plaintiff had not notice of them; or, in other words, that the plaintiff took his shares upon the faith of there being no such contract, and without having by a valid agreement waived the right he would otherwise have had under the section. Further, no plaintiff can recover unless it be shown that he has sustained damage by taking the shares on the faith of the prospectus. This is an essential factor. In other words, it must be shown that the real value of the shares on the day when he received the notice of allotment was less than the sum which he paid for them. Now, again, in dealing with this part of this case I am not free, I think, to act on my own opinion, whatever it may be, but am compelled to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal upon this same prospectus in McConnel v. Wright (ubi sup.). Their Lordships then held that the agreement of the 27th Oct. 1898 was a material contract, and that by reason of its omission the prospectus was to be deemed to be fraudulent. I do not see my way, upon such a question as this—viz., the materiality of the contract—to decide otherwise than in accordance with the Court of Appeal. In other words, I am compelled to hold that the date and names of the parties to the agreement of the 27th Oct. 1898 ought to have been specified in the prospectus; and further, as I assume, the Court of Appeal must have considered that such omission was not validly waived by the waiver clause in the application for shares coupled with the statement upon the same subject in the prospectus. I have already said that I must follow the Court of Appeal in its decision, that, having regard to the subsequent winding-up, and the few days' delay in the acquisition of the London and Globe shares, there was sufficient evidence to show that the plaintiffs had sustained loss or damage entitling them to relief, although what the real value of the shares was at the time of allotment appears to me to be wholly unascertained. The result is, therefore, that in this court there must be judgment for each of the plaintiffs in terms which I will state on the ground of the omission to specify the date and names of the parties to the agreement of the 27th Oct. 1898. As to the other contracts, I think that the plaintiffs either had notice of them or waived their rights under the 38th section of the Act of 1867. I think they did not subscribe for or take their shares upon the faith of there being no such contracts.

The form of order in the action of De la Cour v. Clinton was as follows: "Declare that the prospectus of the Standard Exploration Company limited in the pleadings mentioned must be deemed fraudulent on the part of the defendant within the meaning of sect. 38 of the Companies Act 1867 by reason of it not having specified the date of and names of the parties to the contract dated the 27th Oct. 1898, and the court doth order and adjudge the same accordingly. And the court doth order that an inquiry be made what sum by way of compensation ought to be awarded to the plaintiff for the loss or damage suffered by him by reason of his having taken fifty shares of 1l. each in the same company on the faith of such prospectus, having regard to the price paid by him for the said fifty shares and the real value of such shares on the 23rd May 1899 (the day after the date of the allotment)."

The form of order in the action of Trechmann v. Calthorpe was the same as above, except that the day after the date of allotment was the 21st May 1899, not the 23rd May 1899.

BASSE AND SELVE v. BANK OF AUSTRALASIA. (a) Bank—Credit against production of documents—Certificate of analysis—Fraudulent misrepresentation—Duties and liabilities of bank.

A bank was authorised to advance a sum against production of documents. The mandate was as follows: "Negotiate drafts of A. O. at sight on D. Bank (Berlin) London agency p. 800l. account B. S. (against) bill of lading, policy of insurance and certificate analysis from Dr. H. (for) 100 tons cobalt ore analysis not less than 5 per cent. protoxide shipped by steamer (to) Europe. Credit expires."

A. O. intended to ship worthless ore, and in the bill of lading it was described as "P.M. 2680 bags containing 100 tons cobalt ore." A policy of insurance was also effected.

A sample of sound ore was submitted for analysis, which analysis the bank refused to accept, as the certificate did not refer to the bill of lading goods.

A. O. then marked the sample as the bill of lading quantity was described.

The analyst gave a second certificate, which was as follows: "Sample of cobalt ore marked 'P.M. 2680 bags representing 100 tons' received from you on the 12th July gave the following results: 4.14 per cent. cobalt, equal to 5.27 per cent. cobalt protoxide in the dry ore; 9.25 per cent. moisture.

On producing the second certificate the bank paid A. O. 800l.

Subsequently A. O. was convicted of obtaining that money by fraudulent misrepresentation.

Held, that the certificate on its face was regular and came within the meaning of the mandate, and there was no duty on the bank to see to the sampling. The bank was entitled to assume that the analyst had acted skilfully in making the analysis.

ACTION to recover from the defendants 800l. for damages for breach of duty in not acting in accordance with instructions, and, alternatively, for having negligently performed their duty to the plaintiffs.

The facts appear in the considered judgment.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. and A. B. Cane for the plaintiffs.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and R. W. Coventry for the defendants.

Uster Bank v. Synnott (1871, 5 Ir. Rep. Eq. 595), Woods v. Thiedemann (1 Hurlst. & Oolt. Exch. Rep. 478), and Ireland v. Livingstone (27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 416) were referred to.

BIGHAM, J.—This action is brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants a sum of 800l., paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants upon a consideration which is said to have wholly failed; or, in the alternative, to recover the like sum as damages for breach of contract. The facts are as follows: The plaintiffs are manufacturers carrying on their business in Prussia. The defendants are an English banking company with an agency in Sydney, N.S.W. In May 1902 the plaintiffs agreed to buy of a correspondent of theirs at Sydney named Oppenheimer 100 tons of cobalt ore at 8l. per ton. The ore was to be shipped by steamer to Europe and was to be paid for by cash against shipping documents in Sydney. The shipping documents were to consist of (1) the bill of lading, (2) a policy of insurance, and (3) a certificate of analysis by a local chemist named Helms showing at least 5 per cent. protoxide. This contract having been made, it became necessary for the plaintiffs to find a means by which Oppenheimer could get payment in Sydney in exchange for the documents. They accordingly put themselves into communication with their bankers in Berlin—the Deutsche Bank. This bank has no branch in Sydney, and therefore, by letter dated the 14th May 1902, they in their turn gave instructions to the defendant bank in London to open the credit required. The letter is in the following terms:

Berlin, May 14, 1902.—Bank of Australasia, London, E.C., 4, Threadneedle-street.—Dear Sirs,—Our friends Messrs. Basse and Selve, Altena, inform us that they have instructed the firm A. Oppenheimer at Sydney by mail of the 4th April to ship for them 100 tons cobalt ore at 8l. per ton by steamer to Europe, and they now wish to open a credit by cable in favour of A. Oppenheimer, Sydney, for the above shipment. The credit shall be available until the 15th June next against production of the following documents for 100 tons cobalt ore—viz. (1) B/lading in full set, and (2) insurance policy, per steamship to Europe; (3) certificate of analysis by the chemist Dr. Helms showing an analysis of at least 5 per cent. protoxide. We therefore beg to request you by the present to instruct your Sydney branch by cable to negotiate Mr. A. Oppenheimer's sight drafts upon our London agency up to the extent of 800l., say, eight hundred pounds, if accompanied by the documents specified overleaf, drafts and documents not to be issued later than the 15th June, and provided that the certificate of the chemist Dr. Helms shows the analysis required before. If possible we would suggest that your telegram to Sydney be kept in about the form stated on the inclosure, but, of course, we do not wish to influence you should you have different cable arrangements with your branches as long as all particulars are observed. The reason why we suggest a certain form for your cable is because the inclosed one has been approved of by our clients. We should feel obliged if you would forward us a true copy of the cable which you have dispatched to Sydney, and request you to apply for your cable expenses to our London office.—We are, dear Sirs, yours faithfully, DEUTSCHE BANK.

The inclosed form was as follows:

Bank of Australasia, London, E.C. Telegram to your London office. Negotiate the sight drafts of . . . upon the Deutsche Bank (Berlin) London agency up to the amount of . . . drawn for account of . . . accompanied by the following documents . . . for . . . shipped by steamer to Europe available until . . . under advice to payee. A. Oppenheimer 800l. Basse Selve, B/lading full set. Insurance policy. Certificate of analysis from Dr. Helms. 100 tons cobalt ore, analysis not less than 5 per cent. protoxide, June 15.

On the same day the Deutsche Bank wrote to the plaintiffs, advising them of what they had done. The letter is as follows:

Berlin, May 14, 1902.—Messrs. Basse and Selve, Altena.—We received your favour of the 13th, and note therefrom that you declare your agreement with the essential points in the framing of the telegram to our correspondents in Sydney with regard to crediting the firm A. Oppenheimer, Sydney, for a shipment of 100 tons cobalt ore at 8l. per ton per steamer to Europe. As you write us there should be mentioned in the telegram by means of which the said credit in Sydney is opened that the certificate should be made out by Dr. Helms in Sydney, and that the ore must show a contents of 5 per cent. protoxide according to the chemical formula CoO . (it was not intended, we presume, that this prescription is to be introduced into the telegram, it would probably not be understood at all by our correspondents); on the other hand, prescriptions regarding the humid contents of the ore should not be given. Furthermore, we noted from our telephonic conversation of to-day that the credit should be framed as valid until the 15th June of this year. We have consequently, in conformity with this, written to-day to the Bank of Australasia, London, requesting them to telegraph their branch in Sydney—the telegram to Sydney goes, as usual, for your account and risk—to negotiate the drafts drawn upon our London agency by the firm A. Oppenheimer, Sydney, up to the amount of 800l. at sight, eight hundred pounds sterling, accompanied by—(1) Bill of lading full sets of 100 tons cobalt ore, shipped per steamer to Europe; (2) insurance policy; (3) certificate by Dr. Helms of a contents of at least 5 per cent. protoxide in the ore, drafts and documents not to date later than the 15th June of this year. We have also requested the Bank of Australasia, London, to send us an exact translation of the relative telegrams, and will send you same immediately on receipt. For the cabling expenses, as well as for the resulting drafts of Mr. A. Oppenheimer, Sydney, in consequence of this credit we reserve to ourselves to debit you under advice. You yourselves will, as you have confirmed to us to-day by telephone, cable Mr. A. Oppenheimer about this—i.e., that the above credit with the Bank of Australasia, Sydney, is opened, and inform him that he should hand in the drafts and the requisite documents to the said bank.—We are, &c., DEUTSCHE BANK.

On the 16th May the defendant bank accordingly telegraphed to their Sydney branch, and wrote to the Deutsche Bank, sending a copy of the telegram. The letter is as follows:

Bank of Australasia, 4, Threadneedle-street, London, E.C., May 16, 1902.—The Deutsche Bank, Berlin.—Dear Sirs,—In accordance with your request by letter of 14th instant, we have dispatched a telegraphic message (using our cypher code as required) to our branch at Sydney, translating as follows: "Negotiate drafts of A. Oppenheimer at sight on Deutsche Bank (Berlin) London agency p. 800l. account. Basse Selve (against) bill of lading, policy of insurance and certificate analysis from Doctor Helms (for) 100 tons cobalt ore analysis not less than 5 per cent. protoxide shipped by steamer (to) Europe. Credit expires on June 15." This message has been sent on the understanding that it is entirely at your risk in all respects, and that we are not liable for the consequences of any delay, mistake, or omission which may happen in its transmission. As requested by you, 4l. 10s. for the cost of our telegram shall be collected from your London agency. Our Sydney branch will advise Mr. Oppenheimer in the usual course.—Your obedient servant, W. O. USSHER, pro Manager.

The telegram which is set out in this letter constituted the mandate to the defendants, and it is for carelessly parting with the money to Oppenheimer without properly attending to the terms of the mandate that the action is brought. In the following July (to which date the credit in the meantime had been extended) Oppenheimer sent alongside a ship at Sydney a quantity of cobalt ore, and obtained for it a bill of lading dated the 21st July, in which the parcel was described as "P.M. 2680 bags containing 100 tons cobalt ore." He also took out a policy of insurance on the goods. On or about the 12th July he left with the chemist Helms a packet of ore with instructions that it should be analysed. This sample Helms accordingly analysed, and on the 17th July handed the certificate to Oppenheimer. It is as follows:

Dr. Helms, M.A., F.C.S., Consulting and Analytical Chemist, 8, Bridge-street, Sydney, July 17, 1902.—Adolphus Oppenheimer, Esq., Box 1229 G.P.O.—Dear Sir,—The sample of cobalt ore received from you on the 12th July gave the following results: 4.14 per cent.

cobalt, equal to 5.27 per cent. cobalt protoxide in the dry ore; 9.25 per cent. moisture.—Yours faithfully, A. HELMS.

Furnished with these three documents—the bill of lading, the policy, and the certificate—Oppenheimer on the 22nd July went to the defendant bank and asked for his money, 800*l*. The bank manager examined the documents and pointed out to Oppenheimer that there was nothing on the face of the certificate to connect it with the goods mentioned in the bill of lading, and he refused to pay the money until the certificate was put right. Oppenheimer then returned to Helms and marked the sample packet “P.M. 2680 bags representing 100 tons,” and asked Helms for a fresh certificate, which Helms accordingly gave him. The fresh certificate is in the following terms:

Dr. Helms, M.A., F.C.S., Consulting and Analytical Chemist, 8, Bridge-street, Sydney, July 17, 1902.—Adolphus Oppenheimer, Esq., Box 1229 G.P.O.—Dear Sir,—The sample of cobalt ore marked “P.M. 2680 bags representing 100 tons” received from you on the 12th July gave the following results: 4.14 per cent. cobalt, equal to 5.27 per cent. cobalt protoxide in the dry ore; 9.25 per cent. moisture.—Yours faithfully, A. HELMS.

With this second certificate Oppenheimer again visited the bank. The bank manager expressed himself satisfied; took the documents; obtained from Oppenheimer his draft at sight on the Deutsche Bank for 800*l*., and gave to Oppenheimer that amount, less the bank's charge for the business—a small sum of a quarter or a half per cent. In due course the bill was forwarded to London, and on the following 30th Aug. it was paid by the Deutsche Bank no doubt with money provided for the purpose by the plaintiffs. Very shortly after parting with the money the defendants in Sydney discovered that Oppenheimer had been guilty of a trick. The ore which had been sent down to the ship was worthless, whereas the sample which he had taken to Helms, and which was supposed to represent the bulk, was good, and answered to the requirements of his contract with the plaintiffs. On the 15th Aug. the defendants by cable advised the Deutsche Bank of the fraud. Subsequently Oppenheimer was prosecuted in Sydney for obtaining the 800*l*. from the defendants by fraudulent misrepresentation, and being convicted was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. The ore was never put on board ship; it was not worth the cost of carriage. Thus the plaintiffs, who have paid 800*l*., have received nothing for their money. They now seek to make the defendants responsible for the loss, on the ground that in paying the money to Oppenheimer in exchange for the false certificate they failed or neglected to observe the terms of their mandate. The defendants resist the claim on three grounds. First, they say that they have properly performed the orders given to them; secondly, they say there is no privity of contract between themselves and the plaintiffs—in other words, they contend that their employers were the Deutsche Bank and no one else; and, thirdly, they say that the plaintiffs have repaid the 800*l*. with full knowledge of all the facts and cannot, therefore, now recover back the amount. It is only necessary for me to deal with the first of these contentions, for I think the defendants are entitled to succeed upon it. What was the mandate to the defendants? It was to pay to Oppenheimer 800*l*. in exchange for certain documents which Oppenheimer was to bring to them. Oppenheimer was intrusted by the plaintiffs to obtain these documents. It was he who was to get the bill of lading from the shipowner; it was he who was to get the insurance policy from the underwriter; and it was he who was to get the certificate of analysis from Dr. Helms. With this part of the business the defendants had nothing whatever to do; their duties did not begin until Oppenheimer brought the documents to them. What those duties then were is, in my opinion, quite plain. The defendants were in the first instance to see that they dealt with the right man; this they had to do at their own peril. If they had parted with the money to someone who was not in fact the man indicated in the mandate they could not, I think, have required the plaintiffs to repay the amount; and it would not have mattered how careful they might have been in making their inquiries. But once they were in touch with the right man the defendants' only remaining duty was to see that the documents which he brought purported on their face to be the documents described in the mandate. It was no part of their duty to verify the genuineness of the documents; the duty was not cast upon them of making inquiries at the office of the ship's agent as to whether the goods had, in truth, been received on board; nor were they to examine the contents of the packages to see whether they were right; nor were they to communicate with Dr. Helms in order to ascertain whether he had properly made the analysis mentioned in the certificate. The plaintiffs' mandate amounted in business to a representation to the defendants that upon all such matters they might rely on Oppenheimer, and the legal effect of such a representation is now to preclude the plaintiffs from questioning the validity of any apparently regular documents which Oppenheimer might tender. If this is so, then the only question left on this part of the case is whether the documents were apparently regular. It is admitted by the plaintiffs that the bill of lading and the policy of insurance were apparently regular, but an objection is made on this score to Helms' certificate. It is said that it professes to show merely the test of the contents of a sample packet with a mark upon it, and does not purport to show a test of the bill of lading of 100 tons of ore. This, I think, is a fanciful objection. Large quantities of produce are necessarily tested by means of samples. Such samples are drawn either by the servants of the owner of the goods or (as it seems) by the servants of the analyst, and if the samples are carefully and skilfully drawn they generally fairly represent the bulk. But in this case it would be no part of the bank's duty to see to the sampling or to ascertain that it was fairly done. The bank were entitled to assume that it was so, just as they were entitled to assume that the analyst had acted skilfully in making the analysis. The certificate is, in my opinion, regular on its face, and comes within the meaning of the mandate under which the bank were acting, and the bank in taking it acted carefully and properly.

Marine insurance—Underwriters' right to discovery and production—Action by underwriters against assured to recover over-payments.*

In an action by underwriters to recover the amount of overcharges which they had paid to the assured in respect of claims upon policies of marine insurance, which overcharges they alleged had been obtained by means of false and fraudulent accounts:

Held (allowing the appeal), that the underwriters were entitled to have as full discovery from the assured as they would have been entitled to in an action brought against them upon the policies.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the order of Bucknill, J. made at chambers.

This action was brought by a number of underwriters against the defendants to recover the amount of alleged overcharges made in claims under policies of marine insurance underwritten by the plaintiffs; and also to recover damages for conspiracy to defraud the plaintiffs.

The defendants were Houlder Brothers and Co., Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, C. F.
Hartridge, C. K. Etheridge, W. O. Beard, James Littlefield and Co., A. G. Inrig, Inrig and Chester, the Globe Electrical Company, and the Queen's Dock Electric Works Limited.

The plaintiffs had underwritten a large number of policies upon steamers, the insurances being effected by Houlder Brothers and Co. in their own names.

Houlder Brothers and Co. were the managing owners of the steamers, and made many claims under the policies of insurance and had received payment from the underwriters.

The plaintiffs alleged that some of these claims were fraudulent; that the defendants, other than Houlder Brothers and Co., had made out excessive claims for repairs, and that Houlder Brothers and Co. had supported those claims by means of false accounts for the purpose of defrauding the underwriters. The plaintiffs alleged that they had in consequence paid amounts much larger than the repairs had really cost, and they claimed repayment of the overcharges.

Some of the steamers in respect of which claims were made were owned by single-ship companies. These companies went into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of amalgamation into one company—the Houlder Line Limited.

The Houlder Line Limited were not made parties to this action.

Houlder Brothers and Co., while denying liability, paid a large sum of money into court, which they alleged to be sufficient to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

An order was made, on the application of the plaintiffs, that the defendants should give particulars of the payment into court.

Particulars were given, but they did not sufficiently show in respect of which policies and underwriters the payment into court was made.

An affidavit of documents was made on behalf of the defendants, on the 11th Jan. 1904, in which it was sworn that the defendants Houlder Brothers and Co. and Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited had formerly in their possession as managers of certain single-ship companies certain specified policies of insurance; that all the said policies had in April 1903, pursuant to an order of Buckley, J., been deposited in court and subsequently handed over to the liquidator of the said companies; that the said policies were in the exclusive possession and custody and control of the said liquidator as such; and that the defendants were not able to produce the said policies; and that the defendants, who formerly constituted the firm of Houlder Brothers and Co., had in their possession solely as directors of the Houlder Line Limited, and not otherwise, certain specified policies which were the property of and in the possession, custody, and control of that company.

On the 18th Jan. 1904 the master made an order that the defendants Houlder Brothers and Co., Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, and C. F. Hartridge should within six weeks from the 2nd Dec. 1903 file their affidavit of discovery; and that the defendants should produce the several policies for inspection by the plaintiffs and their solicitors within one week on usual notice, subject to any order of Buckley, J. as to any documents in the custody of the court or of the liquidator.

The defendants Houlder Brothers and Co.
Houlder Brothers and Co. Limited, and C. F.
Hartridge appealed, and Bucknill, J., at chambers, made an order that the order of the master should be varied "by limiting the discovery to the policies in the possession or control of the defendants as such, excluding those which are in the possession of the liquidator and Houlder Line Limited."

The plaintiffs appealed, with leave.

*Rufus Isaacs, K.C., Sims Williams, and T.
Mathew* for the appellants.—In this action the plaintiffs are entitled to the fullest possible discovery—that is, they are entitled to the same large order for discovery as they would be entitled to in an action brought against them as underwriters upon the policies of insurance. The right of underwriters to the largest measure of discovery is well settled by a series of cases extending over a long period:

mercial Union Assurance Company*, 45 L. T.

CT. OF APP.] BOULTON AND OTHERS v. HOULDER BROTHERS AND CO., &C. [CT. OF APP.]

The reason of the rule is that the underwriters are necessarily in ignorance as to all matters connected with the ship, whereas the shipowner knows or has the means of knowledge, and the underwriters are entitled to rely on the good faith of the assured. Underwriters, therefore, are entitled to discovery not only of all documents in the possession of the assured, but also of all documents of which the assured can get possession by any reasonable means. The same principle must apply to the present action, in which the underwriters are seeking to recover overcharges which, relying on the good faith of the assured, they have paid without inquiry, and their position is the same as if they were resisting a claim upon the policies:

Boulton v. Houlder Brothers and Co., 9 Com. Cas. 75.

Inspection of the indorsements upon the policies will enable the plaintiffs to ascertain whether the sum which the defendants have paid into court is sufficient to repay all the overcharges which they have paid.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., Bremner, and G. Hay Morgan for the respondents.—The order made by the learned judge was quite right. The rule applicable to actions upon policies against underwriters is not applicable to a case of this kind. This is not an action upon a policy of marine insurance. It is an action in which the plaintiffs allege fraud and conspiracy, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to this discovery. The rule applicable to actions upon policies of marine insurance has never been applied in any other kind of action; that practice is strictly confined to the particular class of actions:

Henderson v. Underwriting and Agency Association, 64 L. T. Rep. 774; (1891) 1 Q. B. 557;

Thomson v. Weems, 9 App. Cas. 671;

Cory v. Patton, 26 L. T. Rep. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304;

Twissell v. Allen, 5 M. & W. 337.

The defendants have no power to produce the documents in the possession of the liquidator or of Houlder Line Limited; and they cannot be ordered to produce those which are in their possession only as agents for others:

Williams v. Ingram, 16 Times L. Rep. 451.

Sims Williams in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the order of Bucknill, J. on a claim for discovery by the plaintiffs. There is this peculiarity about the case, that the plaintiffs in this case are underwriters, and they are seeking to recover from the defendants sums which they say they have overpaid to the defendants, who were the assured of these underwriters. It is the fact and it is common ground now that the defendants, being the assured of these underwriters, did demand and receive from the underwriters sums in respect of damage to ships insured by them in excess of the sums really due from these underwriters. Now, the case is complicated in this way. The persons who received these sums and claimed them under policies effected by them with the underwriters were themselves agents for certain companies, and were also partly acting for themselves, and if in those proceedings on those policies the underwriters had resisted the claims or had thought it desirable to investigate the claims against them, there is no doubt whatever, and it is common ground and it has not been disputed in this case, that those underwriters would then have been entitled to the fullest possible discovery which is now asked for in this case. That is common ground, and that discovery would, according to a long series of cases, have imposed the obligation on the part of the person suing the underwriters to produce, or, failing their ability to produce, to give reasons thoroughly satisfactory to the court on oath explaining their inability to do so, those documents which were not in their own custody, or which were in their custody merely as agents for other persons. They would have had to account for the inability to produce them or they would have to satisfy the court that they had taken the utmost possible means in their power to enable them to give to the underwriters all information with respect to them and appertaining to them. That would have been the obligation had these underwriters for any reason sought to sift and investigate the liability asserted by the assured in suing upon the policies. The underwriters, dealing with the assured not only as honourable men but as men whose servants and agents were not likely to make mistakes in their own favour, did not demand the discovery which they were entitled to, and they paid without further investigation claims which were made against them, and it turns out now that those claims were largely, or at all events to a considerable extent, in excess of the sums which were due. In that state of things the underwriters who have so paid became aware of the fact that they had been called upon to pay, and had paid, large sums which really represented losses that had not occurred—that is to say, that they had been called upon to pay sums which were largely in excess of the damages that had been sustained by the assured. Under those circumstances they have brought an action to recover that excess, and in form have alleged a fraudulent conspiracy to exact from the underwriters sums in excess of those which were really due. Being now the plaintiffs in an action, they demand the same discovery, and no other, that they would have had from the same persons had they been the defendants sued by those persons, and the only reason they did not get it before is because, to use a neutral term, owing to the misstatements of the assured they were really to forego their unquestioned right of getting this discovery from the assured in the first instance. They say now that they are not to be placed in a worse position as to their right to discovery because they forewent their right to demand it when the claim was made by the assured; that it was through the conduct of the assured that they have been obliged now to put themselves into the position of plaintiffs to get back from the assured that which never ought to have been paid them, and which was paid them on their misrepresentations. Then it was contended for the defendants that the court ought not to give in an action for conspiracy a right of discovery which is only given in an action of marine insurance, and ought not to extend that inspection to the plaintiffs. I say that we ought to do so, because in substance this really is an action on a policy of marine insurance. It is, as I have pointed out, entirely brought about by the defendants that the position of the parties has been changed and shifted from plaintiff to defendant. It seems to me that where that change has taken place and is to be imputed only to the misstatements made by the assured to the underwriters, the underwriters, in a proceeding to repair that fault, ought not to be in a worse position than that in which they would have been if but for the misrepresentation of the plaintiffs they had been allowed to sift and had sifted the case according to their rights. Therefore it seems to me that I am not really extending the principle which lies at the bottom of these matters at all. I am treating the case as one bringing into suit the rights as between assessor and assured. It does not matter, it seems to me, for that purpose which of the parties is plaintiff or defendant. The relation between underwriter and assured is such that this discovery is the due of the underwriter against the assured. The reasons for it have been repeatedly given by various judges, and we have had the authorities cited to us going back for a long time. Mr. Hamilton sought to insist that it was merely some special provision owing to the fact that at one stage in the cases an order for consolidation was required and that certain terms were introduced upon the giving of that order. Now, it may be perfectly true that that was the occasion which gave the courts the opportunity of enforcing this particular obligation upon persons suing underwriters, but it was not the ground of that intervention at all. It was the opportunity of putting into practice a principle derived from the fact of a special relation between assured and underwriter. Originally in the courts of equity to which the underwriter formerly had to go for discovery, and subsequently as a matter of course in the courts of common law, there has been adopted and recognised this large discovery incident to the contract of insurance. That being so, it seems to me there is no dangerous extension whatever in applying in this case, which is a litigation between assured and underwriter, the principle of this discovery, which is the right of the underwriter when he is sued by the assured. Now, the reason why this larger discovery is sought in this case is that many of the documents, the policies of insurance in particular, are said to be in the custody of the defendants only as agents for other persons, although they are themselves interested, and some of them are in the custody of the liquidator of some of the companies. I am clearly of opinion, for the reasons I have given, that the plaintiffs here are entitled to this discovery. The particular form which it ought to take is a matter of some nicety, and therefore we shall leave the form of the order to be drawn up between the parties and settled by one of us if necessary; but it certainly ought to embrace a statement on oath by the defendants as to what steps they have taken to put themselves in a position to produce these documents to the plaintiffs, or, failing to produce them, to give them such information as to them as they can obtain by all reasonable exertions on their part. It appears clear to my mind that the plaintiffs here are entitled to the same measure of discovery that they would have been entitled to if they had been defendants in an action brought by the assured against the underwriter. That relief I think they are entitled to, and therefore I think that this appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I have felt considerable doubts in this case, and I cannot say that those doubts are wholly removed; but my brethren are clearly of opinion that the whole practice with regard to policies of marine insurance referred to in the authorities, as, for example, in the case of West of England District Bank v. The Canton Insurance Company (ubi sup.), can be and ought to be applied in this case as against the defendants. That being so, I shall not differ from them. My doubt arises owing to the fact that in this case the defendants appear to have effected the policies on behalf of certain limited companies who are not parties to the action, and that this action is one for damages for a fraud alleged to have been committed by the defendants. I am, however, very pleased to think that, on the merits of this case, apart from technical objections, there is no good reason, so far as appears why these policies should not be produced by those who have the actual custody of them; and I think, moreover, that if the defendants do their best there is every reason to hope that they can in fact get them produced, and certainly the production of these documents is most important to the plaintiffs in this action.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As at present advised I think that there should be an order for the production of these documents, and also that the defendants must show by affidavit what exertions they have made to produce documents which they are unable to produce, and state what they know as to the contents of such documents and the indorsements thereon. This case is an important one, as it appears to be necessary to reiterate a well-established rule upon the subject. It is an essential term of a contract of insurance that the underwriters shall be fairly treated, not only with reference to the inception of the risk, but also in carrying out the contract. That has very often been laid down and has been constantly acted upon. Effect is given to that rule by the practice as to discovery of ship's papers, under which the assured suing upon a policy is made to give such very drastic discovery. It is suggested that the case is quite different when the underwriter sues the assured, but it seems to me that the contract being the same the underwriter is entitled to the same information. The defendants then contend that, as they are being sued for improper conduct and conspiracy, they ought not to be ordered to give this discovery. Then they say that, in respect of the companies in liquidation, they were only managers and cannot now do anything without the consent of the liquidator. That must be explained. Unless there is some very good reason to the contrary, the liquidator ought to permit the policies to be produced. I agree, therefore, that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

March 9, 10, and 11.

MATHEW, L.JJ.)

HARMAN v. AINSLIE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Proviso for re-entry—"Commit any breach of covenants to be performed"—Breach of covenant not to underlet without consent.

In a lease containing covenants by the lessee to pay rent, rates, and taxes, to repair, to repair within three months after notice, not to use the premises except for a specified purpose, and not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessor, there was a proviso for re-entry "if the lessee shall commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed."

Held (reversing the judgment of Wright, J.), that the proviso for re-entry applied to a breach of the covenant not to assign or underlet without the consent of the lessor.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Wright, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of a house under a proviso for re-entry contained in the lease of the premises.

By a lease, dated the 8th July 1885, S. Popple-dorf demised the house in question to E. C. Alderman for the term of twenty-one years from the 24th June 1885 at the yearly rent of 60l.

The lease contained covenants on the part of the lessee to pay the rent reserved; to pay all rates and taxes; to repair and keep in repair; that it should be lawful for the lessor to enter and inspect the premises and to give written notice of any want of repair; that the lessee would repair within three months after such notice; not to use or suffer the said premises or any part thereof to be used for any art, trade, or business whatsoever except the trade of an outfitter without the licence or consent in writing of the lessor; to insure; and to deliver up the premises and fixtures in such good repair and condition at the expiration or sooner determination of the term "as shall be consistent with the due performance of the several covenants hereinbefore contained."

There was also a covenant as follows:

That the said lessee shall not nor will during the term hereby granted assign, underlet, or part with the possession of the said premises or any part thereof, or do or commit any act or thing whereby or by means whereof the said premises or any part thereof may be assigned or otherwise disposed of or the possession thereof parted with to any person or persons whomsoever for the whole or any part of the said term (except the letting part of the said messuage or dwelling-house as offices or lodgings) without the consent in writing of the lessor first had and obtained for that purpose, such consent, however, not to be unreasonably withheld in case of a proposed assignment to a respectable and responsible person.

Then followed a proviso for re-entry in these terms:

Provided always that if the said yearly rent of 60l. or any part thereof shall be unpaid for the space of forty-two days whether the same shall have been legally demanded or not, or if the said lessee shall commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed, then and in either of the said cases the said lessor may re-enter upon the said premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole and immediately thereupon this demise shall absolutely determine.

Then there was a covenant by the lessor that:

"The said lessee paying the said rent and observing and performing all the covenants hereinbefore contained" should have quiet possession of the premises.

It was provided that the expression "lessor" should include the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the lessor and all persons claiming through the lessor; and that the expression "lessee" should include the executors, administrators, and assigns of the lessee.

With the consent of the lessor the lease had been assigned to one Comber, and subsequently became vested in the defendant. The plaintiff was the grantee of the reversion upon the lease.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had committed a breach of the covenant not to suffer the premises to be used for any business other than that of an outfitter without the consent of the lessor, and also a breach of the covenant not to underlet without the consent of the lessor.

The action was tried before Wright, J. without a jury. The learned judge held that the defendant had not broken the first covenant, but that he had broken the covenant not to assign; he further held that the proviso for re-entry did not apply to breaches of negative covenants, and gave judgment for the defendant: (88 L. T. Rep. 770).

The plaintiff appealed. On the hearing of the appeal the plaintiff did not contend that there had been a breach of the covenant as to user of the premises.

Younger, K.C. and J. Samuel Green for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that the proviso for re-entry in this lease must be construed as applying only to breaches of the negative covenants contained in the lease, and not to breaches of the affirmative covenants. It has never been expressly decided that the word "perform" in such a proviso for re-entry as this, cannot apply to breaches of negative covenants. There are, however, dicta in many cases, some in favour of the appellant's contention and some in favour of the respondent's. In the latest case, Barrow v. Isaacs (64 L. T. Rep. 686; (1891) 1 Q. B. 417), Lord Esher, M.R. expressed the opinion that the word "perform" would apply to a covenant not to assign without the lessor's consent; and Kay, L.J. said: "Another point made was that that proviso for re-entry refers only to the breach of affirmative and not of negative covenants. This is founded on certain obiter dicta in Hyde v. Warden (37 L. T. Rep. 567; 3 Ex. Div. 72). Speaking for myself, I should think that an extremely narrow construction if the word "perform" only had been used. "Perform" has not necessarily an active meaning. We say that a man performs his duty by not answering revilings, by being silent when he ought not to speak, and by many other abstentions from acting as well as by active proceedings." In Croft v. Lumley (6 H. of L. Cas. 672), in the House of Lords, many of the judges expressed an opinion that the word "perform" can apply to negative covenants, more especially Martin, B. Timms v. Baker (49 L. T. Rep. 106) is also in favour of the plaintiff's contention. In the cases relied upon by the defendant there are no doubt expressions of opinion that the word "perform" will not apply to negative covenants, but they were unnecessary to the decisions in those cases; and those opinions are contrary to the opinions expressed in the House of Lords and in the latest case in the Court of Appeal. Those cases are:

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Doe v. Marchetti, 1 B. & Ad. 715; 35 R. R. 420;
West v. Dobb, 20 L. T. Rep. 737; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 460;
Hyde v. Warden, 37 L. T. Rep. 567; 3 Ex. Div. 72;
Evans v. Davis, 39 L. T. Rep. 391; 10 Ch. Div. 747.

Reading this lease as a whole, and fairly construing it, the words "on his part to be performed" seem to be used only for the purpose of referring to covenants on the part of the lessee, and the intention clearly is that the lessor may re-enter if the lessee "commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained" entered into by the lessee. If the lessor has not reserved a right of re-entry for breach of the covenant not to assign, he has no effective remedy at all for breach of that covenant. The covenant not to assign without the lessor's consent is not strictly what is called a negative covenant, for it involves the doing of something by the lessee—that is, the obtaining of the consent of the lessor. The whole intent and substance of the provisions in the lease must be looked at, and not merely the strict form:

Duke of St. Albans v. Ellis, 16 East, 352; 14 R. R. 361;
Clegg v. Hands, 62 L. T. Rep. 502; 44 Ch. Div. 503;
Metropolitan Electric Supply Company v. Ginder, 84 L. T. Rep. 816; (1901) 2 Ch. 799;
Mason v. Corder, 7 Taunt. 9; 17 R. R. 427.

Hume Williams, K.C. and R. J. N. Neville for the respondent.—The judgment of the learned judge was perfectly right, and in accordance with the authorities and the true construction of this lease. It has been well settled for a long period that clauses of forfeiture contained in leases must be most strictly construed. It must clearly appear that the proviso for re-entry or condition was meant to include, and does include, the covenant for breach whereof the right to re-enter is claimed. In this lease the right to re-enter is given only if the lessee commits a breach of covenants to be "performed" by him, and the lease contains covenants both of a negative character and of an affirmative character. It is clear, therefore, that the proviso refers only to covenants which are to be "performed"—that is, covenants by which the lessee has bound himself to do something. There is a long series of authorities which show that the word "perform," in a proviso for re-entry, does not apply to negative covenants:

Doe v. Marchetti, 1 B. & Ad. 715; 35 R. R. 420;
Doe v. Stevens, 3 B. & Ad. 299; 37 R. R. 429;
Doe v. Godwin, 4 M. & S. 265; 16 R. R. 463;
West v. Dobb, 20 L. T. Rep. 737; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 460;

Hyde v. Warden, 37 L. T. Rep. 567; 3 Ex. Div. 72;
Evans v. Davis, 39 L. T. Rep. 391; 10 Ch. Div. 747.

In Croft v. Lumley (6 H. L. Cas. 672) the words "observed and kept," as well as the word "performed," were used, and the former words do apply to a negative covenant; and in Barrow v. Isaacs (64 L. T. Rep. 686; (1891) 1 Q. B. 417) the word "observe" was used as well as the word "perform." The dicta in Barrow v. Isaacs (ubi sup.) must not be taken to have overruled the long line of previous authorities to the contrary. The covenant here in question is clearly a purely negative covenant, and is not made an affirmative covenant by the fact that it is a covenant not to do something without the lessor's consent:

Doe v. Guest, 15 M. & W. 160.

In the covenant for quiet enjoyment in this lease the words used are "the lessee observing and performing all the covenants hereinbefore contained." That shows that the distinction was clearly understood, and that the parties intended the proviso for re-entry to apply only to affirmative covenants, and not to negative covenants, to which the word "observe" properly applies. It is to be presumed that the parties intentionally omitted the word "observe" from the proviso for re-entry. The two negative covenants in this lease are not "usual" covenants, and a proviso for re-entry on breach of those covenants is not a "usual" condition:

Re Anderton and Milner's Contract, 63 L. T. Rep. 332; 45 Ch. Div. 476.

That would be a good reason why this proviso was not so drawn as to apply to those negative covenants. The provisions of the Conveyancing Acts as to relief have not done away with the old rule that a proviso for re-entry must be most strictly construed in cases like this, where no relief can be given under those Acts:

Villiers v. Oldcorn, 20 Times L. Rep. 11.

The lessor is not without an effective remedy in respect of this covenant, for he can obtain an injunction to restrain a threatened assignment:

McEacharn v. Colton and others, 85 L. T. Rep. 594; (1902) A. C. 104.

This breach of covenant was waived by acceptance of rent by the landlord with knowledge of the breach:

Miles v. Tobin, 17 L. T. Rep. 432.

This point was taken before Wright, J., but he did not deal with it at all, being in favour of the defendant on the other point.

Younger, K.C. in reply.—The lessor could not obtain an injunction in respect of an assignment which had been already made; and an action for damages would be quite ineffective as a remedy.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Wright, J., and the question is whether the plaintiff, the lessor, has a right to eject the defendant under the terms of a particular lease on the ground that there has been a forfeiture based upon a breach of one or two of the covenants. This action is brought by the assignee of the reversion against an assignee of the term, and there were two grounds alleged of forfeiture, the one a breach of the covenant not to use the premises except for a particular purpose, and the other a breach of the covenant not to sublet. Now, the matter before us has been narrowed down to the question of what are the rights of the parties on the basis of a breach of the covenant not to sublet. With respect to the covenant not to carry on certain trades, the defendant admitted that this had been done, but he contended that, by reason of a permission given to his predecessor, the original lessee, it was no breach of the covenant, and on that point Wright, J. has held in his favour, and Mr. Younger (without quite admitting that Wright, J. was right on that matter) did not urge the appeal before us on that point. Therefore the discussion before us has been limited to what the rights of the parties are in the event of there being a subletting without consent. Now, the main point decided by Wright, J. is that, on the terms of the particular covenant not to sublet in this lease, and the terms of the proviso for re-entry, the proviso was inapplicable to such a covenant by reason of its being a negative covenant. That is the ground upon which Wright, J. decided this case, and that is the principal ground of the appeal. Now, of course that question depends on the wording of the deed itself, and therefore I must consider it in some detail. The lease was made on the 8th July 1885 between the original lessee, one Mrs. Poppleadorff, and the lessee E. C. Alderman, and it witnesses that in consideration "of the rent and covenants hereinafter reserved and contained on the part of the said lessee to be paid, observed, and performed, the said lessor doth hereby demise"; and proceeds: "And also yielding and paying in the event of and immediately upon the said term being determined by re-entry under the powers hereinafter contained a proportionate part of the said rent immediately upon the said term being determined by re-entry under the powers hereinafter contained." Then come the covenants to pay rent, taxes, and so on. Then follows: "And also will throughout the said term at his and their own expense without being thereunto required well and sufficiently repair, maintain," and so on; and also that the lessor may inspect to see whether reasonable repairs have been carried out; "And further that the said lessee shall not nor will during the said term hereby granted use or suffer the said premises or any part thereof to be used for any act trade or business whatsoever excepting the trade of an outfitter without the licence or consent in writing of the said lessor for that purpose first obtained"; "And moreover that the said lessee shall not nor will during the term hereby granted assign underlet or part with the possession of the said premises or any part thereof or do or commit any act or thing whereby or by means whereof the said premises or any part thereof may be assigned or otherwise disposed of or the possession thereof parted with to any person or persons whomsoever for the whole or any part of the said term (except the letting part of the said messuage or dwelling-house as offices or lodgings) without the consent in writing of the said lessor first had and obtained for that purpose such consent, however, not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a proposed assignment to a respectable and responsible person; and also will at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term deliver up to the said lessor the said premises and all fixtures and additions thereto in such good and substantial repair and condition as shall be consistent with the due performance of the several covenants hereinbefore contained." Then comes the proviso: "Provided always that if the said yearly rent of 60*l.* or any part thereof shall be unpaid for the space of forty-two days whether the same shall have been legally demanded or not or if the said lessee shall commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed then and in either of the said cases the said lessor may re-enter upon the said premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole and immediately thereupon this demise shall absolutely determine." Then follows this covenant by the lessor: "And the said lessor doth hereby covenant with the said lessee that the said lessee paying the said rent and observing and performing all the covenants hereinbefore contained shall and may peaceably and quietly hold and enjoy," and so on. Now we come to the point which turns upon what is the effect of this proviso, having regard to the fact that the covenant is negative. It is contended, and has been held by Wright, J., that, the proviso being in these terms, "If the said lessee shall commit any breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed," these words "on his part to be performed" make it impossible to give effect to the proviso when that which is the subject-matter of the alleged breach is the assigning or subletting without consent; that that class of breach is a breach which cannot be described as a performance or a "breach of the covenants hereinbefore contained and on his part to be performed." It is said that one cannot "perform" a negative covenant, and on that ground Wright, J. has decided this case. Now, that law goes very far back in our history, and the root of it is a statement in Coke upon Littleton, which is cited in a note to a case which has been relied upon for the respondent here—Doe v. Marchetti (1 B. & Ad. 715; 35 R. R. 420)—in these terms: "A man is bound to perform all the covenants in an indenture. If all the covenants be in the affirmative, he may generally plead performance of all, but if any be in the negative, to so many he must plead specially, for a negative cannot be performed." Now, that is the basis of a ruling which has never been, so far as I know, the subject of any express decision; but it has been the subject of numerous dicta in various cases, and we have had all the cases cited, and they are now open before us. To my mind, there has been no decision upon the point, and certainly no decision in favour of the view contended for by Mr. Hume Williams. The basis is this dictum, which is no doubt one of high authority; but it is limited in its terms to the case of a pleading: "A man is bound to perform all the covenants of an indenture," and in the context "perform" involves an operation, that the performance is to carry out the obligation, positive or negative; "If all the covenants be in the affirmative he can generally plead performance of all, but if any be in the negative to so many he must plead specially, for a negative cannot be performed." In that very sentence he uses "perform" in the sense that it is giving effect to the obligation; that effect may be given by not doing that which he has undertaken not to do. It seems to me that the confusion that has arisen, the difficulty which has been felt with regard to this matter, really turns upon a confusion between the obligation accepted and the thing that is to be done in order to perform the obligation. When one speaks of a covenant to be performed and of performing the covenant it is in the sense of fulfilling a duty. The bargain is to perform the covenant, whether the performance be by abstaining from doing something or by doing something. It is used in that sense in several of the cases that we have had to consider, and it is used in that sense in this passage, which is the very foundation of the whole matter: "A man is bound to perform all the covenants in an indenture." It starts with that, and in that context it means carry out the obligation whether it be negative or affirmative; but when the occasion of pleading performance arises this dictum, which was given, of course, when the rules of pleading were very technical, says if a man wants to plead performance of a negative covenant he must plead specially, for a negative cannot be performed. Now, that is the basis of the whole matter. Then we follow it through the numerous decisions cited and commented upon by the learned counsel, but the nearest thing to a decision—in fact I think the only case that is claimed as a decision by Mr. Hume Williams in his favour on this matter, this very case of Doe v. Marchetti (ubi sup.)—was a decision which in my judgment was not a decision on this point. The headnote is this: "A proviso in a lease giving a power of re-entry if the tenant makes default in performance of any of the clauses by the space of thirty days after notice does not apply to the breach of a covenant not to allow alterations in the premises, or to permit new buildings to be made upon them without permission, and an undertenant having erected a portico contrary to the covenant, and notice having been given to him to replace the premises in their former state, which he neglected to do for thirty days: Held, that no forfeiture was incurred." Now, the pith of that case is expressed in one sentence in the judgment of Lord Tenterden: "But it cannot be supposed that the parties anticipated a thirty days' notice being given not to raise the walls or vary from the original plan of the premises, or not to suffer buildings to be erected or windows or openings to be made. It is quite different where the notice required is to do some such act as repairing or paying money; then a stipulation for notice is reasonably introduced, and is evidently for the benefit of the lessee. Taking the whole clause of re-entry together, I think the introduction of these words 'by the space of thirty days next after notice' confines it to those covenants which are to be performed by the lessee, and which not being performed he incurs a forfeiture." It was impossible to introduce the clause as to thirty days after notice so as to make it applicable to the particular circumstances of that case, and it is only a decision with respect to the particular circumstances of that case which contained this impossibility of being applied—namely, thirty days' notice in case of a breach. That, in my judgment, is certainly not a decision upon the point; it does not really touch the point. I have examined that dictum with such qualifications as I think are inherent in the very terms of the clause itself; and now we have to follow out the string of authorities on the matter, which I do not pause to deal with in very great detail, because they have all been cited and commented upon before the court, and we have had considerable observation upon them. There are one or two to which I must refer. Now, there being no decision, we have to examine the dicta upon the point. There are numerous dicta upon the point, and there are one or two that are certainly strong in favour of the contention of the appellant in this case, and there are some which are in favour of the respondent. But it seems to me that the dicta up to the last and most important one are quite as favourable to the view of the appellant as to that of the respondent. Now, one of the leading cases in this matter is the case of Croft v. Lumley (6 H. L. Cas. 672), which went to the House of Lords. There the material words were these: "If Lumley shall make default of or in the performance of all or of any of the other covenants hereinbefore contained which on his part are or ought to be performed, observed, and kept," and the question was whether there had been a breach of the negative covenant not to assign for a certain term. All the judges were of opinion that there had been a breach of that covenant which I have just named, and the dictum as it appears in the case of Doe v. Marchetti (ubi sup.) was commented on. The default there was specified to be default in the performance, or "if Lumley shall make default of or in the performance," and it was held that the not performing, observing, and keeping any one of them was a default in the performance. Now, Martin, B. in that case held, in the passage where he gave his opinion in the clearest possible terms, that there might be non-performance of a negative covenant, pointing out that it is a duty imposed by the covenant which is not performed, and that a man may break a covenant by doing something that he has undertaken not to do just as much as by not doing something that he has undertaken to do. He says this: "I do not myself consider there is any inaccuracy in language in saying that a man has performed his covenant when he has not done what he covenanted not to do, or that he made default in performing his covenant when he has done it. The abiding by a covenant is a performance of it, the non-abiding a non-performance. It was clearly the intention of the parties that the condition should extend to every breach of covenant, except those specially excepted; and whether it be a condition or a covenant, the intention of the parties, as shown by the words they use, is the true test." Now, as I have said, all the judges were of opinion that there was a breach of the covenant in the form I have named. Then we come to the dictum or opinion of Bramwell, B., which the respondent relies upon as being the strongest in his favour; but it does not appear to me at all to make in favour of the respondent in this case. Bramwell, B. says: "I think that default of or in performance of all covenants to be performed, observed, and kept applies to covenants not to do something as well as to covenants to do something." The learned judge no doubt lays stress on the words "observed

[OT. OF APP.]

HARMAN v. AINSLIE.

[OT. OF APP.]

and kept," but we all know that when one is deciding a point in our courts one does not necessarily decide, and one does not, if one can avoid it, decide anything which it is not necessary to decide, and having the words "performed, observed, and kept," he does deal with "observed and kept," which are much clearer words to make it possible to infer that there was a breach by reason of non-performance; but it is not in the least an authority that it may not have been equally broken had it been limited to the word "perform." But he does emphasise the words "observed and kept," and in that sense so far as that goes it leans in Mr. Hume Williams' direction, but it is very far from an expression of dissent from the view of Martin, B. that the word "perform" would be enough. I need not go through the statements of the judges, because the only two that have given anything that can be said to be a view on one side more than the other are those two—Bramwell, B. and Martin, B. Now, that is the strength of the authorities up to Croft v. Lumley (ubi sup.), which was a case in the House of Lords. I may just in passing refer to an observation of Lord Cranworth, referred to in the argument, which shows what principle ought to be observed in dealing with these covenants as well as with other covenants. He says this: "This is simply a question whether, either in form or in substance, it is any violation of the covenant to have made a lease which was to endure for one year and one year only commencing at the beginning of the ensuing season." So he treats the matter as one to be decided on the question whether there has been a breach, or whether either in form or in substance there has been a breach. I was dealing with the current of authorities, and I do not think it is necessary to go through them in detail, but we have in the case of West v. Dobbs (20 L. T. Rep. 37; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 460) the dicta of Kelly, C.B. and Channell, B., dicta which go a little beyond the current of authorities, because they treat the word "observed" as being exactly on the same footing as "performed." It is only a dictum, and it is open to the objection that it treats "observed" as "performed," and treats the word "observe" as a limitation that is apt to describe what ought to be done on a negative covenant. Then we come to Hyde v. Warden (ubi sup.), which is very much relied upon for a dictum of Brett, L.J. It is a dictum in a judgment read by Brett, L.J., but prepared by Amphlett, L.J., that if it had been necessary to decide that point he would have taken the view that "perform" is not a word which would be used in the sense of performing a negative covenant; but that dictum so far as it is a dictum of Brett, L.J. is directly contrary to another dictum of his later on, when he himself was presiding in the Court of Appeal. Then we come to Evans v. Davis (ubi sup.), which has been very much relied upon by Mr. Hume Williams for a dictum of Fry, L.J.; but all that amounts to is that in a particular case, not involving a decision of this point, he suggests that, if he had been bound to decide the point, he might possibly have felt bound to have decided the point on the dictum of Coke. I gather that it was not the inclination of his own judgment, but that he might, sitting in a court of first instance, have felt constrained to follow the dictum of Coke. I do not think it goes further than that. I pass over the intermediate authorities, which do not carry us any farther, and I come to what I think is the most important authority in modern times which has been called to our attention. That is the case of Barrow v. Isaacs (ubi sup.). In that case there are two important dicta; one by Lord Esher, M.R., who said: "It was argued by the defendant's counsel that the covenant not to underlet without the landlord's consent was a negative, not an affirmative, covenant, and that therefore the stipulation for re-entry for breach of the covenant did not apply. But I think that that proposition is disposed of because the word 'observe' as well as 'perform' has been put in the stipulation, though I doubt whether it was necessary to put that word in." Then Kay, L.J. said this: "Another point made was that the proviso for re-entry refers only to the breach of affirmative and not of negative covenants. That is founded on certain obiter dicta in Hyde v. Warden (ubi sup.). Speaking for myself, I should think that an extremely narrow construction of the word 'perform' if the word only had been used. 'Perform' has not necessarily an active meaning. We say that a man performs his duty by not answering revilings, by being silent when he ought not to speak, and by many other abstentions from acting, as well as by active proceedings. But where the words are 'observe' and 'perform' as here, there is no reasonable ground for confining those words to the breach of an affirmative covenant." Now, that is a strong opinion, based upon grounds which he states, by Kay, L.J., who, if anybody was, was an authority on this branch of law, that such words would justify a re-entry for the breach of a negative covenant. Now, I am not for a moment saying that this is an abstract question which can be decided without regard to the special words in particular leases. What we have got to do in these cases, as in every other, is to try to collect from the words used what the parties intended, and I do not say that in certain collocations the courts do not say that "perform" might be an inapt word to describe the breach of a negative covenant. It might be made inapt by context, just as in the case of Doe v. Marchetti (ubi sup.) the context made it quite impossible to reconcile the word "perform" with the obligation as to thirty days' notice so as to make it applicable to a negative covenant. It could not be done. But, subject to that, it seems to me that the string of authorities leaves us at large now to decide this matter according to our own view and according to common sense. It seems to me that the reasons given by Martin, B. and Kay, L.J. are reasons which do commend themselves to one's common sense, and in my view are much more strictly accurate, if one has to go into subtle analyses of words in this collocation, than the contrary view, because what it dealt with in these provisos for re-entry is the covenant and the obligation to observe the covenant, and when one is dealing with the covenant and not the thing to be done under the covenant, it is perfectly proper to describe the performance of the covenant as being that which is stipulated for, and the performance of the covenant is simply the keeping of the promise, which is another way of saying the same thing, and the promise is equally kept if he abstains from doing that which he has undertaken not to do or does that which he has undertaken to do. It is the obligation, not the mode of fulfilling the obligation, and what is treated as the breach is the non-performance of the obligation. If you tell me what he contracted to do, I will tell you whether he performed it or not; but it is put in broad language, failure to perform or default in performing, and the default is the thing. If there is default in performing the covenant, then the covenant has not been performed. If the thing to be done in order to perform the covenant was to abstain from doing something, it seems to me that, as far as the covenant is concerned, "perform" is the right word. The thing to be done might be described in some other phrase. If we are to go into the niceties of the matter, in absolute strictness "perform" is an absolutely legitimate word to express the doing of that which is undertaken to be done, that a man has performed his obligation, or has performed his promise. That being so, it seems to me there is no practical difficulty, and no real difficulty whatever, in applying the word performance as aptly describing the failure to do something, to keep the promise of a negative covenant. That being so, there is no reason why the proviso for re-entry should not apply in this case. There is no doubt that, at the time when this refinement was introduced, there was a very strong and natural leaning on the part of the court to avoid holding that there was a forfeiture. The law was not then as settled or as easy in application, and it was not then so easy to get relief against forfeiture, as it is in modern times, and therefore, speaking broadly, there is no reason why these clauses should not be construed fairly according to their grammatical meaning, taking the whole context together, or why the court should lean, or be said to lean, against a forfeiture. The Legislature has intervened in the matter. It has considered all the cases in which it might be fair that there should be relief; that relief is open for those who bring themselves within the conditions which the Legislature has said ought to be the conditions upon which they get that relief; and it does not affect that argument that in this particular case this particular covenant is one which the Legislature has thought fit should stand outside that particular form of relief. I am dealing with the principle of construction which led to what I think was the exceedingly narrow view taken in the old days of strict pleading, in the time of Coke, and applied to the doctrine of forfeiture. I do not think those general considerations apply to the case now. We are left with the right to decide this question upon our own judgment, and the last and most authoritative pronouncement on the matter is the pronouncement by two judges of the Court of Appeal in Barrow v. Isaacs (ubi sup.). I think, therefore, that we are entitled to follow their view rather than some of the earlier dicta. That being the state of the authorities, my own opinion, as I have said, is that in this particular case, in the context of this lease, I find nothing which in the slightest degree presses against the view that I have taken prima facie of what is meant by performing the covenant. I think that, in this case, it means the performance of the duty undertaken by the covenant; that duty in this case was not to do something, and therefore, it being broken, the person has done that which he undertook not to do. The inclination of the judgment of Wright, J. was in favour of the view I have taken; but he thought that he was overborne by the authorities. I think the authorities were not an obstacle to his applying his own common sense in the way he would have done if he had not felt overborne by them. I think, also, that the weight of authority in modern times is the other way. That really decides this appeal, but there was a question which arose at the trial and was discussed more or less by Mr. Hume Williams, in whose favour Wright, J. decided the case on the ground which I have discussed. Mr. Hume Williams had another point which, in view of the fact that the learned judge was with him on the first point, does not seem to have been pressed home, and it may be, and I think it is quite probable, that the course the case took and the attitude of the learned judge upon that point, may have probably influenced the learned counsel not to press home another point which would have been, if decided in his favour, conclusive of the case. That point is whether under the circumstances of the case there was a waiver by the plaintiff of this particular breach by subletting without consent. I think the justice of the case will be satisfied by sending the case back for that question to be tried. If it is to be tried again, the less I say upon the facts the better. With respect to this appeal before us, I think this has been an appeal on a very important point of law on which Wright, J. decided in favour of the plaintiff. Our view is that that decision is wrong and that the judgment must be reversed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It may, I think, be admitted that the word "perform" may in ordinary cases be said to be more especially appropriate to what may be called positive covenants; but it cannot be said, as a hard and fast rule, that the word is inappropriate to apply, at any rate, to some negative covenants. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that, speaking broadly, one may properly say what Martin, B. said in answering the question put to him in Croft v. Lumley (6 H. L. Cas. 672), that there is no necessary inaccuracy of language in saying that a man has performed his covenant when he has not done what he has covenanted not to do, or that he has made default in performing his covenant when he has done what he has covenanted not to do. After what the Master of the Rolls has said, I do not intend to go through the various cases and the observations of learned judges which have been called to our attention. All I need say is that, in the result, it appears to me that we are not bound to hold, and that it would not be right to hold, as a binding rule of construction that in provisos for re-entry the word "perform" must be construed as excluding all covenants by the lessee which may be called negative covenants. It may very well be that, in construing some provisos for re-entry in some leases, there may be sufficient to prevent the application of the word "perform" to some covenants in the lease; but the question whether in a proviso for re-entry in a lease the word "perform" does apply to and include certain negative covenants must depend upon the consideration of and true construction of the lease read and construed as a whole. Now, in the present case, I think that the words "to be performed" in the proviso for re-entry do

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

[CT. OF APP.]

include the preceding covenants in the lease which have been called, and may in a sense properly be called, negative covenants. What are those negative covenants? They are two only. The one is, stating it shortly, a covenant by the lessee not to carry on any business or trade on the demised premises other than that of an outfitter without the consent in writing of the lessor. The other is a covenant against subletting or assigning. Those two covenants have no doubt been put into a negative form as a matter of wording. But I observe that as a matter of substance they are not negative, or at any rate not purely negative. Take the covenant against carrying on a business. That covenant, as a matter of substance, might just as easily have been put, as a matter of wording, in a positive form. In a positive form it would have run as a covenant by the lessee that he would apply for and obtain the consent in writing of the lessor before carrying on any business other than that of an outfitter. Then take the case of underletting. That covenant might just as easily, as a matter of substance, have been worded as a covenant by the lessee that he would apply for and obtain the consent of the lessor before underletting; and the covenant against assigning might have been similarly worded. That being so, and bearing in mind what is the nature of the only two so-called negative covenants in this lease, I think that the words "to be performed" are not inapt to be applied to, and that on the construction of the proviso for re-entry they ought to be applied to and held to include the two so-called negative covenants. Moreover, I should like to add that it is very difficult to suppose that the proviso for re-entry was not intended to apply to such a covenant as that against assigning or underletting without first obtaining the consent in writing of the landlord, that covenant being one the breach of which is so serious, and is regarded as so serious both by the courts and the Legislature that relief cannot be given either under the ordinary doctrines of the court or under the provisions of the Conveyancing Act 1881. I may further observe that, if there were no right to re-enter for breach of that covenant, the covenant being clear in itself, for all practical purposes it would be useless. I will not labour that point, but it is clear to all those who consider what remedies the landlord could possibly have that nothing would be of any real use to him but a proviso for re-entry if, in defiance of his covenant, the lessee underlet or assigned without obtaining the consent of the lessor. The conclusion, then, to which I have come is that on the point of law which arises here the appeal must be allowed. I will add nothing to what the Master of the Rolls has said upon the question of fact which will have to be tried. I agree that the question to be tried is simply one of fact, whether or not, the fact of the breach by underletting being admitted, there has been a waiver of that breach.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add to the reasons which have been given by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., with which I entirely concur. We have in this case to construe this lease, and not any other lease. I am satisfied that the true meaning of the proviso for re-entry in this lease is that the word "performed" was intended to apply to positive covenants as well as to negative covenants. I also agree that it is extremely difficult to define what are negative covenants. No covenant has occurred to my mind which is so purely negative that it cannot be made to have a positive aspect as well as a negative. The covenants in this lease appear to me to have both a positive and an affirmative meaning. The agreement not to assign, &c., is practically an agreement to retain possession, and in that aspect is an affirmative covenant. Now, ought we not to hold that, in this case, upon a breach of a covenant of that description there is a forfeiture? These so-called negative covenants are most important provisions in all leases of house property. If the defendant's contention were right, these covenants would practically be nugatory, and would not afford the protection which the lessor clearly intended to have. The lessor desires to make it sure that his property will be used only in a certain way, and in a way not likely to give offence to occupiers of neighbouring houses belonging to him. It is said that there would be a remedy, and an adequate remedy, by injunction. But the remedy by injunction would not be available if a sublessee or assignee had entered into possession, and the lessor would only have an action for damages. In my opinion, it cannot be supposed that that was intended to be the agreement between the lessor and lessee. I think that there has been in this case a breach of covenant which would entitle the plaintiff to re-enter. The case, however, must go back to be investigated upon the important question of fact which the defendant is entitled to have tried. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, and the action sent back to be tried upon that question.

Appeal allowed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Revenue—Succession duty—Disentailing deed by tenant for life and tenant in tail—Joint power of appointment—Appointment to purchaser in fee—Alienation—Death of tenant for life—Liability to pay succession duty—Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15.

By a disentailing deed and settlement executed in 1868, the tenant for life and the tenant in tail in remainder of certain land conveyed the land to such uses as they should jointly appoint, and in default thereof to the use of the tenant for life, with remainder to the tenant in tail for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail.

In 1870 they sold and appointed the land to a purchaser in fee simple.

In 1874 the purchaser died, having devised the land to his wife; she died in 1888, having devised the land to her daughter, who duly paid succession duty.

In 1899 the tenant for life died.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held (affirming the judgment of Ridley, J.), that, upon the death of the tenant for life, succession duty became payable in respect of the succession of the tenant in tail; and that the duty must be calculated on the value of the interest of the alienee considered as an annuity.

Re Cooper and Allon to Harlech (35 L. T. Rep. 890; 4 Ch. Div. 802) overruled on this point.

Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society (28 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 8 Ez. 233) approved.

APPEAL of the defendants from the judgment of Ridley, J. upon an information by the Attorney-General.

In 1816 certain lands, including the land comprised in the indenture of the 1st Dec. 1870 herein-after referred to, stood limited to the use of the second Duke of Northumberland for life, with remainder to the use of his eldest son, afterwards the third duke, in tail male.

By virtue of common recoveries suffered in 1816 and of indentures of lease and release executed in Jan. 1817, these lands became limited to such uses as the second duke and his eldest son should jointly appoint.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 19th April 1817, the second duke and his eldest son exercised their joint power of appointment and limited the lands to uses, under which, by reason of the events which happened, in 1868 the lands stood limited to the use of the sixth duke for life, with remainder to his eldest son, afterwards and now the seventh duke, in tail male.

By an indenture dated the 19th Dec. 1868, duly enrolled, as a disentailing deed, the sixth duke and his eldest son disentailed the lands and conveyed them to such uses as they should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the uses then subsisting under or by reference to the settlement of 1817.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 21st Dec. 1868, the sixth duke and his eldest son, in exercise of the joint power of appointment given to them by the indenture of the 19th Dec. 1868, appointed the lands to such uses as they should by deed jointly appoint, and in default thereof to the use of the sixth duke for life, with remainder to the use of the seventh duke for life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of the seventh duke in tail male, with divers remainders over in strict settlement.

By an indenture dated the 1st Dec. 1870, which recited the joint power of appointment given by the settlement of the 21st Dec. 1868, the sixth and seventh dukes, in exercise of that power and in consideration of 250*l.*, irrevocably appointed a part of the lands to the use of Lord James Murray in fee simple.

On the 3rd June 1874 Lord James Murray died, having by his will devised all his real and personal estate to Lady Elizabeth Murray, his wife, who was his sole executrix.

On the 11th Oct. 1888 Lady Elizabeth Murray died possessed of this part of the lands, which she devised to her daughter, the defendant C. F. Murray, whom she appointed her sole executrix.

On the death of Lady Elizabeth Murray succession duty at 1½ per cent. was paid on the value of the interest of the defendant C. F. Murray (considered as an annuity for life) in the real estate so devised to her by Lady Elizabeth Murray, including the land assured by the indenture of the 1st Dec. 1870.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 1st July 1892, the sixth and seventh dukes appointed the family estates to such uses as they and the present Earl Percy, the eldest son of the seventh duke, should by deed jointly appoint.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 19th Dec. 1894, the sixth and seventh dukes and Earl Percy appointed the estates to such uses as the seventh duke and Earl Percy should by deed jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the seventh duke for life, with divers remainders over.

The sixth duke died on the 2nd Jan. 1899.

By an indenture dated the 13th May 1902, the defendant C. F. Murray sold and conveyed the particular land in question to the defendant C. W. Bell, who is now its owner. He was made a defendant for the purpose of enforcing the charge for succession duty.

By the information a declaration was asked for declaring that succession duty, under the Succession Duty Act 1853 and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888, became payable on the death of the sixth duke in respect of the land assured by the indenture of the 1st Dec. 1870, at the rate of 5 per cent., under sect. 10 of the Succession Duty Act, the present duke being a descendant of a brother of the father of the third duke, and 1½ per cent. under sect. 21 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888; and it was asked on behalf of the Crown that the duty should be calculated on the value of the interest considered as an annuity, under sect. 21 of the Succession Duty Act.

The Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51) provides:

Sect. 1. The term "succession" shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this Act.

Sect. 2. Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a "succession," and the term "successor" shall denote the person so entitled; and the term "predecessor" shall denote settlor, disponent, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived.

Sect. 15. Where, at the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, any reversionary property expectant on death shall be vested, by alienation, or other derivative title, in any person other than the person who shall have been originally entitled thereto under any such disposition or devolution as is mentioned in the second section of this Act, then the person in whom such property shall be so vested shall be chargeable with duty in respect thereof as a succession at the same time and at the same rate as the person so originally entitled would have been chargeable with if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created; and where, after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, any succession shall, before the successor shall have become entitled thereto or to the income thereof in possession, have become vested by alienation, or by any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, then the duty payable in respect thereof shall be paid at the same rate and time as the same would have been payable if no such alienation had been made or derivative title created; and where the title to any succession shall be accelerated by the surrender or extinction of any prior interests, then the duty thereon shall be payable at the same time and in the same manner as such duty would have been payable if no such acceleration had taken place.

Sect. 20. The duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, or any person in his right or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof; except that, if there shall be any prior charge, estate, or interest, not created by the successor himself, upon or in the succession, by reason whereof the successor shall not be presently entitled to the full enjoyment or value thereof, duty in respect of the increased value accruing upon the determination of such charge, estate, or interest shall, if not previously paid, compounded for, or commuted, be paid at the time of such determination; and, except that in case of an annuity, or property hereby made chargeable as an annuity, the duties shall be paid by such instalments as are hereinafter directed or referred to; provided that no duty shall be payable upon the determination of any lease purporting at the date thereof to be a lease at rack rent, in respect of the increase accruing to the successor upon such determination.

Sect. 42. The duty imposed by this Act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right, in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed; and such duty shall also be a first charge on the interest of the successor in the personal property in respect whereof the same shall be assessed, while the same shall remain in the ownership or control of the successor, or of any trustee for him, or of his guardian or committee, or tutor or curator, or of the husband of any wife who shall be the successor; and the said duty shall be a debt due to the Crown from the successor, having in the case of real property comprised in any succession priority over all charges and interests created by him, but such duty shall not charge or affect any other real property of the successor than the property comprised in such succession.

The information was heard before Ridley, J., who gave judgment in favour of the Crown (88 L. T. Rep. 600).

The defendants appealed.

Haldane, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell for the appellants.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that succession duty was payable in this case. The only succession duty which could be payable was that which was paid in 1883 by C. F. Murray. By sect. 1 of the Succession Duty Act 1853, "succession" denotes the property chargeable with succession duty; by sect. 2 any disposition of property by which any person becomes beneficially entitled to any property on the death of any other person, whether in possession or in futuro, is deemed to have conferred a succession; but, by sect. 20, the duty is not payable until the successor becomes entitled in possession. Therefore, until some person comes into possession, duty is not payable; and if no person comes into possession by virtue of the disposition creating the succession, no duty becomes payable. Duty can only be payable once in respect of the same succession; but the contention on behalf of the Crown is, in effect, that duty is payable twice in respect of one succession.

There has been but one possession by virtue of the disposition in this case, and therefore only one duty became payable. This case comes within sect. 15, which provides that when a succession, before the successor is entitled in possession, is vested by alienation or any title not conferring a new succession in any other person, duty is payable in the same way as if there was no alienation. That means that, if there has been an alienation conferring a new succession, no duty is payable in respect of the old succession, but only in respect of the new succession:

Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech, 35 L. T. Rep. 890; 4 Ch. Div. 802.

The decision in that case upon this point has never been overruled. In Wolverton v. Attorney-General (79 L. T. Rep. 58; (1898) A. C. 535), although Lord Herschell dissented from that decision, it was not necessary to decide the point. The provisions of sect. 15 were intended to extend the liability to pay succession duty to cases where it would not otherwise be payable, and therefore must be construed strictly. Those provisions are limited to cases where the alienation does not confer a new succession. The alienation under which C. F. Murray became entitled in possession did confer a new succession, and duty was paid on that succession. No one has come into possession under the old succession, and therefore no duty is payable in respect thereof. The purchaser died before the tenant for life, the sixth duke, and a new succession from him came into possession during the lifetime of the tenant for life; that removed the liability to pay the duty charged upon the old succession:

Attorney-General v. Cecil, 23 L. T. Rep. 20; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 263;

Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.);

Charlton v. Attorney-General, 40 L. T. Rep. 760; 4 App. Cas. 427.

The provisions of sect. 12 support the contention of the appellant:

Braybrooke v. Attorney-General, 4 L. T. Rep. 218; 9 H. L. Cas. 150.

The provisions of sects. 10, 15, and 21 show that, if any duty is payable in this case, it must be assessed on the value of the succession considered as an annuity for the life of the seventh duke, and not for the life of the alienee. The decision upon that question in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society (28 L. T. Rep. 769; L. Rep. 8 Ex. 233) was wrong, and has really been overruled by the case of Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.). The disentailing deed of 1868 destroyed the succession to the seventh duke created by the settlement of 1817; by virtue of the Fines and Recoveries Act 1833 a disentailing deed destroys the old estate and creates a new statutory estate; therefore duty is not payable in respect of the old estate tail, which is the succession in respect of which duty is now claimed:

Attorney-General v. Floyer, 7 L. T. Rep. 47; 9 H. L. C. 477;

Attorney-General v. Smythe, 7 L. T. Rep. 47; 9 H. L. C. 497;

Braybrooke v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.);

Attorney-General v. Cecil (ubi sup.);

Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.).

In Lilford v. Attorney-General (10 L. T. Rep. 652; L. Rep. 2 H. L. 63) the question was quite a different one, and that case is not an authority against the appellants.

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

[CT. OF APP.]

Sir B. B. Finlay (A.-G.), Sir E. H. Carson (S.-G.), and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown—The judgment of Ridley, J. was correct. The disentailing deed of 1868 did not destroy the old succession. The Fines and Recoveries Act 1833 has not the effect of creating a new title paramount; it only has the effect of making every estate tail an estate which can be converted into a fee simple by means of the Act. In substance the tenant in tail has the same interest after the disentailing deed as he had before:

Lilford v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.);

Attorney-General v. Cecil, 23 L. T. Rep. 20; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 263, 271.

It cannot be disputed that, if the tenant for life, the sixth duke, had died during the life of the purchaser, succession duty would have been payable by the purchaser as well as by C. F. Murray. In that case there would clearly have been two successions which came into possession, and succession duty would have been payable on each succession. It would be a curious result if duty were only payable once because the purchaser happened to die before the tenant for life. This case comes within both the second and third parts of sect. 15. Under sect. 2 succession duty becomes charged on the property as soon as the succession is created; but by sect. 20 it is not payable until the successor becomes entitled in possession. But for the provisions of sect. 15, duty would become payable immediately whenever there is a merger of the life estate and estate in remainder, and the provisions of that section are intended to prevent the duty becoming payable until the death of the tenant for life. A liability to pay duty once created cannot be destroyed by any subsequent alienation or disposition of the property:

Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.).

The words in sect. 15, "not creating a new succession," do not qualify the word "alienation":

Attorney-General v. Cecil, 23 L. T. Rep. 20; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 263, 269.

An alienation cannot confer a new succession. The words "any title not conferring a new succession" refer to such a transmission as that which arises on bankruptcy. The decision of Jessel, M.R. in Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech (ubi sup.) must now be taken to have been overruled by the judgments in Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.). The duty is to be assessed on the value of the succession considered as an annuity for the life of the person actually coming into possession; the alienee of a succession is the successor within the meaning of sect. 21 of the Act, which provides how the duty is to be assessed:

Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, 28 L. T. Rep. 769; L. Rep. 8 Ex. 233.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—The following judgments were read:—

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the Crown claims succession duty on the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland in respect of a piece of land, a portion of the Northumberland estates, settled in 1817. Ridley, J. has decided in favour of the Crown. The defendants appeal. The material facts are thus stated by Ridley, J. "By a settlement dated the 19th April 1817, large estates in Northumberland were limited to certain uses, and in 1867 (in the events which had happened) they stood limited to the sixth Duke of Northumberland for life, with remainder to his eldest son in tail male. In 1868 disentailing deeds were executed giving a joint power of appointment to the sixth duke and his eldest son, Earl Percy, now seventh duke; and on the 1st Dec. 1870, under that power of appointment, a parcel of land, which was part of the land so brought into settlement, was conveyed to Lord James Murray in fee. In 1874 Lord James Murray died, having devised his estates to his wife, and in 1888 the widow died, having devised them to her daughter, Mias Murray, one of the defendants. She paid succession duty under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 10, and 51 & 52 Vict. c. 8, s. 21, at the rate of 1½ per cent. on the value of the interest derived from her mother (considered as an annuity) in the real estate so devised to her, including this particular parcel of land. On the 2nd Jan. 1899 the sixth Duke of Northumberland died, and it was now contended that succession duty became payable on his death in respect of this piece of land, under the same statutes, at the rate of 6½ per cent. But it was not contended by the Attorney-General, having regard to the date of the sale to Lord James Murray, that sect. 18 of the Finance Act 1894 applied, and therefore it was asked that the percentage should be calculated on the value of the interest considered as an annuity, under sect. 21 of the Succession Duty Act 1853." The contention of the Crown, which Ridley, J. has accepted, is that the second half of sect. 15 applies to the case, and that duty is payable under that section by Mias Murray in respect of the succession of the seventh duke, which passed to her father by alienation under the indenture of the 1st Dec. 1870, and of which she was in possession at the date of the death of the sixth duke, and that the fact that she has paid succession duty in respect of her own succession upon a devise from her mother, who survived Lord James Murray and took the succession under a devise from him, is no answer to their claim. The appellants rely on Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech (35 L. T. Rep. 890; 4 Ch. Div. 802), decided by Sir George Jessel, which, if well decided, governs the present case. They also contend that the effect of the disentailing deed of 1868 and the settlement which followed upon it had the effect of destroying the succession of the seventh duke created under the settlement of 1817. Subject to this point the question on this appeal is whether Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech (ubi sup.) was well decided. Before going further it is necessary to refer to certain sections of the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51). Sect. 1 provides that "the term 'succession' shall denote any property chargeable with duty under this Act." [His Lordship then read sects. 2 and 15.] Sect. 20 provides that "the duty imposed by this Act shall be paid at the time when the successor or any person in his right, or on his behalf, shall become entitled in possession to his succession, or to the receipt of the income and profits thereof." Sect. 42 provides that "the duty imposed by this Act shall be a first charge on the interest of the successor, and of all persons claiming in his right, in all the real property in respect whereof such duty shall be assessed." Subject to the point as to the effect of the disentailing deed, both sides are agreed that the deed of the 1st Dec. 1870 was an alienation of the seventh duke's succession to Lord James Murray within sect. 15, and that had he survived the sixth duke, not having himself transferred it, he would have been liable to pay the duty on the death of the sixth duke. Had he devised it to his daughter and died, she would have had to pay duty in respect of her succession to her father. Does the fact that her father predeceased the sixth duke make any difference? I think the reasoning of Lord Herschell in Wolverton v. Attorney-General (79 L. T. Rep. 58; (1898) A. C. 535) is conclusive that it does not. By sect. 42 of the Act of 1853 the duty is a first charge on the interest of the successor. Therefore the succession came to Miss Murray subject to this charge. How has she got rid of it? "If the person has had a succession conferred upon him, he cannot by parting with it prevent it from being a succession; that is, prevent it from being property liable to the duty. It continues a succession, and will be, when the proper time comes, a succession enjoyed in possession, into whatever hands it has come": (per Cleasby, B., delivering the judgment of the court in Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society, 28 L. T. Rep. 739; L. Rep. 8 Ex. 233, 238). "I am unable to find in the Act," says Lord Herschell in Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.), "any warrant for the view that a succession once created can, by the act of the successor, cease to exist and another succession be substituted for it." But it is only by substituting the new succession of Miss Murray for the original succession of the seventh duke that the appellants can succeed. It is not necessary to examine once again the numerous cases decided upon sect. 15 before Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.), nor to repeat at length here the reasons given by Lord Herschell for his opinion, but they are to my mind conclusive, that Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided. Therefore on this, which was the point principally discussed in the argument, I am of opinion that the decision of Ridley, J. is right. Next, with regard to the effect of the disentailing deed. Here, too, I agree with Ridley, J. I think the point is concluded by authority. Braybrooke v. Attorney-General (4 L. T. Rep. 218; 9 H. L. C. 150) and the other cases cited in the same volume, and Lilford v. Attorney-General (10 L. T. Rep. 652; L. Rep. 2 H. L. 63), seem to me to establish that the effect of such a deed and the resettlement which followed was not such as to absolve the seventh duke from the obligation of paying succession duty. "I consider it my duty," says Lord Campbell, "to remind your Lordships of the extreme inconvenience which may arise from departing from the broad rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer, that a tenant in tail in remainder cannot vary the succession duty to which he will be liable by barring the entail and resettling the estate": (Braybrooke v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.)). In that case on disentailment by tenant in tail in remainder after a life estate in his father and a resettlement by father and son to such uses as they should appoint, an appointment was made by them to the father for life, remainder to the son for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and on the father's death it was held that the son took a succession under a disposition made by himself under sect. 12 of the Act. The disentailing deed did not annul the father's life estate. Therefore what the son had to dispose of was a succession liable to duty. The succession was not destroyed by the enlargement of the estate tail into a fee. Lord Campbell and probably Lord Kingsdown would have reached the same conclusion under sect. 15. In other words, the transaction involved an alienation of a succession. So here, if there had been no sale under the power to Lord James Murray, the seventh duke would have taken a succession under a disposition made by himself. The point, therefore, that the succession was wiped out by the disentailment is no longer open. I have dealt with the case without reference to the clause as to acceleration by the surrender or extinction of prior interests in sect. 15, which certainly does not assist the appellants. With regard to the point that the duty should be calculated by reference to the life of the original successor, the seventh duke, and not that of the ultimate alienee, Miss Murray, we cannot decide in favour of the appellants without overruling Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society (ubi sup.), decided more than thirty years ago and continually acted upon since. This I am not prepared to do even if I disagreed with it, which I do not. The appeal must be dismissed.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in this case, and only desire to add some observations on certain points. In the present case a tenant for life and remainderman conveyed land to such purposes as they should appoint, and then appointed the land to a person in fee. For the purposes we have to consider on this appeal, I think it is clear on the authorities that the case should be dealt with as if they had conveyed the land direct to that person in fee. That being so, the question arising on the present appeal may be stated as follows: A., tenant for life, and B., tenant in tail, alienate land to C. in fee by disentailing deed duly enrolled. C. then enters into possession, and dies in the lifetime of A., having devised the land to D., who thereupon enters into possession and pays succession duty as succeeding C.; then A. dies, and the question is whether succession duty is then payable by D. on A.'s death. And, if that question be answered in the affirmative, there is a subsidiary question as to how the duty is to be estimated. The appellants say that no succession duty is payable. They contend in the first place that, even if B. had been tenant in fee, no duty would have been payable. And, as a second point, they contend that, even if duty would have been payable had B. been tenant in fee, it is not payable because B. was tenant in tail. With regard to the first point the appellants rely on the fact that D. had to pay duty on C.'s death as his successor, and they urge that, having so succeeded to the land and paid duty, there was in fact no fresh succession by D. on A.'s death, and that D. could not be liable for more than one succession duty; and the appellants rely on the decision of Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, in the case of Re Cooper and Allen to Harlech (ubi sup.). But that decision and the grounds on which it was based have since been considered and, as it appears to me, disapproved of by the House of Lords in the case of Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.), and in particular were shown to be unsound by the reasoning of Lord Herschell in his speech in that case. That reasoning appears to me convincing, but, inasmuch as the appellants challenge it, I desire to add a few remarks, even at the risk of repeating part of what Lord Herschell in the last-mentioned case, and the Master of the Rolls in the present case, have said. In the first place, if I consider the position of C. immediately before he died, it appears to me clear that, in strict accordance with the express provision of the second part of sect. 15 of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, the succession of B. had become vested in C. by alienation, and that the duty in respect of that succession thereupon became payable at the same time and rate as the same would have been payable if no alienation had been made. And it is further clear from the section that the alienation of A.'s life estate to C., and the merger consequent thereon, did not operate to prevent the duty being payable. See also sect. 20 of the Act, which provides that the duty imposed by the Act shall be paid at the time when the successor, "or any person in his right," shall become entitled in possession to his succession. The words "in his right" would include purchasers and other derivative owners whose liability to the payment of duty is regulated by sect. 15. It also follows from the provisions of sect. 42 of the Act that, inasmuch as C. claimed "in right" of B., the duty became a first charge on the land. That being so, how has that charge been got rid of? As Lord Herschell pointed out, there is nothing whatever in the Act from which it can be inferred that by any disposition on C.'s part of the land he could free the land from the charge. He may, of course, dispose of the land so as to create further successions in respect of which further duty may become payable, but that will not in any way interfere with the duty already charged on the land, subject only to the provision made by sect. 12 of the Act in favour of C. if he himself became a successor by virtue of his own disposition. The arguments by which the appellants seek to escape from this result in the present case are founded on a misconception of the position of D. He has not been required to pay duty twice for one succession. There are two distinct successions and two distinct duties. One duty became payable by reason of C.'s death in A.'s lifetime, when D. succeeded C. by virtue of C.'s disposition, and in that case duty became payable by D. taking from C. as his predecessor. How the amount of that duty should have been estimated, and whether or not by reference to the suggestion that D. only there succeeded, as it were, during the rest of A.'s lifetime, we are not now concerned, though I am by no means suggesting that the Crown was wrong in estimating that duty in the way it did. The next succession occurred by reason not of C.'s death, but of A.'s, and then the duty already charged on the land in C.'s hands became payable under sect. 15 of the Act, and that duty is assessed without in any way being concerned with C. as a predecessor. In the same way two distinct successions would have occurred and two distinct duties would have been payable if C. had died after A. On A.'s death in that case C. would have paid duty as successor, and then, if C. had died, D. would have had to pay duty as successor of C. The true position of affairs is somewhat obscured by reason of the merger of A.'s estate and B.'s estate because they were both alienated to C. The true way to regard the case (especially having regard to the provisions as to merger in sect. 15) is to consider how matters would have stood if there had been no merger. C. obtained possession of the land, not because he had acquired B.'s estate, but because he had acquired A.'s estate. On C.'s death in A.'s lifetime, D., claiming through C. as owner of A.'s life estate, took possession and had to pay duty. B.'s estate in remainder expectant on A.'s death had nothing to do with that possession or duty. But, inasmuch as the remainder had been alienated to C., and D. had become owner of that remainder by reason of C.'s devise to him, when he succeeded on A.'s death he had to pay duty. For it is clear that, if the owner of a remainder charged with a duty devises it, the devisee only acquires that remainder subject to the duty. The general question may be further illustrated by considering how matters would have stood if A.'s estate and B.'s estate had been acquired by D. at different times. For example, if C. had only acquired A.'s estate and then had died in A.'s lifetime, having devised that estate to D., succession duty would have been payable by D. In that case B.'s estate in remainder would have clearly remained liable to its duty on A.'s death, and if B. had, after C.'s death and before A.'s death, alienated the remainder to D., duty would have been payable by D. as alienee on A.'s death. But it is unnecessary to multiply cases bearing on the point now before me. All I need say is that I am satisfied, with regard to the first point taken on behalf of the appellants, that if B.'s estate had been a remainder in fee, duty would have been payable on A.'s death. The next point then arises whether the duty ceased to be payable because B.'s estate was one in tail and was barred by the disentailing deed. The appellants contend that the effect of the deed was to destroy B.'s estate in tail, and to create an entirely new estate in C. which was not liable to the duty to which the estate tail was liable. This contention appears to me to be unsound, and is really disposed of by authority. Since the Fines and Recoveries Act, especially having regard to sect. 15 of that Act, which expressly provides that a tenant in tail shall have full power to dispose of the entailed land for an estate in fee simple absolute, it appears to me that it cannot properly be said that a tenant in tail alienating by disentailing deed under the Act thereby destroys for the purposes of succession duty the interest he possessed in the estate. What he did by disentailing, by exercise of the powers vested in him, was to render that estate perpetual, and the effect of such a deed may be quite different from that caused by a fine being levied or a common recovery suffered prior to this Act. It was on this ground that the case of Lilford v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.) was decided in the House of Lords. In that case Lord Chelmsford said, after referring to sect. 15 of the Fines and Recoveries Act: "The disentailing deed did not operate to destroy the interest of which he was the successor, but enabled him, by the exercise of the power which that interest gave him,

CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

[CT. OF APP.]

to render it perpetual." And Lord Cranworth dealt with the point as follows: "The power of barring the entail and so becoming competent to dispose of the property by will was incident to the estate tail which Lord Lilford took. And, therefore, when he executed the disentailing deed, he may be treated as having been competent to dispose by will of a continuing interest in the property. He may be treated for the purpose of succession duty as if he had been a devisee of the fee simple." Lord Colonsay also addressed the House to the same effect; see also the observations in Braybrooke v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.) of Lord Campbell and of Lord Kingsdown. The effect of the statement by Lord Campbell that "the tenant in tail in remainder when he bars the entail may, if he pleases, alienate, and no succession duty will be payable by him," has, I think, been misunderstood by the appellants' counsel. I think that all Lord Campbell meant was that, as between the tenant in tail and the alienee, the latter would have to pay duty. A tenant in tail may, of course, by disentailing deed, in the same way as he would have done if he had been a tenant in fee, resettle land so as to cause a new succession to arise under that settlement, and so that the persons claiming under that settlement could not be said to be alienees under an alienation, within the meaning of the word "alienation" as used in sect. 15 of the Succession Duty Act. But it appears to me clear that, if a tenant in tail by a disentailing deed simply assures the fee absolutely to a person, that person takes under an alienation within the meaning of the section. The only case which at first appeared to me to occasion difficulty was Attorney-General v. Cecil (ubi sup.), a case much relied on by the counsel for the appellants. But, having examined that case carefully, I come to the conclusion that it does not really assist the appellants in the present case, nor occasion any difficulty, at any rate on the ground on which it appears to me it was decided. I think that case was decided on the ground that there was a resettlement by Lord Cranborne (the tenant in tail) under which Lord Eustace Cecil took an interest, and such an interest that he could not be said to be entitled to it as an alienee under an alienation by Lord Cranborne, within the meaning of sect. 15 of the Succession Duty Act. This appears to me clear when the judgments of the barons who decided it are considered. Chief Baron Kelly said: "A new succession was conferred on Lord Eustace Cecil. The case is exactly the same as if on the purchase of a property the purchaser had created a term out of the estate so acquired by him. Being thus excluded from the operation of the 15th section, the case is left to the operation of the 2nd section; it is a succession to which Lord Cranborne is the predecessor, and the Crown is entitled to duty on that footing." And Martin, B. observed, referring to sect. 15: "But it appears to me that the clause relied on has no application to the present case; it refers, not to the creation of an interest by way of settlement, but to an alienation in the ordinary sense; as if, for instance, the late Lord Cranborne had sold the whole of his interest to some third person before it came into possession." And, to make his view even more clear, he added: "Whether, inasmuch as Lord Cranborne, if he had survived without making this appointment, must have paid duty on the whole property, a double duty is not payable, first on the whole interest out of which this term is carved, and then upon the charge itself, is a matter on which I give no opinion." Channell, B. said: "I think the Attorney-General is right in saying that a new succession has been created which prevents the case from falling within the second branch of the 15th section." And, lastly, Cleasby, B. ended his judgment as follows: "I think the Crown is entitled to judgment. First, I am not satisfied that this is a case where the succession of Lord Cranborne has become vested in any other person; and, secondly, if it has, it is by a title which creates a new succession." I think this view of the case was also that taken by the House of Lords in Wolverton v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.). It appears to me, therefore, that the Crown is right in contending that duty was payable in the present case. The only remaining point is as to the amount of duty, whether the amount is calculated upon the enjoyment of the property which the person actually taking is expected to have. I think it is. The precise point was decided in the case of Solicitor-General v. Law Reversionary Interest Society (ubi sup.), and that case was, in my opinion, rightly decided for the cogent reasons given by Cleasby, B. in delivering the judgment of the court, and those reasons I need not repeat. It follows that, in my judgment, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MATHEW, L.J.—I agree in the comments made by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J. upon the authorities cited in the argument. I propose to state briefly the grounds upon which I am satisfied that this appeal should be dismissed. Under the deed of 1817 and the Act of 1853 succession duty became payable upon the death of the sixth Duke of Northumberland in respect of the estates the subject of the deed. Under sect. 42 the duty was a first charge upon the property in respect of which it was assessed. Under the disentailing deed of 1868 the duty remained payable, and would have been due to the Crown upon the succession of the seventh Duke of Northumberland, if no change had been made meanwhile in the disposition of the property. After the deed of 1868, the sixth and seventh Dukes of Northumberland, as respectively tenant for life and tenant in fee of the estates, conveyed the lands in respect of which the duty has been assessed to Lord James Murray in fee. Under sect. 15 the duty then charged upon the lands became payable at the same time and at the same rate as if no such alienation had taken place—namely, upon the death of the sixth duke. Lord James Murray died in the lifetime of the sixth duke, and before the duty had become payable, and his estate passed to his daughter, who paid succession duty on the value of her interest. Upon the death of the sixth duke the succession duty charged upon the estate was claimed by the Crown. The payment was refused, and then proceedings were taken to make the defendants accountable. The grounds upon which it was contended that the defendants were not liable were submitted in an elaborate and lengthy argument, in which the learned counsel for the defendants struggled, as it appears to me, in vain to escape from the clear language of sect. 15. It was, as I understood, admitted that, if Lord James Murray had survived the sixth duke, the duty would have become payable. But it was said that the death in the lifetime of the tenant for life made all the difference. The result, it was contended, was this, that only one succession duty—namely, that paid by the daughter—was claimable. But the answer seemed clear that the duties were due because there had been two successions—(1) the duty payable upon the succession of the seventh duke; and (2) that payable upon the succession of the daughter. It was further contended for the appellants that the estates comprised in the disentailing deed were by that instrument relieved of the succession duty previously charged upon them. The deed, it was said, created a new estate and swept the charge away. No authority was referred to in support of this argument. The previous decisions pointed to a different conclusion. The old fine and recovery was alleged to have created a new estate, and the disentailing deed, it was said, must be taken to have had a similar operation. But the former method of disentailing was only a clumsy mode of expanding the estate tail into an estate in fee. It had in reality no greater effect than the later method of accomplishing the same result. It might as well be argued that the deed would have relieved the estates of any mortgages upon them. It seems to me that nothing has occurred to discharge the duty now claimed, and, therefore, that the Crown is entitled to our judgment. I agree that the amount of the duty must be calculated in the manner pointed out by the Master of the Rolls.

Re ALLEN AND DRISCOLL'S CONTRACT. (a)

Vendor and purchaser—Outgoings—Paving and making up roadway—Charge on frontager's premises—Date from which charge takes effect—"Completion of works"—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257.

The expenses incurred by a local authority under the Public Health Act 1875 in the execution of works required to be done under sect. 150 become "a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred" within the meaning of sect. 257 so soon as the works have been completed.

APPLICATION under the Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874 which raised a question on the construction of sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, the point being the exact date at which expenses incurred by a local authority under the Public Health Act 1875 for paving and other works first became "a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred."

By an order made in the action of Allen v. Driscoll, dated the 22nd July 1903, the defendants were ordered to pay to the plaintiffs, on or before the 29th Sept. 1903, the sum of 4440*l.*, in settlement of the purchase money and interest due in respect of eleven leasehold houses in Rusthall-avenue, Acton, Middlesex, the plaintiffs by their counsel undertaking to make a good title to the said leasehold houses, and to assign the same to the defendants, the defendants by their counsel undertaking to accept the leasehold houses so assigned in their present condition; and the plaintiffs were to receive the rents and pay the outgoings in respect thereof up to the 29th Sept. 1903.

On the 10th and 11th Feb. 1903 the Acton Urban District Council duly served upon the vendors notices under the Public Health Act 1875, s. 150, to pave and make up the roadway in front of these eleven houses.

The notices were not complied with, and thereupon the urban district council on the 13th July 1903 entered into an agreement with a contractor for the execution of the works specified in the notices in respect of the said eleven houses and the other houses in Rusthall-avenue for a sum of 2566*l.*

The work was only partly completed by the 29th Sept., and no apportionment of the expenses attributable to the eleven houses had been made at this date or subsequently.

The purchasers required that the costs of these works should be paid by the vendors before completion, and, as this demand was disputed by the vendors, the purchasers took out this summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act 1874, asking for a declaration that the vendors were liable to pay and indemnify the purchasers against the amount, when apportioned, of the expenses incurred by the local authority under the Public Health Act 1875 for paving and other works in respect of the eleven houses in Rusthall-avenue, and that they might be ordered to pay and indemnify the purchasers against the same accordingly.

By the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55):

Sect. 150. Where any street within any urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large) or the carriage-way, footway, or any other part of such street is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, and made good . . . such authority may, by notice addressed to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts thereof as may be required to be sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, or channelled . . . require them to sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel, or make good . . . within a time to be specified in such notice. . . . If such notice is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default according to the frontage of their respective premises and in such proportion as is settled by the surveyor of the urban authority. . . .

Sect. 257. Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act or by any agreement with the local authority, such expenses may be recovered . . . from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred. . . .

Re ALLEN AND DRISCOLL'S CONTRACT.

[CHAN. DIV.]

W. H. Cozens-Hardy for the purchasers.—By sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875, where any local authority have incurred expenses, those expenses shall be a charge on the property. The expenses become a charge the moment the local authority have incurred such expenses:

Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell, 35 L. T. Rep. 887; 15 Ch. Div. 378, 392;

West Ham Corporation v. Grant, 60 L. T. Rep. 17; 40 Ch. Div. 335.

The local authority had clearly become liable to pay expenses before the 29th Sept. 1903. Directly the contract was entered into they had undertaken a liability to the contractor. The date when the charge came into existence is an entirely different date to that when they may be recovered from the owner or occupier. The charge arose at the date of the contract, or immediately any money was paid under that contract. The purchaser is entitled to have the costs of these works paid by the vendors. He also referred to

Surtees v. Woodhouse, 88 L. T. Rep. 407; (1903) 1 K. B. 396.

Norton, K.C. and Ashton Cross for the vendors.—The case of Stock v. Meakin (ubi sup.) is actually in point. The expenses incurred only become a charge on the completion of the works. This also appears from the reasoning of North, J. in Re Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.). The works not having been completed on the 29th Sept., the charge had not attached, and is therefore payable by the purchasers. They also referred to Re Waterhouse's Contract, 44 Sol. J. 645;

Newcastle-upon-Tyne Corporation v. Houseman, 63 J. P. 85.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy in reply.—The section has to be construed, and none of the recent cases are in point. The inference to be drawn from the cases of Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell (ubi sup.) and West Ham Corporation v. Grant (ubi sup.) is that the charge comes into being as soon as the expenses are incurred, though the remedy for recovering the amount from the owner cannot be enforced till the completion of the works. The case of Surtees v. Woodhouse (ubi sup.) turned upon the meaning of "outgoings" in a lease.

BYRNE, J.—In this case a vendor and purchaser summons has been taken out for the determination of the question whether or not the expenses referred to in sect. 257 of the Public Health Act 1875 were a charge upon the premises prior to the completion of the works in respect of which notice under sect. 150 had been given. I think Mr. Cozens-Hardy has shown that the precise point has not, in the reports, been directly disposed of—that is, to say, no authority has in terms held that the period may not be an earlier date than the completion of the works. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] The crucial date is the date fixed for completion of this purchase, the 29th Sept.; and the question is whether these expenses were incurred within the meaning of the section before that date. In other words, what is the meaning of this sect. 257? The works were not then completed, although I am told that payments had been made on account under the contract. Now, in Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell (ubi sup.), Brett, L.J. refers to the clause in these terms: "The condition upon which the charge is made to arise is nothing but this, 'Where the local board have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner is made liable.' Directly, therefore, the local board have incurred such expenses, the section must be read as if immediately after that there came these words, 'such expenses shall be a charge on these premises'; therefore directly from the moment the expenses which are named in that section have been incurred, such expenses are a charge on the premises—that is, the charge is imposed then and there by the statute." Then, passing over a few words, he continues: "Therefore it seems to me that, upon the reading of that section, this is a charge the moment the expenses are incurred, and it is a charge which exists although other remedies exist at the same moment that that commences, or other remedies may by different processes be made to arise either as against the owner, who is, in the first place, the person liable, or as against other persons." That leaves the question still open whether the date of completion is the actual time when the charge first arises, or whether the expenses may be said to have been incurred within the meaning of the section before completion. In the case of West Ham Corporation v. Grant (ubi sup.), Kay, J. had to deal with another Act, and the question in the case was not the same as the one which arises here, but in dealing with sect. 257 he says: "I need not pause to say what 'expenses incurred' may possibly mean, or whether the term implies actual payment of the expenses or not, because, at the least, it means money which the authority may have paid or become liable to pay. I do not mean to give that as a definition, but it must mean that at the least." It is obvious the learned judge there determined no question whether the period when the expenses were considered to be incurred was the date of completion or some earlier date. Then there is the decision in the case before North, J., Re Bettesworth and Richer (ubi sup.). He says, after referring to the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board (42 L. T. Rep. 614; 4 Q. B. Div. 305), and what Cockburn, C.J. said there: "Therefore it comes to this, that the expenses are charged from the time of the completion of the work. That seems to me the construction of the section. And in that view I am fortified by the opinion of the judges who decided the case of Tottenham Local Board of Health v. Rowell (ubi sup.), when they had that case before them on the construction of a section in an earlier Act, which does not appear in this respect distinguishable from the Public Health Act 1895. It is quite true that the owner cannot be compelled to pay till the total costs have been made out and apportioned between the owners, and notice has been served, and he has had three months to dispute the apportionment, and at the end of three months has had written demand served upon him. The Act says payment may be recovered from the person who is owner at the time when the works were completed, and he is the person charged under the Act." Now, I come to the later cases in which the matter has been dealt with, but, again, the question not arising as it does here. In Scott v. Meakin (ubi sup.), a case between a vendor and purchaser, it was held that the amount of the apportioned expenses of private street works becomes, under the Private Street Works Act 1892, a charge on the premises in respect of which they are apportioned, as from the date of the completion of the works, and not merely as from the date of the final apportionment; and the headnote goes on: "If, therefore, the premises are sold by the owner free from incumbrances after the completion of the works, but before the date of the final apportionment, the vendor must indemnify the purchaser against the sum finally apportioned in respect of the premises." It is true that it was not necessary to decide, as against an earlier date, that the date for the completion of the work was the date from which the charge took effect, but the court expressed the opinion that that was the date. The learned judge in delivering judgment said: "The charge under the Public Health Act 1875, however, is a charge which can only arise on the failure of the owner of the land to comply with the notice of the urban authority and the execution by the urban authority of the works by reason of that default of the landowner, and is, moreover, a charge taking effect from the date of the completion of the works"; and then he says: "It was held in Re Bettsworth and Richer (ubi sup.) that the expenses became a charge upon the completion of the works." Speaking of the last-mentioned case, he says: "This decision turned entirely on the words of sects. 150 and 257, which plainly gave a charge so soon as the works had been completed and the expenses incurred by the local authority on the failure of the owner of the land to execute the works in compliance with a notice served in pursuance of the powers given by sect. 150." From Surtees v. Woodhouse (ubi sup.) I take one judgment in the Court of Appeal. I agree here, again, that the question was not the question that I have now to determine. Speaking of Stock v. Meakin (ubi sup.), Stirling, L.J. says: "The nature of the outgoing in question was considered by the Court of Appeal in the case of Stock v. Meakin (ubi sup.), and it was held that the amount of the expenses incurred under the Private Street Works Act 1892 becomes a charge on the premises on which they are apportioned as from the date of the completion of the works, and not from the date of the final apportionment. It was not expressly decided in that case whether or not the amount is 'charged on the owner in respect of the premises' as from the same date." In the result, it appears to me that the authorities have laid down that the construction I ought to put upon sect. 257 is, that the expenses incurred by the local authority, within the meaning of this section, become a charge upon the premises so soon as the works have been completed for which such expenses were incurred; or, in other words, that the charge here referred to first arises on completion of the works. I therefore make a declaration that the vendors are not liable to pay for these works.

Re GRIFFITH; JONES v. OWEN.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Costs — Administration — Priority — Administrator's costs — Res judicata.

Where in an administration action an order made on further consideration has directed the payment of the costs of all parties out of a fund which subsequently proves insufficient to pay the costs in full, the administrators are entitled to have the whole of their costs paid in priority to the other parties.

The order having been silent as to the priorities of the parties inter se must be assumed to have directed payment according to the strict rights of the parties.

Gaunt v. Taylor (1843, 2 Ha. 413) followed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

This was a summons asking that a fund in court in the action should be apportioned rateably between the parties in proportion to the respective amounts of their costs as taxed.

Catherine Harriet Griffith died intestate on the 21st Feb. 1899.

Administration was taken out by Jane Owen, Ann Pugh, and John Richard Griffith, three of the next of kin.

Great delay arose in dealing with the assets, but ultimately a sum of 1200*l.* was distributed by the administrators among eight persons believed to be the persons entitled.

Subsequently further delay took place, and this action was commenced by one of the next of kin seeking administration by the court, and in particular the getting in of a sum of 457*l.* 7*s.* owed to the estate by the solicitor to two of the administrators.

The usual order for administration was obtained, and proceedings were taken to recover the sum of 457*l.* 7*s.*, which resulted in the recovery of 150*l.*

On the 15th July 1903 an order was made on further consideration by which it was directed that "it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiff, of the defendant, and of the . . . parties attending of this action, including this application, and including in the costs of the defendants any charges and expenses properly incurred by them and not already taxed or allowed relating to the administration of the intestate's estate beyond their costs of this action. . . ."

It was further ordered that the defendants were to be at liberty to retain their costs, when taxed, out of the residue of the intestate's estate in their hands; and that certain funds in court were to be dealt with as directed in the payment schedule.

The payment schedule, after directing various payments, proceeded: "Pay costs to be taxed and certified under the order."

It now appeared that the fund in court, after payments had been made thereout as directed, was not sufficient to pay all the certified costs, and this summons was therefore taken out.

Cozens-Hardy, for the plaintiff, stated the facts, and continued:—It has proved impossible to carry out the order on further consideration, because the funds are not sufficient to pay all the taxed costs. I suggest that the true way to deal with the matter is to divide the funds among the persons who have incurred costs rateably in proportion to the respective amount of their costs as taxed. This was done in an exactly similar case in Swale v. Milner (1834, 6 Sim. 572), on the ground that the decree on further directions had, by ordering payment of the costs of the parties, settled their rights—namely, to be paid pari passu. So here the order on further consideration has made the whole matter res judicata, and it is now too late for the administrators to claim their right of priority. [FARWELL, J. referred to the case of Gaunt v. Taylor, 1843, 2 Ha. 413].

Re GRIFFITH; JONES v. OWEN.

Martelli for the defendant.—We are entitled to be paid our costs as administrators in priority to the other parties. Nothing was said as to priorities in the order, because it was then believed that there would be sufficient money to pay all the costs and leave a surplus. How, then, can it be said that the question of priorities is res judicata? The case of Gaunt v. Taylor (1843, 2 Ha. 413) went on this footing. Swale v. Milner (1834, 6 Sim. 572) was there cited, but not followed. He referred also to Blenkinsop v. Foster, 1838, 3 Y. & Coll. Ex. 205;

Williams on Executors, 9th edit., vol. 1, pp. 850,

Morgan and Wartsburg on Costs, 2nd edit., p. 201.

Cosens-Hardy in reply.—In Blenkinsop v. Foster (1838, 3 Y. & Coll. Ex. 205) special liberty to apply to the court, if the funds were insufficient to pay all the costs, was reserved in the original order. Here there is nothing of the sort. Apart from the authorities, I submit that in this case there are special grounds for not allowing the administrators to take their costs in priority to my client. [FARWELL, J.—I am precluded by the order on further consideration from considering that.] I rely, then, on Swale v. Milner (1834, 6 Sim. 572).

FARWELL, J.—This is an application relating to the payment of costs out of a fund in court. The order made on further consideration appears to have gone on the presumption that there was sufficient funds to pay all costs, and indeed the payment schedule, after directing the payment of "costs to be taxed and certified under this order," proceeds to order the payment of residue equally among the next of kin. Now, it is well settled that administrators always have priority for their costs over all other persons. The order, however, having been silent as to this, and having merely said that all the costs were to be paid, it is now found that there is not sufficient money in court to pay them all, and consequently this application has been made. The only difficulty is created by the conflicting decisions of two Vice-Chancellors. In my opinion, apart from the cases, the court cannot be taken to have intended, in making an order such as this, to deviate from the ordinary course. The priorities are not mentioned in the order, because it would have been foolish to insert any direction relating to them, if, as was then believed, the fund was adequate to pay all the costs in full. A direction to pay, such as occurs here, must presumably be a direction to pay in accordance with the usual priorities. The cases, however, which are three in number, cause a real difficulty. The first case is Blenkinsop v.

Foster (1838, 3 Y. & Coll. Ex. 205). In that case the priority of an executor was recognised in spite of a previous order for payment of costs of all parties, in which no mention was made of priorities. As, however, liberty to apply in case the fund proved insufficient had been reserved by the original order, I feel that the decision may possibly have turned on that, and that it may consequently not be applicable to the present case. This leaves two cases which are at variance with one another. Swale v. Milner (1834, 6 Sim. 572) is the first. This was a creditor's suit against the heir and administrator of the debtor. By the decree on further directions it was ordered "that the costs of all parties should be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid" out of a fund in court. The fund proved insufficient, and the defendants presented a petition by which they sought to have their costs in the first instance paid out of the fund. Shadwell, V.C. said in that case, at p. 573: "I cannot grant the prayer of the petition. The order on further direction directed the costs of all parties to be paid, and I cannot vary that order. All that I can do is to direct a reference to the master to divide the fund, amongst all the parties, in proportion to their costs." With all respect to the learned Vice-Chancellor, I venture to comment on this decision, and to point out that the order in that case did not direct payment of all costs pari passu, but was entirely silent on the point. It was for some person or the court to say in what priorities the costs should be paid when it was discovered that the fund was not sufficient to pay the costs of all in full. This was the conclusion come to by Wigram, V.C. in Gaunt v. Taylor (1843, 2 Ha. 413). In that case the order on further direction, after providing for taxation of the costs of the parties and the placing of a part of the fund in court to a special account, ordered that the residue of such fund was "to be applied in payment of the costs, and costs, charges, and expenses before ordered to be taxed." Wigram, V.C., in passing judgment, said, at p. 420: "I have felt much difficulty in disposing of the question of costs in this case. The order made on further directions, in Dec. 1840, directed the costs, charges, and expenses, ordered to be taxed, to be paid out of the residue of the fund in court, after carrying over part to the special account. In the case of Swale v. Milner (1834, 6 Sim. 572) the court considered itself to be bound by a similar order to apply the fund in payment of the costs rateably, when it proved to be insufficient to pay the whole of the costs in full, although the ordinary rule of the court gave to some of the parties a priority over the others in respect of costs. The order of payment which I directed in the case of Tipping v. Power (1842, 1 Ha. 412) was merely following the old rule of the court. And, if that is the order in which the parties are entitled to the payment of their costs, and yet the court is to be bound to apply the fund rateably, in consequence of the language of the prior direction, it follows that an effect is given to that direction which I cannot consider the court to have intended, for it involves a disposition of the fund (being deficient to pay all) which is not in accordance with the rights of the parties. Does the order which has been made force upon me the conclusion come to in Swale v. Milner (ubi sup.)? I cannot say that I think the language of the order so stringent as that case supposes. If a fund were ordered to be paid to creditors, and some were creditors by specialty, and others by simple contract, and the fund proved to be insufficient to pay them all, I cannot think the court would be bound to interpret an order, the language of which is plainly flexible, so as to contravene a well-established and undisputed rule of practice. I proceed upon the ground that the order merely amounts to a charge upon the fund in favour of the parties entitled according to their admitted rights." Then he concludes his judgment with the words: "I do not in this respect vary the order on further direction. I only give to it a specific interpretation consistent with the language in which it is expressed." I venture respectfully to agree with the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, and to adopt every word of it. As regards the other point raised by Mr. Cozens-Hardy, that in equity his clients should get their costs, I can only say the order made on further consideration has disposed of that, by directing a distribution according to legal rights. I therefore order that the administrators should be paid their costs in full out of the fund in court.

SAVAGE v. BENTLEY—Re SHILSON, COODE, AND CO.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Practice—Receiver—Writ of possession—Time—Order XLI., r. 5—Order XLVII., r. 2.

Where an order was made directing delivery of certain premises into the possession of a receiver appointed by the order, but no time within which delivery of possession was to be made was specified in the order, it was held that a writ of possession could not issue because Order XLI., r. 5, had not been complied with.

By writ dated the 18th March 1904 an action was commenced seeking the enforcement by foreclosure or sale of a mortgage of the 2nd Dec. 1903 and of a memorandum of charge dated the 4th Jan. 1904.

On the 29th March 1904 the plaintiff sought by motion to obtain the appointment of a receiver of the premises comprised in the mortgage and memorandum of charge.

By an order of that date Isaac Farlow was appointed a receiver to act at once, and it was further ordered that "the defendants . . . do deliver up possession of the said premises . . . respectively to the said Isaac Farlow as receiver."

Personal service of the order was effected on two of the defendants, Benjamin and Julia Bentley; but they refused to deliver possession of the mortgaged premises to the receiver, and on the 15th April 1904 an application was made to the court on behalf of the receiver asking that a writ of possession should be issued under Order XLVII., r. 2, to place the receiver in possession of the premises in question.

(a) Reported by H. C. GARRIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

An order was duly made to that effect, but the officials at the Central Office refused to issue the writ, because the order of the 29th March 1904 as drawn up and served on the defendants had not specified any time within which possession must be given. Under these circumstances an application was now made to the court ex parte.

By Order XLI., r. 5:

Every judgment or order made in any cause or matter requiring any person to do an act thereby ordered shall state the time, or the time after service of the judgment or order, within which the act is to be done. . . .

By Order XLVII., r. 2:

Where by any judgment or order any person therein named is directed to deliver up possession of any lands to some other person, the person prosecuting such judgment or order shall, without any order for that purpose, be entitled to sue out a writ of possession on filing an affidavit showing due service of such judgment or order and that the same has not been obeyed.

F. Whinney.—Order XLVII., r. 2, under which a writ of possession is obtainable, does not provide that a time must have been limited within which possession was to be given up. The requirements of the rule have been duly complied with, and there is no reason why a writ of possession should not issue. In Kerr on Receivers, 4th edit., p. 176, where the procedure is discussed, it does not appear that the author regarded this delimitation of time as necessary; nor does Cozens-Hardy, J. suggest it in Re Maudsley, Sons, and Field; Maudsley v. Maudsley, Sons, and Field (82 L. T. Rep. 378; (1900) 1 Ch. 602, at p. 611), where the question is considered in detail. In Wyman v. Knight (59 L. T. Rep. 164; 39 Ch. Div. 165), which was a case of an application for a writ of assistance under the same rule, it does not appear that anything of the sort was required. The difficulty really arises under Order XLI., r. 5, but I submit that it does not apply here, because the court has in effect taken the property in question into its possession by appointing a receiver. If I am wrong as to this, the only course apparently will be to obtain a "four day order" fixing the time.

FARWELL, J.—I cannot assist you in the face of Order XLI., r. 5, which is explicit.

Solicitor—Costs—Taxation—Commission—Collection of rents—Professional work—Professional charges—Items of professional charges in bill of costs.

The solicitors acting for the executors and trustees of the deceased owner of settled real estates charged with legacies and duties which his personally was insufficient to satisfy, having been accustomed to collect and receive the rents for him at an agreed charge until his death on the 7th April 1901, continued to collect and receive the rents for the executors and trustees without making any agreement as to their remuneration for so doing up to the 25th March 1902, when the succeeding tenant for life assumed the management of the estates, and in their bill of costs delivered to the executors and trustees inserted a charge of a lump sum, being a commission of 5 per cent. on the amount of the rents collected, as their remuneration for the work; but did not set out the items of that work as in the case of charges for strictly professional duties. The succeeding tenant for life obtained an order for taxation of the solicitors' bill of costs, and the taxing master on taxation allowed the charge of a lump sum by way of commission for collecting the rents, and overruled the objections of the tenant for life to that allowance.

On a summons by the tenant for life for a review of the taxation:

Held, that, if the charge was a charge for professional work, the solicitors ought to have delivered a bill of items in respect of it, and that, in the absence of any agreement to that effect, the taxing master was not entitled to allow the solicitors a lump sum by way of commission for it, while, on the other hand, if collecting rents was not professional work, the charge for it ought not to have been inserted in the solicitors' bill of costs; and that the proper order was to direct the master to treat the charge as struck out of the bill of costs.

SUMMONS to review taxation.

John Tremayne, of St. Austell, Cornwall, died on the 7th April 1901 possessed of large estates in the counties of Cornwall and Devon, of part of which he was tenant for life, and the remainder he owned in fee.

Under his will his real estates were vested in executors and trustees, and stood charged, in aid of his personalty, with legacies and duties which his personal estate was insufficient to satisfy.

Upon his death his son John C. L. Tremayne, of Heligan, Cornwall, became tenant for life of the real estates with remainder to his issue; and it was to his interest that the amount of costs payable out of the estate should be reduced on taxation.

During the life of John Tremayne, Messrs. Shilson, Coode, and Co., solicitors and bankers, of St. Austell, Cornwall, collected the rents and tithe of his Cornwall estates, for which they received the sum of 80*l.* a year and a further small payment of about 15*l.*

After his decease Messrs. Shilson, Coode, and Co., acting as solicitors for his executors and trustees, collected the rents and tithe of his Cornwall estates, and received or collected the rents of his other estates, including the rents due and unpaid at his death, and also the proportionate part of the rents from the 7th April 1901 to the 25th March 1902, after issuing printed circulars to the tenants as to the amounts due from them.

No agreement was made with respect to their remuneration for this work, and accordingly they inserted in their bill of costs for professional work, which they delivered to the trustees and executors of John Tremayne, deceased, the following item:

Commission on the rents and tithes collected for the estate involving numerous attendances and holding of rent audits, and the writing of numerous letters, the necessity of bringing pressure to bear on the tenants who were in arrear, and the fact that many of them paid by instalments involved trouble far beyond what was covered by the old stewardship salary, which was not charged beyond the 7th April 1901. Five per cent. on 4317*l.*, the amount collected, 215*l.* 17*s.*

On the 11th July 1903 John C. L. Tremayne, as a third party interested, took out an originating summons for the taxation under the Solicitors Act 1843 of Messrs. Shilson, Coode, and Co.'s bill of costs, and on the 20th July an order was made that it be referred to the taxing master to tax and settle the bill of fees, charges, and disbursements, amounting to 548*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, 98*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*, and 36*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* respectively, delivered by the respondents. And it was ordered that if such bill when taxed be less by a sixth part than the said bill as delivered the said master do tax the applicant his costs of this reference and application, and if such bill when taxed shall not be less by a sixth part than the said bill as delivered the said master do tax the respondents' costs of the reference and application. And the said master do certify the amount due from the said executors and trustees and the applicant to the respondents, or from them to the executors and trustees and the applicant as the case may be.

The taxing master, on taxation of the bill, allowed the item set out above.

On the 7th Jan. 1904 John C. L. Tremayne, the applicant, delivered objections to the taxation as follows:

1. It is submitted that the master has no jurisdiction to allow this item or any part of it. As it stands the respondents have specifically refused particulars showing the work included in this charge. Such refusal was made by letter, dated the 1st Jan. 1904, as follows:—"34, Bedford-row, London, W.C., 1st Jan. 1904.—Dear Sirs.—Re Shilson, Coode, and Co.—We have considered your request that our clients shall furnish details of the work covered by the charge of 215*l.* 17*s.* by way of commission or percentage on rents and tithes collected and got in by them, and we decline to comply with it.—Yours truly, COODE, KINGDON, and COTTON.—Messrs. Church, Bendell, and Co." But for this refusal it might have been within the master's discretion (without prejudice to the discretion as to costs of taxation contained in the order) to allow the solicitors to bring in particulars of any work in the usual and proper form of solicitors' charges by items going to make up any professional work included in this charge of 215*l.* 17*s.*

2. It is not even alleged that any form of agreement under the terms of the Solicitors Acts exists justifying any such charge by a lump sum or percentage or otherwise than in accordance with the usual solicitors' charges.

3. Even if such agreement did exist as between the solicitors and the trustees, Mr. J. C. L. Tremayne was certainly no party to such agreement, and it would not be binding upon him for the purpose of this taxation.

4. The solicitors in this case carry on business at St. Austell as bankers as well as solicitors, and the majority of the sums paid to them would be doubtless paid to them in their capacity of bankers rather than as solicitors, and this is an additional reason why in their case such a charge by way of percentage should not be allowed, even were it within the jurisdiction of the master to allow it.

5. Even if the master had any jurisdiction or discretion enabling him to allow this charge calculated upon a percentage otherwise than under a formal agreement under the Solicitors Acts binding upon Mr. J. C. L. Tremayne it is submitted that on the exercise of his discretion the item or any part of it should only be allowed and dealt with (without prejudice as in clause 1 hereof) and upon full details and information showing by items the actual professional work which it is suggested is covered by this item, and at present not only have no such details been submitted to him on which he can properly form a judgment for the exercise of his discretion (if any) to allow the item as a charge properly representing actual work professionally done, but such details have in fact, as shown above, been specifically refused.

6. There has been no previous course of dealing as between the solicitors and Mr. J. C. L. Tremayne as the party chargeable which can justify any charge being allowed as against him in this form, this being the first charge of this nature made against him since the death of the testator and previous owner, and even if a course of dealing had existed between the solicitors and the previous owner it is submitted that such course of dealing would not even be binding on him without his consent in the absence of any agreement under the Solicitors Acts, and much less upon the new owner of the property.

7. If the master had discretion to apply the practice as to the method of charging between the solicitors and the testator as against Mr. J. C. L. Tremayne (which it is submitted he has not) he could not properly exercise that discretion to allow the increased sum, the testator having been in the habit of paying a sum of 80*l.* per annum only, and the item being calculated at the increased sum of 143*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per annum.

8. On all the above grounds it is submitted that it is impossible for the master to allow this item, and the most it would have been within his discretion to do towards his allowing it (and this only without prejudice to the direction in the order as to costs of taxation) was to allow the solicitors (if they so desired) to bring in full detailed particulars by items in the usual form of a solicitor's bill for any professional work which may be covered by this item, but as they do not desire but in fact refuse to do so, the whole item must be disallowed.

To these objections the taxing master answered on the 19th Jan. 1904 to the effect that he saw no reason whatever for not allowing the commission; that the bills were fair, reasonable, and proper to be allowed, and that he therefore in the exercise of his discretion allowed the commission; and that particulars and details of the work done were, in his opinion, unnecessary, as the commission allowed by him was for the collection of such rents and not for legal work, and there was no solicitor's professional work covered or included in the item of commission.

Further objections to the taxation and answers thereto passed between John C. L. Tremayne and the taxing master dealing with details not material for the purpose of this report.

This was a summons taken out by John C. L. Tremayne on the 4th March 1904 for a review of the taxation.

The question for decision was whether on an application under the Solicitors Act 1843, for taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs by a party chargeable who stands in the position of a client, a solicitor can insist, as against his client, on charging by percentage for collection of rents as part of his professional bill.

Eve, K.C. and Ashworth James for the applicant.—Under the Apportionment Act the applicant is the person entitled to collect the rents from the 25th March 1901, not the respondents as solicitors to the executors of the preceding owner of the estates. The taxing master has not power to allow solicitors a lump sum by way of commission for collecting rents in the absence of any agreement to that effect. There is no prevailing practice of paying solicitors by commission as in the case of surveyors:

Attorney-General v. Drapers' Company, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 69.

This allowance of commission for collecting rents is assessment rather than taxation, and here it was the duty of the taxing master to tax, not to assess:

Re Johnston; Mills v. Johnston, 89 L. T. Rep. 497; (1904) 1 Ch. 132.

The solicitors are entitled to professional charges, but not to commission for collecting rents.

Vernon Smith, K.C. and J. G. Wood for the respondent solicitors.—The taxing master when taxing a bill of costs has a discretion to allow a commission for collecting rents. The case of the Attorney-General v. Drapers' Company (ubi sup.) is something like the present case. In the case of Re Weall; Andrews v. Weall (61 L. T. Rep. 238; 42 Ch. Div. 674) the tenant for life declined to pay the charges of the trustees' solicitors for collecting rents on the ground that some were chargeable against corpus and not income, and others had been unnecessarily incurred. Here the trustees could not possibly be expected to collect the rents of the numerous small tenants of this large estate. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—The taxing master cannot tax items which the solicitors are not entitled to insert in their bill of costs.] It is a question of amount over which the taxing master has complete discretion. [SWINFEN EADY, J.—Is it a taxable charge?] It is a charge for work sanctioned by the general practice of the Profession if not strictly professional work:

Re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603;

Ex parte Strawbridge; Re Hickman, 48 L. T. Rep. 913, and on appeal 49 Ib. 638; 25 Ch. Div. 266.

As to the question whether it was professional work, the decision of the taxing master covers that point.

Eve, K.C. in reply.—Issuing printed circulars to the tenants showing the amount of rent due and then collecting the rent is not professional work, and a charge for such work ought not to be included in a bill of costs. Assuming it to be professional work, there is no authority for allowing a lump sum by way of commission for it.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—This is an application to vary the taxing master's certificate made under an order of the 20th July 1903. By the terms of that order it is referred to the taxing master to tax and settle three bills that are named in the order. One is a bill for 548*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, 98*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.*, and 30*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* It was an order made upon a special application by originating summons. The bill of costs included one item of 215*l.* 17*s.* for collecting rents, and it was arrived at by calculating 5 per cent. on 4317*l.*, being the amount collected. No agreement to pay the solicitors by a commission is proved or indeed set up or alleged. During the lifetime of their former client, John Tremayne, the solicitors were paid for collecting the rents by a salary of 80*l.* a year, together with a commission on certain other sums that came to about 15*l.* a year. They allege that after Mr. John Tremayne's death on the 7th April 1901 that arrangement was no longer applicable, and in respect of this amount—4317*l.*—they claim to be allowed a lump sum of 215*l.* 17*s.* Part of that was for collecting rents that accrued during the life of the testator, John Tremayne, including 182*l.* the apportioned part of the rents from the 25th March 1901 to the 7th April 1901 which they collected after his death on behalf of the executors and trustees of his will. Other part was for collecting the rents of the settled estate between the 7th April 1901, the day of John Tremayne's death, and the 25th March 1902. The master has proceeded upon the footing that the 182*l.* was properly collected by the solicitors on behalf of the executors and trustees, as they had a right so to receive them. That ground was not persisted in before me, having regard to the terms of the Apportionment Act, but it was said that the real truth was that they collected them by arrangement with the succeeding owner of the estate, and certain letters have been referred to this morning, which are not yet in evidence, which seem to show that that was the arrangement. But I do not attach too much importance to that, because the other side, the applicant on the summons, has not had a sufficient opportunity of explaining those letters. The master has further proceeded upon this footing, that in the exercise of his discretion and in the absence of any agreement he is entitled to allow the solicitors a lump sum by way of commission to remunerate them for their trouble in collecting the rents. This application is by the succeeding tenant for life, who, not being satisfied with the taxing master's decision on that point, seeks to review the taxation. I am of opinion that the solicitors in this case are in a dilemma. If this sum of 215*l.* 17*s.* is a charge for professional work done by them as solicitors, they ought to deliver a bill of items in respect of it, and the master has no discretion to allow them a lump sum for work of that character in the absence of any agreement between the solicitor and client. I think that the reasoning of Farwell, J. in the case of Re Johnston; Mills v. Johnston (ubi sup.) supports this view. On the other hand, if the work was not professional work, then the commission ought not to have been included in the bill of costs. Now, I am of opinion that the proper order to make upon this application is to vary the certificate by directing the master to treat that sum as struck out of the bill of costs as having been improperly included in it. The effect of that will be to leave the matter at large between the parties. The solicitors will still be entitled to their proper remuneration for work done; they will not be barred in respect of that claim, but, on the other hand, they will not be entitled necessarily to receive this particular sum by way of remuneration for their work. It may be that some application may hereafter be made for them to deliver a bill of items in respect of it, or it may be that if the work is treated as non-professional work—that is to say, not taxable work, but work done by solicitors not in their professional capacity, but nevertheless for which they are entitled to receive a fair remuneration—it may be agreed between the executors and the solicitors what is a fair charge for it, and, if the tenant for life or other cestui que trust is dissatisfied with the conclusion at which the solicitors and the executors arrive, it may be it will be open to him to impeach the arrangement so come to, although of course it will be at his own risk if he takes any proceedings with that view; but on the present application the item must, I think, be struck out of the solicitors' bill. That will affect the balance found due to the solicitors, and it may affect the result of the taxation as to whether a sixth is taken off or not. My view is that for the purpose of arriving at that sixth the item should be treated as if it were struck out of the bill—that is, as if the bill had originally been brought in at a reduced amount—and the one-sixth must be calculated on that footing. I am of opinion that I am judicially bound to come to the conclusion that this certificate should be varied; but I am by no means satisfied that the sum claimed by the solicitors is not a fair and proper remuneration for work done. I have not sufficient materials before me nor is it incumbent upon me to determine that; but, having regard to the materials that were before the master, I strongly incline to the view that the amount that he allowed them was only a fair remuneration for the work done. The master, however, was not entitled to arrive at it in the way he did; nor am I entitled, on the materials before me, to come to any such conclusion; but I am not satisfied that the applicants will ultimately derive any benefit from this application to vary. The order will be that the matter be referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly, and I think the applicants must have the costs of the application. They have succeeded in varying the certificate, and I think they are entitled to the costs of the application.

WARRBURG AND CO. v. MCKERROW AND CO. (a)
Arbitration—Costs—Discretion of arbitrator—Award fees—Costs of reference—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 4, 14, 15 (2).

Costs left to the discretion of the arbitrator, but not dealt with by him, only follow the event when the matter is referred by the court under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, and not when the action is stayed and arbitration is directed by the court under the submission of the parties, for to such a reference sect. 15 (2) does not apply.

SUMMONS in the Commercial List taken out by the plaintiffs to stay the action and for directions that the costs of the action and of two references thereunder be paid by defendants.

The plaintiffs' claim was for damages for breach of contract, dated the 18th April 1903, for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiffs of 10,000 Singapore green snail shells.

By the terms of the contract the shells were

To be of fair merchantable quality, or if inferior a fair allowance to be made. The same to be settled by the selling brokers, such arbitration to be demanded within twenty-eight days, and held within six weeks after the arrival of the vessel.

The contract provided that Any dispute arising out of this contract except with regard to quality to be settled by arbitration in London

(a) Reported by W. TREVOR TUSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.] CENTRAL LONDON RAIL. CO. v. HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH COUNCIL. [K.B. Div.]

in the usual manner, according to the rules of the General Produce Brokers' Association of London.

The General Produce Brokers' Association of London Rules for Arrival Contract, the 1st Jan. 1897, were printed on the back of the contract, No. 7 being as follows :

In the event of any dispute whatever arising out of this contract between the parties hereto, or their personal representatives, or in any way whatever relating to it or to its construction or fulfilment, every such dispute shall be referred to arbitration in accordance with rule 7 set out below. This submission to arbitration shall be irrevocable, and it and the award to be made in pursuance thereof shall be enforceable under the provisions of the Arbitration Act 1889.

Rule 7 (e). The fees or (sic) arbitration or appeal and award shall be paid by the losing party unless otherwise awarded.

The plaintiffs sold at a profit direct to buyers at Hamburg.

The buyers considered the goods were inferior, and first asked for an allowance, but then claimed to reject on the ground that the goods were not Singapore shells.

The defendants immediately obtained from the selling broker an award directing an allowance of 32l. 7s. to the plaintiffs for inferior quality.

The plaintiffs, wishing to set that award aside and reject the goods, brought the action claiming damages.

The defendants, without abandoning the award, applied for a stay under sect. 4 of the Arbitration Act, and obtained the following order :

It is ordered that all further proceedings in this action be stayed pending the decision, by the tribunal agreed upon in the contract, of the sole question whether the shells delivered were in fact Singapore snail shells as described in the contract. Costs of this action to be reserved. Costs of the reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrators. Liberty to apply. Fit for counsel.—Nov. 13, 1903.

The umpire at the arbitration gave the following award :

I award that buyers are entitled to reject the shells, as they do not correspond with the description named in the contract—viz., Singapore green snail shells. I further award that the fees for the award—viz., 6l. 6s.—be paid by the sellers. Dec. 30, 1903.

The plaintiffs coming before the court on the question whether they were entitled to damages in reference to the resale, the following order was made :

It is ordered that, the parties admitting that there is no question in dispute other than the question whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages, and, if any damages are recoverable, what is the amount of such damages, it be referred to the tribunal agreed in the contract to determine that question, and that in the meantime all further proceedings in this action are stayed; and that the costs of this application be reserved. Fit for counsel.—Jan. 18, 1904.

The umpire gave the following award :

Sellers to pay the cost of invoice plus interest at rate of 5 per cent. per annum, freight (if paid by buyers) and 5s. per cwt., damages to the buyers, who are to hand over documents to the sellers, to enable them to take possession of the shells. I further award that the fees for the award—viz., 10l. 10s. for arbitrators and umpire—be paid by the sellers. March 12, 1904.

A. H. Chaytor for the plaintiffs.—The umpire has decided as to fees—that is, as to the costs of the award—but has made no order as to the costs of the reference. The Arbitration Act 1889, s. 15, sub-s. 2, applies and makes the award of the arbitration equivalent to a verdict of the jury; the costs therefore follow the event. The words in sect. 15 are general :

Carr Brothers v. Dougherty, 67 L. J. 371, Q. B.

As regards the costs of the action, the plaintiffs are entitled to them, since it was necessary for them to bring the action. The plaintiffs have obtained in the arbitration all that they wanted, and now seek to dispose of the action by a stay.

Atkin for the defendants.—It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to bring the action and those costs have been thrown away, and the plaintiffs are not entitled to them. As to the costs of the reference, they were left to the arbitrator's discretion.

WALTON, J.—The matter must be referred back to the umpire to deal with the costs of the reference, the plaintiffs to have the costs of the action; no order as to the costs of the application of the 18th Jan. 1904. Costs left to the discretion of the arbitrator, but not dealt with by him, only follow the event when the matter is referred by the court under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, and not when the action is stayed and arbitration is directed by the court under the submission of the parties, for to such a reference sect. 15 (2) does not apply.

CENTRAL LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY v.
HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH COUNCIL. (a)

Metropolis—Smoke nuisance—Notice to abate—Notice to prevent recurrence—Prohibition order—Specifying works—Evidence—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 4, 5, 130, sched. 3.

Before a notice is served under sect. 4 (2) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 requiring the person served to do what is necessary for preventing a recurrence of the nuisance, it is not necessary that a notice requiring such person to abate the nuisance under sect. 4 (1) shall have been served previously or included in such notice. Therefore, a notice having been given under sect. 4 (2), a court of summary jurisdiction can make an order under sect. 5 prohibiting a recurrence of the nuisance and specifying works to be executed, where the only notice served has been under sect. 4 (2), if such court is satisfied that the nuisance, although abated, is likely to recur.

On the hearing of informations and complaints under sect. 5 (1) (b), the respondents proved the nuisances alleged, but offered no evidence as to how the black smoke which caused the nuisances had been caused or as to what works were necessary to abate or prevent such nuisances.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.] CENTRAL LONDON RAIL. CO. v. HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH COUNCIL. [K.B. Div.]

The appellants' witnesses stated that the black smoke might have been caused by two furnace doors being open at the same time.

The magistrate determined that the respondents were entitled to a prohibition order, and thereupon the appellants required that the order should specify the works they were to execute under sect. 5 (5), but insisted that, the case being closed, the magistrate was precluded from hearing further evidence as to the works necessary. The magistrate therefore added to his prohibition order a direction to the appellants to fit up apparatus to prevent the furnace doors being opened simultaneously.

Held, that the order was valid.

CASE stated on six informations and complaints preferred by the respondents against the appellants.

Upon the hearing of the informations and complaints, the following facts were either proved in evidence or admitted.

The appellants are the occupiers of an electricity generating station, which provides power for the running of the trains of the appellants, at Wood-lane, Shepherd's Bush, in the borough of Hammersmith.

The respondents are the council and sanitary authority of that borough.

By the Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76):

Sect. 4, (1). On receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act the sanitary authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the occupier or owner of the premises on which the nuisance arises requiring him to abate the same within the time specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose, and, if the sanitary authority think it desirable (but not otherwise), specifying any works to be executed. (2) The sanitary authority may also by the same or another notice served on such occupier, owner, or person require him to do what is necessary for preventing the recurrence of the nuisance, and, if they think it desirable, specify any works to be executed for that purpose and may serve that notice, notwithstanding that the nuisance may for a time have been abated, if the sanitary authority consider that it is likely to recur on the same premises.

Sect. 5 (1). If . . . (b) The nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice, is in the opinion of the sanitary authority likely to recur on the same premises, the sanitary authority shall make a complaint and the petty sessional court hearing the complaint may make on such person a summary order (in this Act referred to as a nuisance order). (2) A nuisance order may be an abatement order, a prohibition order, or a closing order, or a combination of such orders. . . . (5) An abatement order or a prohibition order shall, if the person on whom the order is made so requires or the court considers it desirable, specify the works to be executed by such person for the purpose of abating or preventing the recurrence of the nuisance.

By sect. 130 the forms in the 3rd schedule to this Act or forms to the like effect varied as circumstances may require may, unless other forms are prescribed under the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, be used and shall be sufficient for all purposes. In the 3rd schedule are form A, notice requiring abatement of nuisance; form B, summons; Form C, nuisance order.

On the 5th Feb. 1903 S. H. Brown, the sanitary inspector of the respondents, in pursuance of instructions from the respondents, served upon the appellants at their office, No. 125, High Holborn, W.C., notice in a printed form such as is prescribed in the 3rd schedule—namely, form A—but filled up and varied in manuscript with partial alterations as follows:

Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76). —Borough of Hammersmith (Public Health Department), Town Hall, Broadway, Hammersmith, W.—To the Central London Railway Company Limited, of 125, High Holborn, London, W.C., by Mr. Richard Oliver Graham, their secretary. — Take notice that under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 the council for the metropolitan borough of Hammersmith, the sanitary authority for the said borough, being satisfied that at the generating station, Wood-lane, Shepherd's Bush, in the said borough, of which you are the occupiers, there existed recently, to wit, on or about the 22nd day of January 1903, the following nuisance—namely, a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house), known as No. 1 shaft, sending forth black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance—and that, although the said nuisance has since the last-mentioned day been abated, the same is likely to recur at the said premises, do hereby require you to do such things as may be necessary for preventing the recurrence of the said nuisance. If you make default in complying with the requisitions of this notice a summons will be issued requiring your attendance before a petty sessional court to answer a complaint which shall be made for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of the nuisance, and for recovering the costs and penalties that may be incurred thereby.—Dated this 5th Feb. 1903.—S. HUGGINS BROWN, Sanitary Inspector.

On the 8th April 1903 S. H. Brown laid six several informations at the West London Police-court, and obtained six summonses against the appellants in the following form:

West London Police-court. — In the Metropolitan Police District.—To the Central London Railway Company, of No. 125, High Holborn, London, W.C.—Information has been laid this day by Samuel Huggins Brown, sanitary inspector on behalf of the metropolitan borough of Hammersmith, for that on the . . . day of 1903, at the generating station, Wood-lane, Shepherd's Bush, in the borough of Hammersmith, within the district aforesaid, of which you are the occupier, there existed recently the following nuisance—namely, a chimney (not being of a private dwelling-house), known as No. 1 shaft, sending forth black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance—and, although the said nuisance has since the last-mentioned day been abated or discontinued, that the same or a like nuisance is likely to recur at the said premises. You are therefore hereby summoned to appear before the court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the West London Police-court, on Wednesday, 22nd April 1903, at the hour of two in the afternoon, to answer to the said information.—Given under my hand and seal this 8th April 1903.—(Signed) R. O. B. LANE, one of the magistrates of the police-courts of the metropolis.

The dates on which the nuisances were alleged to have existed in the summonses were the 27th Jan., the 20th Feb., the 24th Feb., the 4th March, the 11th March, and the 25th March 1903.

The informations were by consent heard together at the West London Police-court on the 22nd April 1903.

For the appellants it was argued that the notice of the 5th Feb. was defective and invalid as not being in compliance with the provisions of the

K.B. Div.] CENTRAL LONDON RAIL. CO. v. HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH COUNCIL. [K.B. Div.]

Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76) in that under sect. 4 (1) and sect. 5 (1) (b) the respondents should have served upon the appellants a notice requiring them to abate the nuisance within a time specified therein, and that the notice of the 5th Feb. did not require the appellants to abate the nuisance within a specified time or at all, and that under sect. 4 (2) the notice of the 5th Feb. should have been either incorporated with or supplemental to a notice to abate the nuisance, and that under sect. 5 (1) (b) no complaint or summary order could be made against the appellants unless and until the nuisance had been abated by them after and in consequence of a notice to abate the nuisance.

For the respondents it was argued that the notice of the 5th Feb. followed the second part of form A in the 3rd schedule to the Public Health (London) Act 1891; that such second part of form A was intended to apply to intermittent nuisances, such as the issuing of black smoke; that the notice of the 5th Feb. was a notice to abate under sect. 4 (1) and sect. 5 (1) (b), and that the word "abated" in sect. 5 (1) (b) had reference to a discontinuance of the nuisance however caused, and whether a notice to abate the same had been served or not.

It was further contended by the respondents that the first part of form A was quite inapplicable to the present case as it contemplated an existing nuisance requiring to be abated at the time of serving notice in the form of the first part of form A, and, further, that by reason of sect. 130 of the Act the second part of form A was properly used as a notice under sect. 4 (1) and sect. 5 (1) (b) in reference to such matters as intermittent black smoke nuisances under sect. 24 of the statute.

The only witnesses called on behalf of the respondents were S. H. Brown, the sanitary inspector, who stated that he had observed black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance issuing from No. 1 shaft on the dates in question, and Edward Harrison, a coal officer of the London County Council, who said he had watched with S. H. Brown for black smoke on the 22nd Jan. 1903, and no evidence was given or tendered on behalf of the respondents as to how the black smoke had been caused, nor specifying any works to be executed by the appellants for the purpose of abating or preventing the issue of black smoke.

Evidence was called on behalf of the appellants, by their engineers, that for the purpose of generating electricity to work their railway many hundreds of tons of coal per week were burnt, and that, in consequence of the complaints of the respondents with regard to smoke, they had at great expense equipped and fitted the generating station with furnaces fired by hand and had replaced automatic mechanical stokers by hand firing and had converted their boilers in that behalf, and that the appellants burned nothing but the best quality of Welsh smokeless coal. There was no suggestion that the appellants' installation machinery and equipment were not in all respects the best possible. The appellants' witnesses, who denied the sending forth of black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance, admitted that nothing had been done by them in reference to the machinery or appliances connected with or used for the generation of electricity to remedy the nuisance or prevent its recurrence since the service of the notice of the 5th Feb. 1903, and the emission of black smoke might have been caused by two furnace doors being open at a time.

After hearing the arguments, and the witnesses called on behalf of the respondents and the appellants, the magistrate overruled the objections of the appellants to the notice of the 5th Feb. He found that on the several dates in the summonses the chimney sent forth black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance, and he held and determined that the respondents were entitled to a prohibition order under sect. 5 (1) and (2) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. Thereupon counsel for the appellants required under sect. 5 (5) of the Act that the prohibition order should specify the works to be executed by the appellants. No suggestion was made by either party as to the works necessary, and the counsel for the appellants insisted that, the case being closed, the magistrate was precluded in law from hearing further evidence as to the works necessary, but the magistrate adjourned the case to consider them, and on the 30th April 1903 made the following order:

To the Central London Railway Company, whose registered offices are at 125, High Holborn, in the administrative county of London, the owners and occupiers of certain premises, to wit, the electrical generating station situate at Wood-lane, in the metropolitan borough of Hammersmith, in the said county of London and within the metropolitan police district.—Metropolitan Police District and Administrative County of London, to wit.—Whereas the Central London Railway Company, being the owners and occupiers of the said electrical generating station within the meaning of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, have this day appeared before me, John Rose, Esq., one of the magistrates of the police-courts of the metropolis, sitting at the West London Police-court within the metropolitan police district, to answer the matter of a complaint made by Samuel Huggins Brown, sanitary inspector for and on behalf of the council of the metropolitan borough of Hammersmith aforesaid, that on the 25th March 1903 at the said generating station there existed the following nuisance—namely, a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house), known as No. 1 shaft, sending forth black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance—and that, although such nuisance had since the last-mentioned day been abated or discontinued, the same or the like nuisance was likely to recur at the same premises, now on proof here had before me that recently before the time of making the said complaint, to wit, on the said 25th March 1903, the nuisance so complained of did exist on the said premises, but that the same has since been abated, and that the same was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of the said Central London Railway Company, yet, notwithstanding such abatement, I, being satisfied that it is likely that the same or a like nuisance will recur at the said premises, do therefore prohibit the said Central London Railway Company from allowing a recurrence of the said or a like nuisance, and for that purpose I direct the said Central London Railway Company to fit up at the doors of the furnaces communicating with the said chimney apparatus to prevent the doors being opened or kept open simultaneously, for example, a horizontal bar on a centre pivot between the doors and movable vertically in front of them so that the door of one furnace must be barred and the door of another released by the act of depressing either end of the bar, or other apparatus having a like effect, and to adopt all other means which shall be neceseasy to prevent the emission of black smoke from the said shaft in such quantities as to be a nuisance, and I do further order the said Central London Railway Company to pay to the said council the sum of 10*l.* 10*s.* for costs in this behalf.—Given under my hand and seal at the police-court aforesaid this 30th April 1903.—(Signed) JOHN ROSE, one of the magistrates of the police-courts of the metropolis at the West London Police-court.

The questions submitted for the opinion of the court are: (1) whether the notice dated the 5th Feb. 1903 was and is defective and invalid for the reasons above stated or any of them; and (2) whether, even if the notice was valid in law, the order made by the magistrate was and is bad because he specified therein the works to be executed by the appellants without having heard evidence with respect to such works.

Roskill, K.C. and Theobald Mathew for the appellants.

Macmoran, K.C., Bodkin, and Bruce Williamson for the respondents.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think it is better that I should confine myself to dealing with the points that have been raised and nothing more. In this case, the appellants being summoned, they first took the technical point that, because the black smoke had been abated before the first summons for abatement or for a prohibition order, therefore there had been no abatement in pursuance of duress, or threat, or notice in the natural course of events, and that therefore the magistrate had no jurisdiction. Mr. Roskill put his point most plainly, and, with every desire to appreciate the point, I venture to say that my mind is so constituted that I am absolutely unable to appreciate it. There were five other summonses—that is to say, there was proof of black smoke coming out on five days, two of them in the month of February and three in the following month of March. Therefore, even assuming, although I do not wish at all to be thought to say so, that there had been anything in the argument with regard to the first occasion on the 27th Jan., that could have no application with regard to the others. The only point that can be suggested is that because the notice was a prohibition notice instead of an abatement notice that made a difference to the magistrate's jurisdiction. I hope it is not necessary to give effect to such an argument unless there is some substantial justice behind it, because, as I say, I am not able to appreciate it, and I think such a technicality ought not to be given effect to unless there is a substantial wrong being done. Then came the second point, and I agree that the magistrate has rather complicated the matter by putting in those directions which I have called the directions of a mechanical engineer—for instance, a horizontal bar on a centre pivot put between the doors; and the order, in my opinion, would have been better if it had been in one of two forms, either "I tell you not to be negligent in the matter of stoking the furnaces, and not to do it again," or "I direct you to put up apparatus which will prevent your being able to stoke two furnaces at the same time." But, when we look at what happened, I think it would be wrong and it would be contrary to the first principles of justice to allow such an objection to prevail. In the first place the appellants denied black smoke coming out at all, and, when their witnesses were in the box, what they said was that the emission of black smoke might have been caused by two furnace doors being open at a time. We have had this kind of case in the courts before, and we know perfectly well that one reason why the Legislature has been so stringent about black smoke is this: It has been established over and over again that it is careless stoking that brings about black smoke. Therefore one is not surprised to find that, this incident having occurred in this case, the appellants' witnesses said that it must have been owing to two doors being open at one time. But it had occurred on a series of days, and on no less than six days, spread over a period of three months. The local authority, the Borough Council of Hammersmith, being satisfied with their case proving black smoke, they were not then and there prepared with evidence how it would best be remedied; and the prohibition order being about to be made, counsel for the railway company was within his right in saying: "Will you be good enough to tell us the works which we are to do." The magistrate, being in a difficulty, appears to have asked the appellants whether they had any evidence there, but no suggestion was made, and then, when the question arose of an adjournment for evidence, the railway company's ingenious counsel says: "You must not hear evidence at all now; the appellants have closed their case"—which they had closed long before the request had come—"and therefore you are not entitled to hear any evidence." All I can say is this (I do not wish to say anything which goes beyond this case), that this is not the way in which a point should be raised, if objection is afterwards going to be taken to the magistrate having said in his order something which he ought not to have said. I think the law has not made the change which Mr. Roskill suggests. I think that the case of Millard v. Wastall (77 L. T. Rep. 692; 18 Cox C. C. 695; (1898) 1 K. B. 342) was rightly decided under the Public Health Act 1875, which case applies to the Public Health (London) Act 1891 and says that in a smoke nuisance case it is not necessary to specify the works, but merely to say: "Do not be careless again." Now, it is said because the statute of 1891 has said an abatement order or a prohibition order shall, if the person on whom the order is made so requires, specify the work required to be done, that the law is altered as compared with sects. 94 and 96 of the Public Health Act 1875, which requires the notices to specify the work to be done. In my opinion, as far as this case is concerned, the law is not altered substantially. I quite agree that the compulsory obligation to specify is taken away, and now the abatement order shall, if the person on whom the order is made requires or the court orders it to be done, specify the works. That, in my opinion, does not make an abatement order or a prohibition order bad because it is said no works are required, but merely says: "Do not stoke carelessly again." But that does not quite cover the whole ground, because it may be said this order is bad because it does specify works, and it specifies works without sufficient evidence. I think, if that were really what the order means, it might be open to some objection. I think the fair reading of this order is: "I direct the railway company to fit the doors of the furnaces with apparatus to prevent the doors being open or kept open simultaneously." The point of that was this: The respondents, the railway company, had themselves said that the only cause they could suggest was that two doors were open at the same time, and that stoking was going on at two furnaces at the same time. It is true the other part goes on "for example," but I do not think that means that that is the only way in which it can be done; and, looking at the words of the statute specifying the works to be executed and bearing in mind that magistrates are not experts, I see no reason for holding that it would not be properly complied with by saying: "You are to put works which will prevent two furnace doors being open at the same time," and, as the order goes on: "And to adopt all other means to prevent the emission of black smoke." I cannot help thinking this has been largely brought about by the respondents, the railway company, the then persons summoned, taking an objection which, in the ordinary conduct of litigation, I think they ought not to have taken. If they were going to raise the point that the magistrate could not make a proper order at their request without evidence, they ought not, in the same breath, to have objected, they having taken the objection that he was not entitled to hear evidence. I think the tactics were ingenious, and I think they were obviously for the purpose of preventing any order being made. I therefore think this appeal fails, both on the technical point and on the merits.

THOMPSON (app.) v. MASON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree that the first point taken is captious. With regard to the second point, I think myself that a magistrate in a case of this kind, if he had to specify works, certainly ought, under all ordinary circumstances, to hear evidence, because it is absurd to suppose that he is an expert in matters of this kind, or that he is competent to specify works without knowing something about it from evidence. But in this case he is not, I think, so entirely without evidence as to prevent his exercising jurisdiction. The defendants, who were summoned, were asked to explain how this took place, and they said that it was owing to two furnace doors being open at the same time, which is really the substance of this order. The words "for example" might have been entirely omitted, and I certainly think that this objection ought not to be listened to in the mouth of a person who has prevented the evidence being given. I cannot conceive, to my mind, anything more unsatisfactory or more captious and unreasonable than this, when the question first arises as to whether there should be evidence about works or not, at the first moment when it can arise and when it is proposed that the evidence shall be gone into, instead of saying it is necessary to have an adjournment, or anything of that kind, objecting when the respondent's case was closed that it is too late to hear evidence, and then coming to try and upset the order because that evidence had not been given. I do not think such tactics ought to succeed. I should like to say, with regard to the case of Millard v. Wastall (77 L. T. Rep. 692; 18 Cox C. C. 695; (1898) 1 Q. B. 342), that I think it rightly decided. Under sect. 94 of the Public Health Act, the tribunal, the magistrate, the court of summary jurisdiction is empowered to do two things; one is to make an order to abate a nuisance, and another is an order to execute works. If he has power to do two things, he certainly has power to do one. If the second part were wholly unnecessary under the circumstances, I think he would be quite justified in leaving that part out of the order which he otherwise would have power to make if necessary.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of my Lord and my brother Wills, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

THOMPSON (app.) v. MASON (resp.). (a)

Gaming—Shop—Automatic machine—Game of chance or skill—Gaming House Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 38).

T., being the occupier of a tobaccoist's shop, kept there an automatic machine by which a person, having put a penny in the slot, pulls a knob, and on releasing such knob the penny flies up into one of five compartments. If the penny goes into either of two compartments it is returned to the person using the machine; if it goes into either of the two others it is retained in the machine; but if it goes into the fifth he receives a ticket by which he can have a 3d. cigar or its value at his option.

It was established by evidence that dexterity could be acquired to some extent by the operator by practice, but the magistrates came to the conclusion that it was not proved that the chances were alike favourable to the appellant and the operator.

Held, that T. was properly convicted of permitting the shop to be used for the purpose of unlawful gaming, contrary to the Gaming House Act 1854.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant, for that he, being the occupier of a shop, unlawfully, knowingly, and wilfully permitted it to be opened, kept, and used by other persons for the purpose of unlawful gaming being carried on there, contrary to the Gaming House Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 38).

At the date of the alleged offence, and for some time prior thereto, the appellant carried on the business of a tobaccoist in the shop in question, and kept therein for the use of persons who frequented the shop an automatic machine worked on the penny in the slot system, and supplied by the Northern Automatic Company Limited.

The working of the machine was thus described:

Having placed a penny in the slot, the operator pulls down a spring by means of a knob and then suddenly releases the knob, whereupon the spring flies up, and the penny is projected into one of five compartments. If in the course of its flight the penny finds its way into either of two compartments it is returned to the operator; if it goes into either of two other compartments it is retained in the machine and is lost to the operator. If the penny falls into the fifth (the centre) compartment, the operator receives a ticket entitling him to receive from the appellant a 3d. cigar or its value at his option.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the user of the machine constituted a game of skill as distinguished from a game of chance, or, at all events, was a game partly of skill, inasmuch as dexterity in the play could be acquired by practice. In support of that contention it was established by evidence before the magistrate that such dexterity could in fact be acquired to some extent by continuous practice with the machine or with machines of similar construction.

The magistrate, however, on this contention was of opinion that the judgment in Fielding v. Turner (89 L. T. Rep. 273; (1903) 1 K. B. 867) was conclusive against the contention, seeing that the construction of the machine described in that case and its operation (so far as the mode of play was concerned) were in all respects similar to the construction and operation of the machine in use on the appellant's premises.

It was further contended for the appellant that even if the game played were one of chance and not of skill, yet the gaming was not unlawful gaming, inasmuch as it was not proved that the chances were not alike favourable to the operator and to the appellant, and that the decision in Fielding v. Turner (sup.) was adverse to the appellant in that case, because the chances of the game played were obviously not alike favourable to him and to the operator, there being four compartments (out of seven) in which the coin was lost to the operator.

No evidence was offered by the appellant to prove that the construction and physical condition of the machine in his shop and the force and adjustment of the spring were such that it was an absolutely even chance that the penny would fall into any one of the five compartments, and the magistrate was of opinion that (except on such an assumption of fact) it could not be established that the chances were alike favourable to the appellant and to the operator.

If that assumption were made, the magistrate was of opinion, as a matter of arithmetic (though no evidence was tendered on the point), that the expectation of the value emerging from the machine on the insertion of a penny into the slot would on the average be

$$\frac{3d. + (4d. \times 2) + (1d. \times 2)}{6} = 1d.$$

That is to say, the result in the long run, after a vast series of experiments by the same customer, would be that neither party would win or lose.

There was, however, no proof that this assumption was in fact well founded.

It was urged on behalf of the respondent that, if indeed it were well founded (seeing that practice with the same machine would admittedly give an operator a greater chance of success than he would enjoy on the first occasion), it would follow that the user of the machine by different customers, many of whom frequently operated and so acquired dexterity, must in the long run result in loss to the appellant, and it was contended that if this were so the machine could be retained by him only for the purpose of inducing custom by encouraging a spirit of gambling.

It was further contended for the respondent that playing at any game of mere chance may amount to unlawful gaming, and reference was made to the observation of Hawkins, J. in Jenks v. Turpin (50 L. T. Rep. 808; 13 Q. B. Div., p. 513), that regard must be had to the illegality of the gaming, not merely to the illegality of the game, and it was also contended that the observations of the court in Fielding v. Turner (sup.) had reference to the facts of that particular case, and were not intended to lay down as a principle of law that there could be no unlawful gaming where the chances of the game as played were alike favourable to all the players, and that if it were otherwise a shopkeeper might habitually play pitch and toss with his customers.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that using the machine in the manner described did not amount to unlawful gaming.

The magistrate came to the conclusion that it was not proved that the chances were alike favourable to the appellant and to the operator, and that in any event the user of the machine in the circumstances mentioned constituted the offence alleged in the information, and he accordingly convicted the appellant.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Llewelyn Davies for the appellant.—The conviction here was wrong, for this is not a game of mere chance within Jenks v. Turpin (50 L. T. Rep. 808; 13 Q. B. Div. 505). The present case is very different to Fielding v. Turner (89 L. T. Rep. 273; (1903) 1 K. B. 867), for there the chances were four to three against the player, but here they are three to two in his favour.

M. Lush, K.C. and E. O. Simpson for the respondent.—The findings of the magistrate show that this was a game of pure chance. Mere dexterity acquired after practice cannot make a game of chance a game of skill. Fielding v. Turner really disposes of this case.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If the magistrate here had not found the facts in this case, but had merely held that the facts in Fielding v. Turner were binding on him, I think we should have had to send the case back to him; but he has not done that. In this case the elements of chance were of the same kind as in Fielding v. Turner; but it was contended that there was more evidence in this case that it was a game of skill and not of chance, and that it was not proved that the chances were not alike favourable to the operator and the appellant. I think here that the magistrate meant to find that this was a game of chance, and that the element of skill involved in it was of the same kind as in Fielding v. Turner. I do not think that there is anything in this case to turn the game of chance into a game of skill, and it cannot be said that if a person goes on long enough and so becomes more successful after a time that that prevents the game being a game of chance.

BEARDSLEY (app.) v. GIDDINGS (resp.). (a)

Food and drugs—Institution of prosecution—Laying of information—Service of summons—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 19 (1).

A prosecution is instituted within sect. 19 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 at the date on which the information is laid and the summons is issued, and not on the date when such summons is served.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent for that on the 23rd June 1903 he unlawfully sold milk not of the nature, substance, and quality as that demanded by the purchaser, but deficient in milk fat to the extent of 15 per cent.

The information was laid by the appellant on the 18th July 1903, and the summons was issued and signed by a justice of the peace and left by the appellant with the police for service on the same day.

The summons, however, was not served upon the respondent until the 22nd July 1903.

The summons was returnable at the petty sessions held on the 18th Aug. 1903.

Sect. 19, sub-sect. 1, of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51) is as follows:

(1) When any article of food or drug has been purchased from any person for test purposes any prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts in respect thereof, notwithstanding anything contained in sect. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase.

At the hearing of the summons the solicitor for the respondent took the preliminary objection that the proceedings had not been instituted within the time specified under the above section, the alleged offence having been committed on the 23rd June 1903 and the summons not served until the 22nd July following, the summons therefore being served after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the date of the alleged offence. The respondent's solicitor contended that the laying of the information and issue of a summons was not the institution of the prosecution and that the prosecution was not instituted until the service of the summons, and that as the summons had not been served until after the expiration of twenty-eight days it must be dismissed.

The appellant contended that the date when he laid the information was the date from which the commencement of the prosecution was to be calculated, and as the information was laid and summons issued within the twenty-eight days the prosecution was instituted within the time limit.

The justices were of opinion that the time from which the institution of the prosecution was to be calculated was the date of the service of the summons, and not the date of the laying of the information, and they therefore held that the proceedings had not been instituted within the twenty-eight days from the date of the alleged offence.

They therefore held the objection made by the respondent's solicitor to be good and dismissed the summons.

J. R. Randolph for the appellant.—The institution of the prosecution under sect. 19 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 means the institution of the prosecution by the prosecutor, and that is done when he lays the information. When he has done that, he can do no more, as the summons is issued by the justices, and when so issued is served by the police. In Thorpe v. Priestnall (1897) 1 Q. B. 159 it was held that the prosecution was instituted when the information was laid. The justices appear to have considered Cowling v. Taylor's Drug Company (66 J. P. 11), where it was decided that a prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts is not instituted until the summons has been served. That case certainly does not bind this court, and I submit that it was wrongly decided.

J. A. Simon for the respondent.—Thorpe v. Priestnall (sup.) was decided under the Sunday Observance Act 1676, but, in order to find out whether the institution of proceedings refers to the laying of the information or the service of the summons, it is necessary to look at the whole scheme of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts. The reason for giving a limited time under these statutes, which deal with articles of a more or less perishable nature, is to let the person who sold the food or drug know within a reasonable time that proceedings are going to be taken against him. Under sect. 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1879 it was provided that the service of the summons, if the thing was perishable, was to be within twenty-eight days. That section is now repealed, and, if the contention of the appellant here is right, the seller, for whose protection these sections were inserted, is really in a worse position, and this could not have been intended. In Ditcher v. Denison (11 Moo. P. C. 324) the service of a citation was held to be the institution of the proceedings. He also referred to Yates v. The Queen 52 L. T. Rep. 305; 14 Q. B. Div. 648.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Mr. Simon has brought before us a very able argument for limiting the construction of this sect. 19 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899, but I do not think that we can accept it. He said that sect. 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1879, which said that the summons must be served within a reasonable time, and, in the case of a perishable article, within twenty-eight days, being now repealed and replaced by sect. 19, showed what was the intention of the Legislature in passing the later section, and that as the earlier one referred to the service of the summons, the later one must also mean the service of the summons when referring to the institution of the prosecution. That is a dangerous argument, for by repealing the earlier section and enacting a different section the Legislature may have intended otherwise, and meant to alter the time from which the period ran. Now, sect. 19 says that a prosecution shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase. Laying of an information and issuing a summons are well known as the commencement of a prosecution, and it would require strong indications of intention or strong necessity to make us hold that a commencement of a prosecution does not mean laying the information and issuing the summons. It would be unsafe to hold that, because proceedings under these Acts ought to be taken promptly, the institution of the prosecution is the service of the summons. If the service of the summons was the test, we should have found other words, in fact express words, to that effect.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me impossible to see from sect. 19 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 whether it was meant to continue the old policy or whether that old policy should be got rid of. We must therefore look at the actual words of the statute and put a natural construction on them. The commencement of a prosecution means the beginning of the proceedings by which a person is brought before the court, and there is nothing in the words of sect. 19 to show a contrary intention. In Ditcher v. Denison (sup.) the Acts imported nothing of themselves, and had to be followed up by a citation. It may be said to be the nearest case to support the respondent's contention, but it lays down nothing of any general application, but depended upon the proceedings in that particular court, which was an ecclesiastical one.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. I see nothing to make one feel justified in saying that the words "any prosecution . . . shall not be instituted" does not refer to the laying of the information. Laying the information is the institution of a prosecution and not the service of a summons. The words in the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 are very nearly the same, and under the words of that Act, which are in no sense essentially different, but substantially the same, the laying of the information within the specified time has been held to be sufficient.

BEARDSLEY (app.) v. PIKE AND SONS (resps.). (a) Weights and measures—Sale of coal—"Cause the weight of the vehicle . . . to be previously ascertained"—Weights and Measures Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 22.

By sect. 22 (1) of the Weights and Measures Act 1889: "Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is conveyed for delivery on sale in a vehicle in bulk, the seller of the coal shall . . . cause the weight of the vehicle to be previously ascertained."

Held, that the true test was whether the vehicle had been weighed so recently and under such circumstances that its correct weight had been ascertained.

Semhle, that weighing at reasonable intervals was not the proper test, but that the waggon need not be weighed before every delivery.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the appellant against the respondents for failing to insert or cause to be inserted on a ticket a statement of the correct weight of the vehicle, contrary to sect. 22 of the Weights and Measures Act 1889.

At the hearing of the summons there was evidence on behalf of the appellant of the delivery of a load of coal to one Kate Hurdle on the 23rd Oct. 1903, and that on the ticket delivered with the coal in accordance with the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act 1889 the tare weight of the waggon was entered at 10½cwt.

The appellant and his assistant also gave evidence to the effect that after the delivery of the coal on the 23rd Oct. 1903 the waggon was weighed by the appellant, and the actual weight was then 11cwt. Neither of the respondents was present at the weighing, and there was some contradictory evidence between the appellant and the keeper of the weighbridge, who was present at the weighing, as to the exact weight of the vehicle, but, having regard to the decision in Knowles and Sons Limited v. Sinclair (77 L. T. Rep. 624; (1898) 1 Q. B. 170) that the correct weight to be inserted in the ticket was the weight as ascertained previous to the delivery, the justices did not consider it necessary to find as a fact what the correct weight of the vehicle was after the coal had been delivered.

The respondents contended through their solicitor that, the waggon having been weighed as recently as the 20th Oct. 1903 and found then to scale only 10½cwt., there was no obligation on the part of the respondents to have the same weighed previous to the delivery of the coal on the following 23rd Oct.

Evidence was given on behalf of the respondents of the weighing of the waggon on the 20th Oct. 1903 and that the weight was then only 10½cwt., and that the same vehicle had been weighed on many previous occasions and never weighed more than 10½cwt.

The appellant, however, contended that the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act 1889 had not been complied with, that the weight of the waggon was liable to vary from day to day, and that it was obligatory upon the seller of the coal to cause the weight of the vehicle, as well as of the coal it contained, to be ascertained by a weighing machine previous to each delivery of coal.

The justices found as facts: (1) that the vehicle was not weighed on the 23rd Oct. 1903 previous to the delivery of coal on that day; (2) that the vehicle was last weighed on the 20th Oct. 1903, on the occasion of a previous delivery of coal by the respondents, and then weighed only 10½cwt.

They held, however, that the respondents were not obliged to take the weight of the waggon previous to each delivery of coal, but only at reasonable intervals, and that they had complied with the requirements of the Act, and they therefore dismissed the summons.

By the Weights and Measures Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 22:

(1) Where any quantity of coal exceeding two hundredweight is conveyed for delivery on sale in a vehicle in bulk, the seller of the coal shall, unless the vehicle is provided by the purchaser, cause the weight of the vehicle, as well as of the coal contained therein, to be previously ascertained by a weighing instrument stamped by the inspector of weights and measures and being on or near to the place from which the coal is brought, and shall from time to time cause the tare weight of the vehicle to be marked therein in such manner as the local authority approve. (2) In any such case the seller of the coal shall insert or cause to be inserted in the ticket required by this Act to be given by him a statement of the correct weight of the vehicle, or of the vehicle and of the animal drawing it where both are weighed together with the load, as well as of the correct weight of the coal contained in the vehicle. (3) If any person fails to comply with the requirements of this section he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 5l.

J. R. Randolph for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think this case must go back to the justices. The waggon was not weighed between the 20th and 23rd Oct., and there was some evidence that the weight of the waggon varied at certain times. It may have been thought that if the waggon was weighed at reasonable intervals that would suffice, but I do not think that that is the proper test. I do not think that a waggon should be weighed before every delivery, but the question is whether the justices had evidence before them that it had been weighed so recently and under such circumstances that the correct weight had been ascertained.

KENNEDY and CHANNELL, JJ. concurred.

Case remitted to justices.

CATERHAM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v.
GODSTONE RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Local government—Alteration of boundaries—Creation of new urban district—Adjustment of property and liabilities—Local Government Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 62.

The loss of a portion of a ratepaying area does not support a claim for an adjustment of "property, income, debts, liabilities, or expenses," within the meaning of sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1888. Therefore where a parish forming part of a rural district was made into a separate urban district by an order of the county council under the Act, and before the alteration the contribution out of the rates of that parish towards the expense of maintaining the highways in the rural district had largely exceeded the cost of maintaining the highways in that parish:

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the rural district council had no ground were affected by the alteration, it was a matter requiring adjustment under sect. 62 of the Local

*Rochdale Union v. Haslingden Union (80 L. T.
Rep. 146; (1899) 1 Q. B. 540) and Buckingham-shire County Council v. Hertfordshire County

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.J.J.), reported 88 L. T. Rep. 414; (1903) 1 K. B. 554, who had affirmed a judgment of Wright, J. upon a special case stated by an arbitrator.

The question was whether, when a new urban district is created under the Local Government Acts of 1888 and 1894 out of part of a previously existing rural district, the latter is entitled, under sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1888, to an adjustment of property, income, debts, liabilities, or expenses in respect of the loss of a ratepaying area caused by the severance. The courts below held that the respondents were so entitled on the authority of the cases of *Rochdale Union
v. Haslingden Union* (80 L. T. Rep. 146; (1899)
1 Q. B. 540) and Buckinghamshire County Council v. Hertfordshire County Council (80 L. T.
Rep. 85; (1899) 1 Q. B. 515).

The special case and the sections of the Acts of Parliament are set out in full in the reports in the court below.

R. Bray, K.C. and M. Shearman, K.C. appeared for the appellants.

C. A. Russell, K.C. and G. Humphreys for the respondents.

Bray, K.C. was not called on to reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 2.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: I am of opinion in this case that the judgment of the Appeal Court and of Wright, J. should be reversed; but in truth, though the question is raised in this case and the consequence must follow, it is really the decision in the case of Rochdale Union v. Haslingden Union (ubi sup.), which is here under appeal. There seems to have been some misapprehension about the decision in that case. Lord Russell, C.J. commences his judgment by saying that he agrees with the judgment of Channell, J. "substantially," and entirely in the principle involved in it; but, upon the point now in debate, the judgment of Channell, J. and Ridley, J., who entirely agreed with him, was the other way. The language of the section now under construction does not seem to me to be appropriate to the compensation of one district for being placed "in a less advantageous financial position" (those are the words used by the Legislature itself) than before the alteration in its boundaries. This is language which the Legislature has used elsewhere when what is now contended for was contemplated by the Legislature, but I do not think that the 62nd section ever contemplated "adjustment" as being applicable to such a state of things as has been brought about by a diminution of rateable area.
Where two areas are being divided, and each becomes responsible for its own administration, and where previously they possessed property, it is obvious enough that they must have some mode of adjusting the division of the property which each possessed prior to such separation—the buildings, for example, the workhouses for the administration of the poor law—and, to quote the language of the section, “property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses.” The only word within which the present claim can be embraced is the word “income.” Now, it may be conceded that in a loose mode of speech the capacity for being rated for future liabilities might be so described, but it would not be accurate. And it is not with the word itself alone that one has to deal, but with the word associated, as it is here, with the words, “property, debts, liabilities, and expenses.” I cannot think that the Legislature intended so grave a departure from the general and very obvious meaning of the words that it has actually used. Where it did intend to allow compensation to be given—compensation, be it observed, not adjustment—it has shown that it can use appropriate and express words for the purpose, and the words, “property, and income from property” can well be satisfied by a division of property and income resulting from property without importing the element of compensation for loss of income. Even if the word “income” itself were appropriately used, I think that the word “adjustment,” as distinguished from “compensation,” means a division of existing assets, while “compensation” would be quite rightly interpreted to mean the loss of some right to obtain income by rating, or of some area which would furnish the right to get income. But it seems to me to be quite contrary to principle, in the case of the alteration of boundaries applicable to a municipal body, which is to be for the future self-sufficing, to make the adjustment of its “property and income, debts and liabilities,” a subject of compensating arrangements. Of course, if the Legislature has done it it must be acquiesced in; but I entirely dissent from the idea of presuming that this has been done without express words. For these reasons it seems to me that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed, and I so move your Lordships.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: The question to be determined in this appeal was thus stated by Vaughan Williams, L.J.: “It is said,” he observes, “that by reason of the separation of the parish of Caterham from the Godstone rural district, the council of that district will lose the profit which they formerly derived from the contribution of the parish of Caterham”; and the question, he added, was whether that apprehended loss was matter for adjustment pursuant to the provisions of sect. 62 of the Local Government Act 1888. Mr. Russell disclaimed stating the question in that way. But I think that the Lord Justice accurately described the claim which is put forward by the respondents. What they are seeking is not an adjustment, in the ordinary sense of that word, of common property or liabilities, or of any reciprocal liabilities of Caterham and Godstone towards each other, but for compensation for a loss which they apprehend that they will suffer by the severance of Caterham from the Godstone rural district. I do not assume that the arbitrator, if he should be required to proceed with the matter, would award to the respondents the full amount of the extravagant claim put forward by them; and I refer to that claim only as showing the true nature of their demand. The first observation that occurs to me is that sect. 62 says nothing about compensation for apprehended loss of profit or injury. Your Lordships are familiar with Acts of Parliament which give a right to such compensation, and one would have expected if that was the meaning of the Act that it would have been expressed in plain terms. Local authorities are by the section in question authorised to make agreements for the purpose of adjusting “any property, income, debts, liabilities, and expenses.” The prima facie meaning of these words is to give powers or facilities for adjusting any matters which by reason of the Act or a scheme made under it require adjustment. In the following words the expression is altered. The section goes on to say (reading it short) that any agreement authorised by the Act to be made “for the purpose of the adjustment of any property, debts, liabilities, or financial relations,” may provide for the transfer or retention of any property, debts, or liabilities, or for the joint use of any property, and for the transfer of any duties, and for payment by either party to the agreement in respect of property, debts, duties, and liabilities so transferred or retained, or of such joint user, or in respect of the salary, remuneration, or compensation payable to any officer or person. I have troubled your Lordships by reading the section at length because the latter words, in my opinion, confirm the prima facie meaning which I attach to the earlier words. It must be admitted, I think, that the property, debts, or liabilities to be retained or transferred must mean existing property or debts, or a liability actually incurred, and the expression financial relations, I think, also refers to any reciprocal financial obligations which the undivided district and the reserved portion may have already incurred towards each other. I construe the words “income and expenses” in the same manner. I think that “income” means income presently enjoyed, or to which there is a present title, and does not include income which may hereafter be derived from property which is held in trust for the district, or some income such as a rentcharge or other annual payment applicable under some charitable trust or otherwise for the benefit of the district or relief of the ratepayers in it. I think that the words would also include the proceeds of any rate already made on the whole district. It is true that income in this sense would strictly be included under the general word “property,” and that is, perhaps, the reason why the word is dropped out in the subsequent enumeration of matters of adjustment. I am, therefore, of opinion that the words of the section do not necessarily, or according to their proper construction, confer any such right as is claimed in this litigation. But I think that the case may be put on a broader principle. The very object of the scheme which has been made under sect. 57 of the Act is to enable the present appellants to rate their own district and expend the rates so raised for the exclusive benefit of their own district. In fact, when one speaks of the severance of an administrative unit it is only a compendious way of expressing this result. That the rates derived from the severed district will be lost to the district from which it is severed is the inevitable consequence and intention of putting the Act in force, and if this were understood by the Legislature to be a matter of compensation some words would be found in the Act which would confer the right to such compensation. Adjustment seems to me a different idea from compensation. When a severance takes place of an administrative unit some adjustment is necessary. There are, or may be, common property or income, debts, liabilities, or expenses owing or incurred by or on behalf of the undivided area. These matters require adjustment, and sect. 62 appears to me to be nothing more than a procedure section for enabling such matters to be adjusted. But the respondents have no vested interests in the profit to be derived from the Caterham highway rates after severance, and there is no abstract right of either of the parties to be compensated by the other for any future financial detriment arising from acts directed or authorised by the Legislature; and in my opinion there is nothing in the Act which creates such a right. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. It follows from what I have said that I think the cases of Rochdale Union v. Haslingden Union and Buckinghamshire County Council v. Hertfordshire County Council were wrongly decided, and should be overruled.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: In this case I agree with the opinions already expressed that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed; for I concur in the view that the loss of a portion of a ratepaying area does not support a claim for an adjustment of "property, income, debts, liabilities, or expenses" within the meaning of sect. 62 of the Local Government Act of 1888. It seems to me that the separation of a portion of an area within which a rate has been levied cannot occasion a loss of "income" within the meaning of the section to the remaining portion of the area; nor can such change in the existence of the rateable area occasion any claim for adjustment under the word "liability." Both of these words, "income" and "liabilities," must be read as referring to ascertained and existing income and liabilities, and cannot be held to include the mere liability to be rated if the order of division had not been made. It may be that the application of this view may in some cases confer on one portion of a divided area substantial advantage at the expense of another portion. But if such gain or loss would amount to injustice, it may be that the remedy is to be found by objecting to the order being made by the county council under sect. 57 of the Act, or to its confirmation by the Local Government Board.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I am very clearly of the same opinion. I do not think that the claim of the respondents comes within sect. 62; and when I say so I mean not merely that the word "adjust" and the other phrases used are not appropriate to cover it, but that the claim is, in its nature and substance, altogether heterogeneous to the things contemplated, and is outside the scheme of setting up new authorities, as stated in the Act. It must be remembered that when, under sect. 62, Caterham and Godstone proceed to "adjust," whatever that means, they meet as separate and self-contained rating authorities,

Caterham having been, by deliberate statutory proceeding, vested with the full and exclusive power of rating for its own use within the boundaries assigned to it, and Godstone, while retaining its old name, having a jurisdiction differing from and smaller than that which formerly existed. The direct and necessary result of setting up Caterham as an urban district is to establish not merely one, but two new rating units—namely, Caterham and the lesser Godstone. The rating in each is necessarily on the new basis of the new area, and it would be merely an accident if the rates in the two areas were the same after as before the separation. Now, the assumption, and what I must venture to call the fallacy, of the judgments under review is that the Legislature intended that the two new bodies should set about what Bruce, J. calls "restoring the true balance"—that is to say, the former balance—of rates. I see no warrant for any such assumption. On the contrary, I should suppose that in some cases at least one of the reasons why a new urban district is set up is because the rating is unfair, and would be made more equitable by dividing the rating area into two. The inhabitants of some proposed new district (I am not for the moment speaking of Caterham) may very well say that they, having grown into a self-contained community, are made to pay for things in which they have no interest, and, because of their large valuation, are paying more than the people who are interested in them. All these considerations and the like, pro and con, are for the county council and the Local Government Board. But the cases of Rochdale Union v. Haslingden Union and Buckinghamshire County Council v. Hertfordshire County Council depend upon the view that in the matter of rates the status quo before the order is to be treated as the standard of right after the order, and that any detriment on the one side and advantage on the other, caused by the independence of the new district, are to be redressed by adjustment. I see no trace of an intention thus to stereotype by compensation the results of a system of rating which, ex hypothesi, has ceased. Of course, it is quite conceivable that the Legislature might have made it a condition of the setting up of a new rating body that it should purchase its independence, and might have taken the financial position in the year of independence as fixing the price. But this is an idea unexpressed in the statute, and remote from the simple one expressed in sect. 62, which primarily at least deals with extant things, and extant liabilities which belong to the undivided community, must perforce be divided, now that the community is broken up and the partners are taking with them what belongs to them. And the difficulty of applying the words of sect. 62 to a claim of compensation becomes, as I think, an impossibility, when the nature of the claim is clearly realised. I have read with care all the judgments in the previous cases. In Rochdale Union v. Haslingden Union and in Buckinghamshire County Council v. Hertfordshire County Council the principle laid down is that to which I have already referred, that the "true balance," meaning thereby the existing balance at the date of the separation, must be "restored." That is most clearly shown in the judgment of Bruce, J. in the Bucks case and in the judgment of Smith, L.J. in the Roch-

OGDENS LIMITED v. NELSON; OGDENS
LIMITED v. TELFORD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Implied condition—Contract to pay bonus to customers for four years—Sale of business—Implied contract to continue to carry on business—Breach of contract.

In consideration of a promise by the defendant, a retail tobacconist, not to sign any agreement with any company or firm which would prevent him from buying or selling the goods of the plaintiffs, and to continue to buy and sell the plaintiffs' goods, the plaintiffs agreed that the defendant should for four years share in a distribution by them of an annual bonus among such of their customers as should purchase direct from them, the distribution to be made according to the purchases for the year.

In pursuance of the agreement, the defendant bought goods from the plaintiffs; but the plaintiffs, before the expiration of one year, sold their business and went into liquidation.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice), that it was an implied term of the contract that the plaintiffs would not discontinue to carry on business during the term of four years, so as to prevent the defendant from earning his share of the bonus, and that the defendant was entitled to damages for breach of the contract.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Lord Alverstone, C.J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs sued the defendant to recover the price of goods sold; the defendant counter-claimed damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs were wholesale tobacconists, and the defendant was a retail tobacconist.

In the early part of 1902 there was a keen competition between the plaintiffs and the Imperial Tobacco Company to obtain the custom of the retail tobacconists in the United Kingdom.

The Imperial Tobacco Company issued a circular to the retail tobacconists, asking them to sign an agreement not to deal with the plaintiffs, or any other company, firm, or person objected to by the Imperial Tobacco Company, and offered to distribute among those who signed the agreement a bonus of 50,000*l.* and a share of one-fifth of the whole of the net profits of their home trade.

The plaintiffs then sent out a circular, in March 1902, to retail tobacconists, as follows:

Bonus Distribution.—Our entire net profits and 200,000*l.* per year for the next four years. Commencing the 2nd April 1902, we will for the next four years distribute to such of our customers in the United Kingdom as purchase direct from us our entire net profits on the goods sold by us in the United Kingdom. In addition to the above, we will, commencing the 2nd April 1902, for the next four years distribute to such of our customers as purchase direct from us the sum of 200,000*l.* per year. Distribution of net profits will be made as soon after the 2nd April 1903, and annually thereafter, as the accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases made during the year. Distribution as to the 200,000*l.* will be made every three months. The first distribution to take place as soon after the 2nd July 1902 as accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases during the three months' period. To participate in this offer we do not ask you to boycott the goods of any other manufacturer.

Accompanying this circular there was a form of contract, as follows:

Messrs. Ogdens Limited, Liverpool.—Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that I have not signed the agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Company Limited, dated March 1902, and in consideration of participating in your bonus distribution of the entire net profits on goods sold by you in the United Kingdom, and 200,000*l.* per year, for the next four years, as set out in your particulars, I hereby agree not to sign it or any similar agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Company Limited, or any other company or firm, containing any conditions which would prevent me from buying, displaying, selling, or distributing your goods or the goods of any other manufacturer, and I also undertake to continue to buy, display, and sell your goods.

The defendant signed this contract and sent it to the plaintiffs.

Pursuant to the agreement the defendant dealt with the plaintiffs, and in July 1902 received a share of 50,000*l.*, being one-quarter of the 200,000*l.*, for the three months ending the 2nd July 1902; and he also received credit in account for his share of that bonus for the three months ending the 2nd Oct. 1902; but he did not receive any share of the entire net profits on the goods sold by the plaintiffs in the United Kingdom.

In Sept. 1902 the plaintiffs sold their business in the United Kingdom to the Imperial Tobacco Company, and they informed the defendant and their other customers of that fact; they ceased to carry on any business in the United Kingdom, and went into voluntary liquidation.

The defendant admitted the claim for the price of goods sold. By his counter-claim the defendant alleged that the plaintiffs had broken the contract by ceasing to carry on business, and he claimed damages for that breach. It was agreed that the plaintiffs had not made any net profits during the period from the 2nd April to the 2nd Oct. 1902.

The Lord Chief Justice gave judgment in favour of the defendant on his counter-claim, and assessed the damages at 70*l.*

In the action of Ogdens Limited v. Telford the facts were the same, and the Lord Chief Justice

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] OGDENS LIMITED v. NELSON; OGDENS LIMITED v. TELFORD. [CT. OF APP.]

gave judgment for the defendant on his counter-claim for 200*l.* damages (89 L. T. Rep. 296).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Asquith, K.C., Duke, K.C., and F. E. Smith for the appellants.—The learned Lord Chief Justice was wrong in holding that the defendant was entitled to damages for breach of contract. The defendant seeks to import into this contract an implied stipulation that the plaintiffs will continue to carry on business during the period of four years. Upon the true construction of this contract such a stipulation cannot be implied. The bonus is to be paid only so long as the relation of seller and customer continues to exist, and it is clear that, if for any reason that relation ceases, the bonus is not to be payable. That shows that there cannot be implied any stipulation that the business is to be carried on. There is not in this contract any express provision that the plaintiffs will continue to supply the defendant with goods, and therefore there cannot be an implied agreement that they will continue to carry on business:

Rhodes v. Forwood, 34 L. T. Rep. 890; 1 App. Cas. 256;

The Moorcock, 60 L. T. Rep. 654; 14 P. Div. 64.

Banks, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and J. R. Randolph for the respondent.—The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was correct, and in accordance with the authorities. The defendant is not seeking to read any implied stipulation into this contract. The plaintiffs have expressly agreed to pay the bonus for four years, and the plaintiffs cannot import into that contract an implied term that the bonus is to be paid only if they continue to carry on business. The defendant gave consideration at once for the agreement to pay the bonus because he bound himself not to sign the agreement of the rival company or any other agreement which would prevent him dealing with the plaintiffs. The defendant having given the consideration on his part, the plaintiffs cannot do anything which will prevent him from being a customer during the four years and so obtaining his share of the promised bonus. Upon the true construction of this contract, the consideration being executed on one side, the other party cannot free himself from the obligation to permit the earning of the agreed remuneration:

McIntyre v. Belcher, 8 L. T. Rep. 461; 14 C. B. N. S. 654;

Telegraph Dispatch and Intelligence Company v. McLean, L. Rep. 8 Cb. 659;

Inchbald v. Western Neilgherry Coffee Company, 11 L. T. Rep. 345; 17 C. B. N. S. 733;

Brace v. Calder, 72 L. T. Rep. 829; (1895) 2 Q. B. 253;

Northey v. Trevillion, 7 Com. Cas. 201.

In Rhodes v. Forwood (ubi sup.) the decision turned entirely upon the peculiar nature of the contract, there being no express agreement by the defendants to sell any goods at all through the plaintiff, whom they had appointed their agent at a specified place. The decision in Hamlyn v. Wood (ubi sup.) also turned upon the special nature of the contract, which was construed to mean that the defendants would sell to the plaintiff merely such grains as they might make.

Duke, K.C. in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This appeal raises the question whether, upon the true construction of the agreement between the parties, the respondents are emancipated from the obligation of paying the share of profits and the bonus, which would be payable if they were still carrying on business, by reason of the fact that they have sold their business. The case arose in this way: Ogdens Limited, who are the defendants to the counter-claim, had formed a scheme for capturing the tobacco trade in this country. They were confronted by a powerful opposition from the Imperial Company, which came forward with a similar scheme. In this competition each competitor went on offering better and better terms to customers. In view of the competition of the Imperial Company, Ogdens thought that it would help them in the competition if they made an arrangement with customers which I will presently read. They accordingly sent out a circular in which they invited the attention of intending customers to the terms which the Imperial Company were offering, and pointed out how much better their terms were than those of the other company. The circular was in these terms: [His Lordship read it as set out above.] Then followed the contract which customers were asked to sign, a draft form accompanying the circular. This contract was in fact signed by Nelson. It was as follows: [His Lordship read it as above set out.] When the customer signs that document, Ogdens by that signature obtain from the customer an undertaking which severs him completely from the scheme of the Imperial Company and obliges him to abstain from signing any agreement which would prevent him from dealing with Ogdens. Ogdens thereby at once secure that undertaking which is most essential from their point of view in their competition with the Imperial Company. What did Ogdens undertake to give the customer in return? Are they entitled to receive that benefit from the customer and then to get rid of their promise to give something in return? They promise in their circular to give for the next four years a bonus distribution of their net profits and of 200,000*l.* a year in addition, in absolute and express terms. It is contended that, notwithstanding the fact that the consideration on the part of the customer was so far executed, and the distinct terms of the promise by Ogdens to give this bonus, yet Ogdens may dispose of their business at any time and then say to the customer that they are making no profits and that therefore there is no bonus to distribute; that they have ceased to carry on business, and have not undertaken by their contract to continue to carry on business, and that therefore there are no customers to whom the bonus is to be distributed, and that a person who is not a customer is not entitled to anything. It is contended on behalf of Ogdens that Nelson is obliged to rely upon some implied undertaking on the part of Ogdens to carry on business, and that such an undertaking cannot be implied in this contract. That contention goes too far, for it would follow that, even while Ogdens were still carrying on business, if Nelson were to ask Ogdens to sell him tobacco, Ogdens might say that they did not want to sell him any, and properly refuse to do so. That would have prevented Nelson being a customer, and there would have been no obligation to pay him any bonus, because he was not a customer, and Ogdens would be therefore absolved from any obligation to pay him any bonus. The argument on behalf of Ogdens would necessarily go as far as that. It seems to me that, a fortiori, if the customer is entitled to read into the contract an implied promise by Ogdens while they are carrying on business to sell tobacco to the person who signs the contract, so that they are not entitled by any act of theirs to keep him out of the category of customers, they are equally responsible if by any act of theirs they prevent him from continuing to be a customer. There is a long line of authorities upon questions of this kind; and there is a distinct line of demarcation running through those authorities, some falling on one side of the line and some on the other side of the line; most of them fall on this side of the line. The broad general principle to be deduced from those cases is, that a person cannot receive the consideration for a contract, when that consideration implies that he will continue to do something, without being subject to an implied obligation to continue to keep in existence the conditions which make it possible. There are many authorities for that proposition. For instance, in cases where a business is sold and is to be paid for out of the profits of that business, there is a clear obligation on the purchaser to continue to carry on the business so that profits can be made out of which the purchase money may be paid. That is the broad general principle, and it is applicable to the present case. In this case the consideration was executed in a great part, Nelson having signed the undertaking not to join the opposition. Having got that executed consideration, Ogdens were in the same position as a person who has bought a business and has contracted to pay for it out of the profits; that is, there is the same obligation upon them not to make it impossible to pay out of profits. It is contended on behalf of Ogdens that there is the authority of a case in the House of Lords to the contrary, Rhodes v. Forwood (34 L. T. Rep. 890; 1 App. Cas. 256). When that case is carefully considered, it appears to have been a peculiar case depending upon the special circumstances. The substance of that case was that the defendants had appointed the plaintiff as their sole agent at a particular place for the sale of their coals for seven years, and there was no agreement obliging the defendants to sell any coals at all through that agent at that place; they were free to sell all their coals elsewhere. The defendants afterwards sold their business, and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to say that the defendants were bound to carry on their business for the seven years because there was no special agreement to furnish him as their agent with any coals at all. It was held that on the true construction of the contract in that case there was no obligation to sell any coals at all through that agent. That case was decided upon the special terms of the contract. When that case has been criticised and distinguished in later cases, it has been said that it was decided upon the ground that there was no absolute contract to employ the plaintiff as agent at all. It was so distinguished, in Turner v. Goldsmith (64

L. T. Rep. 301; (1891) 1 Q. B. 544), by Lindley, L.J., from whose judgment I will read a short passage. He said: "It was contended that the point was settled by authority. I will refer to three cases on the subject. In Rhodes v. Forwood (ubi sup.) it was held that an action very similar to the present was not maintainable. But that case went on the ground that, there not being any express contract to employ the agent, such a contract could not be implied. In the present case we find an express contract to employ him." For the reasons which I have given, I think that the present case falls outside the narrow line laid down in Rhodes v. Forwood (ubi sup.). The consideration was executed, and there was a contract absolute in its terms to pay the bonus for a period of four years. It seems to me that, therefore, the circumstances necessarily imply that the party giving the undertaking to pay cannot free himself from the obligation before the end of the term by getting rid of the business. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. After what the Master of the Rolls has said about the authorities, in which I entirely concur, I do not think that it is necessary for me to discuss the authorities. Those authorities, so far as they lay down any principle upon which the courts should act, show that in a case like this the question is, What is the true construction of the contract when its terms are fairly considered? As to this contract, it is first to be noticed that, for the benefit of Ogdens, Nelson at once gave valuable consideration, for he contracted with Ogdens in the first place not to sign the agreement of the Imperial Company, and also further contracted not to sign any similar agreement with the Imperial Company, or with any other firm or company containing any conditions which would prevent him from buying, displaying, selling, or distributing Ogdens' goods. For present purposes I need not pause to consider the extent of the obligation upon Nelson under the last condition of the contract. What do we find in the contract entered into by Ogdens? It appears to me that Ogdens made certain absolute contracts with Nelson. In the first place, they absolutely contracted for the period of four years to distribute to their customers their entire net profits on the goods sold by them in the United Kingdom; they further contracted, and this is even more important for this purpose, for the period of four years to distribute to their customers the sum of 200,000*l.* a year; and then followed the conditions as to distribution. That agreement by Ogdens is absolute in form, and I think that it is absolute in substance. The obligations undertaken by Ogdens were intended to bind them for the term of four years. It appears to me that, in this contract, when fairly construed, there cannot be implied in favour of Ogdens that after it was made they should be at liberty, as against Nelson, at their own free will to stop selling their goods in the United Kingdom during the four years, or to do any voluntary act which would make it impossible to distribute the sums which they had so contracted to distribute. That really determines this case, for in consequence there has been a breach of contract by Ogdens. Their assignment of their business was clearly a voluntary act which prevented Nelson from obtaining any part of the sums contracted to be paid by Ogdens. Therefore there was clearly a breach of contract for which Nelson was entitled to recover substantial damages. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We must ascertain what was the common intent of the parties. It is said on behalf of Ogdens that the true implication is that the contract was optional, and was only binding so long as Ogdens chose to carry on business. On behalf of Nelson it is contended that there was an absolute contract to carry on business for four years, and that that was the intention of the parties. Upon considering the terms of the contract, it seems to me to be clear that the latter contention is the right one. The true meaning of the contract is that, if Nelson will deal with Ogdens and sign the proposed agreement, Ogdens will for four years distribute this money among their customers, and that they bind themselves to do so. I think that that is the contract between the parties, and that Ogdens cannot get out of it by parting with their business. By parting with their business they have committed a breach of contract, and Nelson is entitled to damages. Counsel for Ogdens have tried to bring this case within the authority of Rhodes v. Forwood (ubi sup.) and Hamlyn v. Wood (65 L. T. Rep. 286; (1891) 2 Q. B. 488). In those cases it was held upon the terms of the particular contract in question that they were purely optional. Those two cases stand alone, and are quite different from the present case. The alleged inconsistency in the authorities is, in my opinion, more apparent than real. I think that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

July 23, 29, 30, Nov. 5, 1903, and Feb. 12, 1904.

(Before BYRNE, J.)

SMITH v. LAW GUARANTEE AND TRUST SOCIETY LIMITED. (a)

Company—Debenture trust deed—Payment of interest and principal—Default—Realisation of securities—Appropriation by payees to principal and interest—Income tax.

The trustees of a debenture deed were directed, in case of default by the J. C. M. Trust Company, to pay the principal moneys and interest for which it should become liable under its debentures, to realise the securities, and apply the proceeds to payment, first, of all arrears of interest on the debentures, and, secondly, in or towards payment of principal.

The J. C. M. Trust Company having made default, an order was made in a debenture-holder's action for the trusts of the debenture deed to be carried into execution. Under numerous orders made in the action sums were paid to the debenture-holders on account both of interest, less income tax, and of principal and interest generally. The realisation had now been practically completed, and it was proposed to pay a final dividend to the debenture-holders. It was admitted that if the whole of the past payments which had been made on account generally and any further sums available were attributed solely to principal, they would be insufficient to discharge the whole amount thereof. The Inland Revenue authorities claimed income tax on all payments made generally on account of principal and interest.

Held, that all payments hitherto made by the trustees on account generally might be attributed, at the option of the payees as between themselves and the trustees at their election, as payments on account of principal or interest, without prejudice to any question whether or not such payments should be treated in the hands of the payees as principal or interest; and that income tax would be payable upon so much, if anything, as should be paid to debenture-holders as for interest.

By a trust deed dated 29th June 1892, and made between the Jarvis Conklin Mortgage Trust Company of the one part and the Law Guarantee and Trust Society Limited of the other part, a security was created in favour of the defendant society upon property of the company to secure the principal moneys and interest for which the company should become liable under its debentures.

By this deed provision was made by clause 9 for realisation in case of default, and by clause 11 it was provided that the Law Guarantee and Trust Society Limited, the trustees, should hold the money to arise from the realisation of securities appropriated for each series of debentures upon trust after payment of costs, expenses, and remuneration, to apply the residue, first, in or towards payment of all arrears of interest remaining unpaid on the debentures of such series; secondly, in or towards payment of the debenture-holders of such series pari passu, in proportion to the debentures of such series held by them respectively, and without any preference or priority on account of priority of issue or otherwise howsoever of all principal moneys due on such debentures, and that whether the same principal moneys should or should not then be payable according to the tenor of the same debentures; and, thirdly, to pay the surplus of such moneys to the company, or its assigns.

Clause 13 was as follows:

Upon any payment under clause 11 hereof to the registered holder of a debenture on account of the principal moneys or interest thereby secured, the trustees shall be entitled to require the production of any debentures in respect of which they are making payment to the holder of any principal money or interest thereby secured, and the trustees shall, in the event of production, cause a memorandum of the amount and date of payment to be indorsed thereon, but the receipt of the registered holder of each of the debentures, or in the case of joint holders of any one of the registered joint holders, as regards the principal money expressed to be thereby secured, and the delivery to the trustees of each of the interest coupons as regards the interest therein mentioned, shall be a good discharge to the trustees, who shall be entitled in their reasonable discretion to dispense with the production of the debenture upon a proper indemnity being given, but shall not be entitled to dispense with the production of the coupons.

By clause 14 the company were to pay the principal moneys and interest secured by the debentures in accordance with the tenor thereof respectively.

By the judgment in the action, dated the 8th Dec. 1893, the defendant society undertaking, until further order, not to part with, or dispose of, without the leave of the court, any of the securities still in their hands in England, or which should thereafter come to their hands in England, comprised in the said trust deed, it was declared that the mortgage debentures of the series "C" constituted a first charge upon all property and effects comprised in the deed, and that the trusts of such deed ought to be performed and carried into execution, and the usual accounts and inquiries in a debenture-holder's action were directed, the first being on account of what was due for principal and interest to the holders of the "C" series of debentures.

By an order of the 6th Aug. 1894 it was ordered that the defendant society should be at liberty to pay 2 per cent. on the amount of the debentures of the "C" series on account of interest in arrear.

By an order of the 2nd April 1895 it was ordered that the defendant society should, out of the funds in their hands to the credit of income, pay on account of arrears of interest due on debentures a further dividend of 2 per cent. on the capital amount of the debentures, and that the trustees should be at liberty to pay the income tax thereon, and on the last payment under the order of the 6th Aug. 1894.

These orders were duly acted upon and payments made accordingly.

The certificate was filed on the 24th April 1895, whereby it was found that there was due to the holders of the "C" debentures the sum of 123,000*l.* for principal and a sum of 8702*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* for interest, calculated up to the 1st Oct. 1894.

This date was the last half-yearly date prior to the making of the certificate for payment of interest under the debentures. The schedule to the certificate showed the names of the then holders of the debentures and the amounts respectively due to them for principal and interest to the same date.

In pursuance of an order of the 14th June 1895 a further sum was paid on account of interest, income tax being duly deducted and paid by the defendant society.

On the 15th June 1896, upon a summons taken out by the plaintiff, which came before the judge in chambers personally, an order was made whereby it was ordered that the defendant society should be at liberty out of cash in their hands to pay the balance of interest found due to the 1st Oct. 1894 by the chief clerk's certificate, and then out of any surplus to pay a dividend of 1 per cent. on account of what was due on the debentures. In fact under this order the actual amount paid in respect of interest appeared to have exceeded (with the amounts previously paid) the amount found due. Income tax was duly paid on this.

By an order of the 21st July 1897 it was ordered that the defendant society should be at liberty out of cash in hand to pay a dividend of 10 per cent, calculated on the face value of the debentures, on account generally of what was due on the said debentures for principal and interest, and having regard to the fact that the registers of the company had been removed to New York and were not open to inspection, and having regard to the chief clerk's certificate and to the notices received by the defendant society of devolution of interest in debentures since the certificate, the defendants, the trustees, were to be at liberty to continue to make such payments to the debenture-holders mentioned in certain lists therein referred to.

Further orders were from time to time subsequently made on similar terms to that last mentioned; and in all there had been paid to the debenture-holders a sum of 104,550*l.* on account generally of principal and interest. These moneys arose from realisation from time to time of securities included in the trust deed by the defendant society.

In April 1897 there was a dividend paid direct from the general assets of the company under an American decree without any express direction as to its application for principal or for interest. The realisation had now been completed, except to an amount which was not likely to exceed 4000*l.*, and the society as trustees had in hand a sum of about 1900*l.*

It was estimated that the final dividend available for the debenture-holders would probably not exceed 5 per cent., calculated on the face value of the securities, and it was also admitted that if the whole of the past payments which had been made generally on account, and any further sums available, were attributed and applied solely in payment of principal, they would be insufficient to discharge the whole amount thereof.

The Inland Revenue authorities now claimed income tax on all the amounts paid generally on account of principal and interest.

This was a summons taken out by the defendant company asking for the direction of the court whether the payments already made by them on account under the order of the court, and any further payments to be made not exceeding in all the principal moneys secured by the debentures, were to be treated as payments in respect of capital, or whether any and, if any, what parts thereof ought to be treated as payments in respect of interest, and whether any and, if any, what provision ought to be made for income tax thereon.

Levett, K.C. and *A. à-B. All further payments, the security being deficient, can be attributed to capital, on which no income tax is payable.

ments made on account generally to capital or interest:

Cory and Co. v. Owners of Steamship Mecca, 76 L. T. Rep. 579; (1897) A. C. 286.

The orders of the court have carefully abstained from appropriating the amounts. The Inland Revenue authorities cannot claim income tax on the authority of Bower v. Morris (Cr. & Ph. 351), which was the case of a solvent estate. The Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888, s. 24, does not impose upon a trustee the duty of appropriating to interest rather than principal. He referred also to Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.—Upon the true construction of sect. 24 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888, the trustees ought to have deducted income tax from the amounts paid:

London County Council v. Attorney-General, 83 L. T. Rep. 605; (1901) A. C. 26.

Under clause 11 of the trust deed it is impossible for the debenture-holders now to elect to treat the payments as on account of capital. Here there has been an irrevocable appropriation by the debtor in the trust deed. It is the general rule that interest must be paid before capital:

Fisher on Mortgages, 5th edit., p. 723, sect. 1514.

Nor can the money be applied, as was argued, in payment of principal and interest pro rata; this would be departing from the provisions of the trust deed, which have not been altered by any of the orders made. The Statute of Limitations does not apply to this case. See Taxes Management Act 1880, s. 63, sub-s. 2.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 12.—BYRNE, J. stated the facts, and continued:—It is contended on behalf of certain of the debenture-holders that, there having been no attribution of these past payments to capital or to interest or otherwise than as payments on account generally of the amount due, they are entitled to elect how to treat all such payments, and also any future payments, as being payments on account of principal, in which case there is no income tax payable. On behalf of the plaintiffs, as representing the general body of debenture-holders, it is argued that the past payments ought, in the most hostile aspect, to be treated as having been made rateably on account of principal and interest from time to time due, that these have been finally made, and that, if by error or from oversight, income tax which has not been ought first to have been deducted from so much of the payments as represents the rateable proportion attributable to interest, things must stand as they are; and that it is now competent for the cestuis que trust under the deed to say, "We now elect to receive further payments as and for capital." This injures no one; the mortgagors cannot be injured, and if by some chance further assets should be discovered and come in, this method of dealing with the fund cannot be worse, and may be better, for the mortgagors. For the Inland Revenue, the argument, shortly, is that the payments were on account generally, and that means on account of principal and interest subject to adjustment at a future date; when adjusted, if it appears that payments have been made on account of interest, income tax ought to be answered out of any balance of trust funds, because the court will, so long as trust property remains to be distributed, take care that any adjustment shall be so made as to make good any payments which ought properly to have been made had circumstances allowed them to have been made from time to time as and when they ought to have been; and, further, that the deed having provided for payment first of interest, and a judgment having been given for execution of the trusts, every payment must be treated, in the absence of other directions, as having been made in accordance with the terms of the trust. The trustees, the society, are only concerned in seeing that they are indemnified against any possible claims against them personally on behalf of the Inland Revenue authorities. Having considered the various orders made, I have satisfied myself that, in ordering payment on account of what was due generally, there was no intention to alter or affect the rights of any of the parties, and that, in effect, the matter stands before me in the same position in regard to the rights as between mortgagors and mortgagees as though I had now to deal with the whole fund for distribution, subject only to this—that I have no jurisdiction in this action to direct repayment of anything which has already been paid. To further clear the ground, I will next express my opinion that I cannot accept the argument that I must treat the payments already made as having been made rateably on account of principal and interest. The court has not directed that they should be so made, either directly or by implication, but simply that they should be made on account generally of what was due. Exactly why the orders were so made I am unable to say with certainty; but there is no difficulty in understanding that there were sufficient reasons, and it is enough to point out that there was no certificate of what was due for principal and interest brought up to date; it was quite possible, so far as appears, that there would ultimately be realised enough to pay principal and interest, in which case no question would ever arise, and it might have been thought reasonable to give time to ascertain whether or not the mortgaged property would prove sufficient or insufficient, so that, if there were any option to take as for principal or interest, time might be given to raise the question of right to elect. I am unable to accept the argument grounded in general terms on the doctrine approved in Cory Brothers v. Owners of Steamship Mecca (ubi sup.) as to the right of appropriation of any payment on the part of the creditor to the last moment, where the debtor has not in making the payment himself appropriated its destination. This is a doctrine applicable as between debtor and creditor in the absence of express contract, but in the present case there was an express contract that moneys realised should be applied in a particular way—viz., in payment, first, of interest and then of principal. Nor can I say that the trust ceased to be effective ipso facto because the estate has turned out insufficient. I agree with Mr. Vaughan Hawkins' argument on this point. But I accept this view, which was presented to me on behalf of the plaintiffs—viz., that the provision in the deed for payment of interest first is one inserted obviously for the benefit of the creditors, and one, therefore, which they could waive if they so desired in the absence of opposition by the debtors, who in the present case do not oppose, nor is it conceivable that they could have any reason for opposing. It has been argued that it is impossible to permit any choice or right of election to appropriate to the creditors, because many of the debenture-holders may be trustees and would have to distribute amongst their own cestuis que trust, having regard to the quality of payments made to themselves whether as for principal or for interest. I will not pretend that the case is otherwise than complicated and difficult, but, having fully considered it, the matter presents itself to me in this way. As between the defendant society and the company it is matter of absolute indifference to the mortgagors how the proceeds of realisation are disposed of, as they have nothing coming to them in any event. If they had any conceivable interest in the matter, it would, of course, be in favour of the application of the moneys in payment of capital first, contrary to the terms of the deed. As between the society holding the proceeds of realisation and their cestuis que trust, the debenture-holders, the provision may, as I conceive, be waived by the cestuis que trust. How the moneys ought to be dealt with when received by the debenture-holders is a question if they are trustees between them and their cestuis que trust. Moreover, the court is not executing any trusts as between the last-named parties. But this being an action for the common benefit of a number of creditors standing as between themselves pari passu as to their rights, no one or more of them could elect to receive moneys contrary to the terms of the deed to the detriment of any other of them. It cannot, however, be to the detriment of any of them that any other or others of them should receive payment as for principal instead of as for interest, because, on working out the account, any such payment must work in favour of those who desire to be paid strictly in accordance with the deed. The society have nothing to do with the question whether or not their cestuis que trust are trustees or not for others; they pay to the persons entitled under the deed, in accordance with the trusts of it, or otherwise, at the option of their payees, unless this could work injustice to others. I think the true solution of the matter, and one which will preserve all rights, is this. Let all payments heretofore made by the defendant society on account generally be attributed, at the option of the payees as between themselves and the defendant society at their election, as payments on account of principal or of interest, all such sums to be deemed to be so attributed without prejudice to any question whether or not such payments, or any part or parts thereof, are in the hands of the payees to be treated as capital or interest. In case any of the debenture-holders payees shall elect to have the payments to them made, in accordance with the deed, in discharge of interest first and then of principal, an account will have to be taken having regard to the election of such of the debenture-holders as shall have elected in favour of past receipts being treated as capital, so to take of what remains due to the debenture-holders, and let any balance now or hereafter to become distributable, subject to costs, charges, and proper deductions, be distributed accordingly. If, as I should apprehend would be the case, all the debenture-holders elect to take their past and future payments as for capital, there will probably be no occasion to take any account. The Inland Revenue will then, of course, look for payment from the debenture-holders of any income tax properly payable by them in respect of moneys, however paid to them, which in their hands are distributable as income. I imagine that, having regard to the considerable amounts already paid on account generally, if there be trustee debenture-holders, they must already have made payments for income from which they have deducted income tax. Of course, provision will have to be made for payment of income tax upon so much, if anything, as is paid to debenture-holders as for interest. I have not referred in detail to the authorities cited because I do not think that any of them really touch the actual point I have to decide. If anything that has been paid was in fact interest, income tax ought to have been or to be provided for; but, in the view I take, none of it was definitely paid as interest. The order will require settling carefully, but I think I have sufficiently stated the principle on which it must be framed.

The minutes of the order as finally settled were as follows: "The court declares that all payments heretofore made by the applicants to the holders of the debentures of the 'C' series in the defendant company 'on account generally' of what was due thereon ought to be attributed, at the option of the holders of the said debentures as between themselves and the applicants, as payments on account of principal or of interest, and no income tax is payable in respect of so much thereof as is attributed to capital; but this declaration is without prejudice to the question whether or not such payment or any part or parts thereof ought, in the hands of the persons to whom payments have been made, to be treated as capital or interest, and in case any of the holders of the said debentures shall elect to treat the said payments heretofore made 'on account generally' of what was due on the said debentures as having been made in discharge first of interest then due and as to the balance in discharge of capital, let an account be taken to ascertain how much out of the amounts paid 'on account generally' as aforesaid ought, in accordance with such election, to be treated as having been paid in respect of interest, and how much in respect of capital; and out of any moneys now or hereafter to become distributable in respect of the said debentures whose holders should have so elected, let the applicants first pay the income tax payable in respect of the amounts found to have been paid in respect of interest as aforesaid. And it is ordered that subject as aforesaid any moneys now or hereafter to become distributable amongst the holders of the said debentures of the 'C' series in the defendant company may be paid, at the option of the holders of the debentures as between themselves and the applicants, on account of principal and of interest, but so that (inclusive of payments already made on account of principal) no more than 20s. in the pound be paid on account of principal secured by any of the said debentures; and income tax is to be paid on such part thereof (if any) as shall be payable on account of interest."

Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4—Written contract—Parol variation of terms of—New agreement—Rescission—Specific performance.

Where a written agreement for a lease had been executed and one of the parties declined to execute the lease because a parol agreement had been subsequently come to between the parties: Held, that such parol evidence, though admissible on a claim for rescission, could not be admitted in variation of the original agreement, the terms of which must be carried out.

MOTION.

An order was made on the 5th Nov. 1903 in an action staying all further proceedings except such as might be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the compromise set forth in the schedule thereto; and the schedule provided that a certain mining lease should be granted by the defendant to the plaintiff upon terms therein stated.

Subsequently on the 11th Dec. 1903 the plaintiff and the defendant had an interview at which the terms of the proposed lease were discussed, and certain alterations were agreed to and embodied in a memorandum of which each of the parties signed a copy and copies were exchanged.

The defendant's solicitor objected to several of the proposed alterations, but the plaintiff insisted on them as forming part of a new contract made at this interview.

This was a motion by the defendant that the plaintiff might be ordered to execute the lease in compliance with the terms of the agreement contained in the schedule to the order.

Norton, K.C. and G. B. Rashleigh for the motion.

Rowden, K.C. and A. J. David for the respondent.—We can give parol evidence of what occurred at the interview on the 11th Dec., as this amounted to a rescission of the earlier contract, and the court will not order specific performance of it. They referred to Fry on Specific Performance, 4th edit., p. 443.

Norton, K.C. in reply.—No parol evidence of alterations in a contract required by the law to be in writing can be admitted. The only exception is in the case of a contract to rescind, of which parol evidence is admissible:

Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. 356; 11 R. R. 102;

Robinson v. Page, 3 Russ. 114; 27 R. R. 26.

BYRNE, J. (after stating the material facts and deciding that the memorandum of the 11th Dec. did not amount to an agreement between the parties at all) said:—The question, therefore, is how far I can receive parol evidence to prove what took place at the discussion between the parties. The decisions in Price v. Dyer (ubi sup.) and Robinson v. Page (ubi sup.) appear to me to show that, though parol evidence of a subsequent agreement for rescission of a contract can be admitted, parol evidence of an agreement to vary cannot. Here, though there is a contradiction between the parties, there is none on the point that all that was intended at the interview was a variation in the terms of the first agreement. I think, therefore, the defendant is entitled to have the terms of the agreement as they appear in the schedule to the order carried out.

Re REPINGTON; WODEHOUSE v. SCOBELL. (a)

Revenue—Legacy duty—Part of reversion assigned—Assignees' liability—Covenant for further assurance—Right to indemnity.

A settlor assigned a sum of 10,000l., part of a mortgage debt of 15,000l. to which he was entitled in reversion expectant upon the death of his father.

Held, that the assignees were liable rateably for the legacy duty payable in respect of the whole upon the death of the tenant for life; nor could the assignees claim to be indemnified under a covenant for further assurance made by the settlor.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will, dated the 10th Sept. 1836, the testator, Charles Edward Repington, devised certain real estates upon certain trusts not material to this report, and then, in the events which happened, devised it in remainder to the use of Charles Henry Wyndham à Court Repington during his life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of Charles Henry Wyndham à Court Repington successively according to seniority in tail male.

The testator also bequeathed his residuary personal estate upon the like ultimate trusts as far as possible, so that in 1882 Charles Henry Wyndham à Court Repington had become tenant for life of the residuary personal estate, and his son, the defendant Charles à Court Repington, who had then attained twenty-one years of age, was entitled to the residuary personalty in reversion absolutely.

The residuary personalty then consisted of a mortgage debt of 15,000l., secured by an indenture of the 14th Jan. 1840 on property in Warwickshire, and a sum of 783l. 1s. 1d. Consols.

By his marriage settlement, dated the 10th Feb. 1882, Charles Repington, the son, assigned the sum of 10,000*l.*, "part of the mortgage debt or sum of 15,000*l.*" to which he was entitled "in reversion expectant upon the death of his father," to his trustees upon the trusts therein contained. He also covenanted for further assurance in the following terms:

That he . . . and every person claiming through or under him will at any time or times hereafter, upon the request of the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents or any other person for the time being interested in the premises and at the cost of the trust estate, execute and do every such assurance and thing for the further or more perfectly assuring the said premises hereinbefore expressed to be hereby assigned or any part thereof unto the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents and for enabling them or him to obtain payment of the same as by the person or persons making such request shall be reasonably required.

The sum of 783*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* Consols was transferred by the trustees to Charles Repington the father and Charles Repington the son in 1885, so that from and after that time the mortgage debt of 15,000*l.* constituted the entire residuary personalty of the testator remaining in the hands of the trustees of the will.

Five thousand pounds out of the mortgage debt was paid off in 1894 and invested by the trustees in 5012*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* Consols, which they still retained.

The defendant Charles Repington, the son, created divers charges upon his interest in the residuary personal estate of the testator, but all of them were made subsequent to the date of his marriage settlement, the first instrument of charge being dated the 23rd Dec. 1886. All these charges were vested in the defendant C. R. Nicholl.

The tenant for life, Charles Repington the father, died on the 29th Oct. 1903, and thereupon the defendant Charles Repington the son or his assigns became absolutely entitled to the residuary personal estate of the testator, subject only to the payment of legacy duty at the rate of 5 per cent., and of the costs of and incidental to the winding-up of the trusts of the will. All probate duty had already been paid.

The question thereupon arose whether the trustees of the marriage settlement were entitled, by virtue of the assignment therein contained, to the payment of the clear sum of 10,000*l.* free from all deductions, or whether that sum was liable rateably with the balance of the residuary personalty to the legacy duty and costs.

On the 9th March 1904 an originating summons was taken out seeking the decision of the court on this question, and it now came on for hearing.

Bryan Farrer for the trustees of the will.

MacSwinney for the trustees of the settlement. —If this had been the case of an assignment of a part of a reversion, and the reversion had been subject to a mortgage, the assignor would have been bound under his covenant for further assurance to discharge the mortgage out of the part of the reversion which he had retained:

Re Jones; Farrington v. Forrester, 69 L. T. Rep. 45; (1893) 2 Ch. 461.

Legacy duty is a payment for which the whole fund is liable, and ought to be dealt with as though it were a charge. Under these circumstances the retention by the settlor of part of the reversion makes him liable under his covenant for further assurance. It was clearly intended by the settlement to settle a clear sum of 10,000*l.* charged upon the mortgage; there can be no question that if the security had decreased in value the loss would have had to be borne by the unsettled part.

Romer for Charles Repington the son and his mortgagee. —The fact that if the whole fund had been settled the liability for legacy duty would have fallen on the reversion so settled (and this has not been denied) disposes of the argument that in this case the part assigned is not liable rateably for the legacy duty. Legacy duty is not an incumbrance:

Bliss v. Putnam, 1843, 7 Beav. 40.

On the sale of a reversion the purchaser is liable for duty. Again, when successive appointments are made out of a fund, each appointee has to bear the legacy duty on the share appointed to him. If the argument on the other side were correct, the unappointed part of the fund, or, if all were appointed, the last appointed share, would have to bear the entire duty. Re Shaw; Tuckett v. Shaw (71 L. T. Rep. 873; (1895) 1 Ch. 343) proves that this is not the case. Further, by the settlement a part of the mortgage debt is settled, not a sum charged on the mortgage debt. The covenant for further assurance cannot help the other side, seeing that it is expressly provided that everything to be done under that covenant is to be done at the expense of the settled estate.

FARWELL, J.—In my opinion the 10,000*l.* must bear its own share of the duty. On the construction of this settlement the settlor has assigned, in my opinion, a specific portion of the mortgage debt. He has not settled the 10,000*l.* as a sum in cash, charged upon or to be raised out of the larger sum of 15,000*l.*; but has in effect assigned 10,000*l.* as part of the 15,000*l.* He has, in other words, assigned two-thirds of the mortgage debt to which he was entitled. That seems to me to be, upon the construction, the true view. That being so, it is assigned in terms as a reversion expectant on the death of his father. Had it been an assignment by the settlor of the whole sum to the reversion of which he was entitled, it is obvious that the duty would be borne by the assignee. It has been argued that the covenant for further assurance throws the burden of the legal duty on the settlor. In my opinion that is not so. I do not myself see that that particular covenant has any bearing at all on the present case. I do not think that legacy duty can be regarded as an incumbrance, properly so called; but, however that may be, the case is clearly distinguishable from Re Jones; Farrington v. Forrester (69 L. T. Rep. 45; (1893) 2 Ch. 461). That was the case of a mortgage on the property assigned, and the court held, on the construction of the particular covenant, that when a man had assigned the moiety of a property for value, without mentioning the existence of a mortgage upon the property, he was bound, under this covenant, to discharge the mortgage out of the unsold moiety. If, however, the assignment had been made subject to the mortgage, it is clear that no such question would have arisen, and when a vendor or settlor assigns a reversionary interest, which is on the face of it a reversion, both parties know that duty will become payable. So much so that I think it has been held, if I remember rightly, that a purchaser is bound to covenant to indemnify his vendor against succession duty. At any rate, there is no sort of deception in the matter. When the assignment is an assignment of a reversion as a reversion, all parties know that it carries a liability for duty with it, and the duty that is payable is legacy duty in proportion to the amount of the legacy. The whole legacy is 15,000*l.*, and it appears to me it would be a distortion of the rights of the parties to cast the whole burden in respect of the 15,000*l.* on the part of it retained by the settlor, and I can find no ground for doing so. The result is that the 10,000*l.* must bear its own share of the legacy duty payable. The costs will follow the same rule, including the costs of these proceedings.

STEVENS v. KING. (a)

Will—Legacy—Intended satisfaction of an obligation—Legatee predeceasing testatrix—Lapse.

Where a testatrix, in exercise of a power of appointment, appointed a sum to her brother in satisfaction of certain over-payments received by her out of trust funds of which he was the sole trustee, it was held that, as the appointment was made with the intention of performing a moral obligation and not of conferring a bounty, the gift did not lapse through the testatrix being predeceased by her brother.

Williamson v. Naylor (1838, 3 Y. & C. Ez. 208) followed.

PETITION.

Under the will of Thomas John King, dated the 19th Feb. 1845, Charlotte Wilson, formerly Charlotte King, became entitled, in the events which happened, to an equal third share of the proceeds of sale of the testator's residuary real and personal estate.

The testator died on the 26th March 1859, and the defendant William King, who has since died, was the sole trustee and executor of his will.

By the terms of a deed of arrangement of the 23rd April 1860, which was made between the persons beneficially entitled under the testator's will and William King as sole trustee and executor, it was agreed that William King should hold certain of the freehold and copyhold estate of the testator upon trust to sell the same and to stand possessed of the proceeds thereof as to two-thirds for his two sisters, one of whom was Charlotte Wilson, and as to the remaining third part for himself.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 26th April 1860, which was made upon the marriage of Charlotte Wilson with Charles Stuart, Charlotte Wilson assigned her third share under the deed of arrangement of the 23rd April 1860 to William King and John Stuart upon the usual trusts as to investment and then upon trust to pay the income arising therefrom to herself during her life for her sole and separate use. The settlement then provided that the trustees

Immediately after the decease of the said Charlotte Wilson shall out of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities raise and pay the sum of 2000*l.* sterling to Julia Charlotte Wilson (the daughter of the said Charlotte Wilson by her first husband William Wilson) for her sole and separate use independently of any husband with whom she may intermarry, and shall transfer and pay the residue of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the interests, dividends, and the annual produce thereof, unto such person or persons in such shares or proportions and in such manner as the said Charlotte Wilson shall notwithstanding her now intended or any future coverture by her last will direct or appoint, and in default of such appointment shall pay the income of the trust moneys unto the said Charles Stuart if he be then living and his assigns during his life for his and their own use and benefit.

And from and after the death of Charles Stuart the trustees William King and John Stuart were directed to stand possessed of the trust funds upon the usual trusts for the children of the marriage, and then, subject to these trusts, in trust for Julia Charlotte Wilson for her sole and separate use.

Charles Stuart died on the 12th May 1861, and there was no issue from the marriage.

On the 20th Aug. 1866, upon the occasion of her marriage with Herbert Lidington, Julia Charlotte Wilson, the daughter of Charlotte Wilson, settled the 2000*l.* which passed to her under the above settlement of the 26th April 1860.

On the 21st June 1873 Charlotte Stuart and Julia Charlotte Lidington mortgaged the trust premises settled by the deed of the 26th April 1860 to John Madocks to secure 500*l.*, and it was declared that the 500*l.* "should be deemed to be the proper debt of the said Charlotte Stuart, her heirs, executors, and administrators."

On the 6th Oct. 1874 Charlotte Stuart married John Blinks.

The present suit was commenced in the year 1872 for the execution of the trusts of the deed of arrangement of the 23rd April 1860. An order was made at the original hearing for a sale of the property subject to the trusts of that deed, and on further consideration an order was made, dated the 8th Aug. 1877, by which it was ordered that Charlotte Blinks' share in the funds should be carried to a separate account entitled "Share of Charlotte Blinks settled by indenture dated the 26th April 1860."

It appeared that Charlotte Blinks had from time to time received over-payments in respect of her interest in the trust funds, and the court declared by the same order that Charlotte Blinks by her counsel had admitted that the sum of 168*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* appearing by the chief clerk's certificate to have been paid to her by the defendant William King in excess of her share of the income of the said trust estate and the sum of 115*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* mentioned in the same certificate constituted an aggregate debt of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* then due and owing from her to the defendant William King, for the payment whereof her separate estate was liable.

The order then declared that Charlotte Blinks had undertaken by her counsel to execute in favour of the defendant a valid appointment by will STEVENS v. KING.

[CHAN. DIV.]

(subject only to the indenture of the 21st June 1873 above mentioned for securing 500*l.* and interest thereon to John Madocks) of a sum of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* out of the property subject to the power of appointment given to her under the marriage settlement of the 26th April 1860; and that she had also undertaken that she would not thereafter exercise her power of appointment so as in any way to prejudice or affect the appointment in the defendant's favour. Liberty to apply with reference to the enforcement of this undertaking was reserved by the order to the defendant William King. Directions as to payment of interest on the sum of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* out of the interest arising from the fund in court were also given, but no such payments were ever in fact received by William King in his lifetime.

William King died on the 10th Jan. 1889, having appointed his daughter Alice Jane King his sole legatee and executrix. No new trustees of the settlement of the 26th April 1860 were ever appointed.

On the 14th Sept. 1877 Charlotte Blinks duly made her will in the following terms, so far as material:

I Charlotte Blinks . . . do hereby in exercise of the power given to me by the settlement executed by me on my marriage with the late Charles Stuart bearing date on or about the 26th day of April 1860 and in compliance with the order on further consideration of the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, in the suit of Stevens v. King bearing date the 6th day of August 1877 appoint and bequeath to my brother William King the several sums of 168*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* and 115*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.*, making together the sum of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* And I also appoint and bequeath to John Madocks, formerly of Chertsey in the county of Surrey, but now of Dartmouth in the county of Devon, the sum of 500*l.* sterling and also such a sum as shall be equivalent to the interest owing on a certain mortgage security bearing the date 21st day of June 1873 for securing the sum of 500*l.* borrowed by me of him. And I appoint my daughter Julia Charlotte Lidington sole executrix of this my will.

Charlotte Blinks died on the 4th Dec. 1903, and probate of her will was duly taken out by the petitioner Julia Charlotte Lidington.

By an indenture dated the 17th Feb. 1904 Robert Otteswell Chambers was appointed a trustee of the settlement of the 20th Aug. 1866 in place of William King, deceased.

The question now arose whether the bequest of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* to William King contained in the will of Charlotte Blinks lapsed upon his pre-deceasing her.

Vaughan Hawkins for the petition.—I submit that the legacy clearly lapses. The cases have never gone as far as would be necessary to save the legacy from lapsing in such a case as this. Nor can it be said that the testatrix's will sufficed to make the fund dealt with part of her assets:

Re Boyd; Kelly v. Boyd, 77 L. T. Rep. 76; (1897) 2 Ch. 232, 235.

The cases show that the testatrix must have so dealt with the funds as to blend them with her own property:

Re Marten; Shaw v. Marten, 85 L. T. Rep. 704; (1902) 1 Ch. 314.

Hart for Miss Alice Jane King.—There is no need to consider whether the funds have been made assets, if, as I submit, there has been no lapse. The gift is in compliance with the order on further consideration that is in fulfilment of, any rate, a moral obligation. I cannot find a case of an appointment by a testator where this question of lapse has been considered, but I submit that it makes no difference in principle whether the gift is by exercise of a power of appointment or out of the testator's own property. The cases go on the principle that where there is a moral obligation and a bequest to a person is clearly attributable to a desire to satisfy it, there is no gift of a personal nature depending on the particular person outliving the testator, but a mere intention to meet a liability. That intention is equally fulfilled whether the money is received by the person named in the will or by his estate:

Williamson v. Naylor, 1838, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 208;

Philips v. Philips, 1844, 3 Ha. 281, 300;

Re Sowerby's Trusts, 1856, 2 K. & J. 630.

The last case was affirmed on appeal under the name of Turner v. Martin (1857, 7 De G. M. & G. 429).

Vaughan Hawkins in reply.

FARWELL, J. stated the facts, and, after reading the order made upon further consideration, continued:—Charlotte Blinks having given this undertaking, duly made her will. [His Lordship then read the bequest to William King.] She then appointed a sum of 500*l.* to John Madocks, which was also a debt of her separate estate, and appointed her daughter Julia Charlotte Wilson her executrix. William King predeceased the testatrix, and it is therefore said that the bequest to him lapsed. Now, the reason that a legacy lapses upon the death of the legatee before the testator is that the whole object of the testator in making the bequest is presumed to have failed through the death of the person whom he intended to benefit. Whether the object of the legacy has failed must depend, therefore, upon the testator's intention in making the gift; and in each case the question of lapse becomes a question of fact, or rather a question partly of fact and partly of construction. It is settled by Williamson v. Naylor (1838, 3 Y. & C. Ex. 208), Philips v. Philips (1844, 3 Ha. 281), and Re Sowerby's Trusts (1856, 2 K. & J. 630) that where the court finds that by a bequest a testator has intended to satisfy a moral duty, whether it be legally binding or not, and not to perform an act of bounty, the bequest does not lapse through the death of the legatee before the testator, provided that the moral duty continues. Here there has been no desire to confer a benefit, but an intention to discharge an obligation; and, notwithstanding the arguments of the plaintiffs' counsel, I am satisfied that, if William King had been paid the whole of the sum of 284*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* during the testatrix's life, he could not have retained the amount appointed to him by her will if he had survived her. The appointment was not in fact due to a desire on the part of the testatrix to perform an act of bounty, but to her intention to discharge a liability, and consequently there is no lapse. The fact that the testatrix was a married woman, that she dealt with no property of her own, but only with property over which she had a power of appointment, and that in spite of this she appointed an executrix; the fact, too, that the only other exercise of her power of appointment was for the purpose of paying off a mortgage debt for which she was personally liable, all afford, in my opinion, additional evidence that her intention was solely to perform a duty. And that is an intention which is equally fulfilled by payment to William King or his estate. Except to discharge this obligation and to discover the persons to whom that obligation should then be due, there could have been no possible reason for the appointment of an executrix. The result is that there is no lapse in the present case, and that the amount appointed must be paid to the personal representatives of William King. The costs will be paid out of the fund subject to the testatrix's power of appointment.

LEA v. THURSBY. (a)

Lease—Merger—Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Viet. c. 52), s. 55—Res judicata.

By an indenture of lease dated the 20th Aug. 1880 W. demised certain property to M. for a term of ninety-five years at the rent of 222*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* By a mortgage dated the 24th June 1881 M. demised the term, less three days, at a peppercorn rent to H. to secure 2000*l.* and further advances. Eight thousand pounds was now due on the security. M. procured a conveyance of the fee on the 27th March 1882, and in 1885 sold to F., the conveyance being expressed to be subject to the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880. In July 1902 M. became bankrupt, his trustee disclaimed the lease, and on the 5th May 1903 an order was made by the registrar of the Warwick County Court that H.'s representatives should be excluded from all interest in the lease, and that the same should be vested in a purchaser from F., unless H.'s representatives declared their option to accept a vesting order of the lease. H.'s representatives did not appeal from the order in bankruptcy, but now asked (1) a declaration that the term created by the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880, subject to the subterm created by the mortgage of the 24th June 1881, became merged and extinguished on the conveyance of the fee to M.; and (2) a declaration that H.'s representatives were entitled to the premises for the residue of the term created by the mortgage, subject only to a peppercorn rent and the equity of redemption.

Held, that the County Court judge had full jurisdiction to determine the question of merger, and that, as H.'s representatives had not appealed from the registrar's decision, they were estopped by the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, and could not have the question tried over again.

Held, also, that, even if there were no estoppel, there was no merger, as it was for the benefit of M. and his intention to keep the term subsisting.

ACTION.

By an indenture dated the 20th Aug. 1880, and made between T. Worthington of the one part and R. H. Milward of the other part, Highfield House was demised to Milward for the term of ninety-five years from the 25th March 1880, at a yearly rent of 222*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.*

On the 24th June 1881 Milward mortgaged the same premises by way of sub-demise to James Horsfall for the whole term of the lease, less the last three days thereof, at a peppercorn rent to secure 2000*l.* and further advances. From time to time further advances were made, bringing the total amount advanced up to 8000*l.*

James Horsfall died on the 17th Oct. 1887, and the plaintiffs were the present trustees of his will.

On the 27th March 1882 the reversion in fee of the premises comprised in three leases, including the lease in question, was conveyed to Milward in consideration of 8272*l.* The conveyance was expressed to be subject to and with the benefit of the leases.

In 1885 Milward sold the premises comprised in the three leases to W. E. J. B. Farnham, subject to and with the benefit of the leases and also subject to an agreement that Farnham should grant to him a lease of the same premises for a term of 500 years at a yearly rent of 300*l.* On the same day a lease on these terms was granted by Farnham to Milward.

Subsequent dealings took place with the property, and ultimately it was purchased by A. H. Thursby for 6000*l.*

In July 1902 Milward was adjudicated a bankrupt, and Philip Bates was appointed trustee of his estate.

On the 18th Oct. 1902 Bates served on Thursby and the plaintiffs a notice of his intention to disclaim the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880. No notice of this was taken by either Thursby or the plaintiffs.

On the 21st Nov. 1902 Bates disclaimed the lease. It was not disputed that if the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 was then a subsisting lease the trustee was entitled to disclaim it. The plaintiffs, however, alleged that the lease had then become merged in the freehold, and that the disclaimer was therefore inoperative.

On the 23rd Dec. 1902 Thursby served a notice of motion in bankruptcy on the plaintiffs for an order that unless the plaintiffs elected to have the property comprised in the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 vested in them, subject to the rent, covenants, and conditions contained in that lease and to the same liabilities and obligations as the bankrupt was subject to under the lease at the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, they should be excluded from all interest in the property, and that it should be delivered to and vested in the applicant.

On the 5th May 1903 an order was made in bankruptcy by the registrar of the County Court of Warwickshire that the plaintiffs should be excluded from all interest in the lease and that the same should be Thursby unless the plaintiffs should declare their option to accept a vesting order of the same, which they did not do. The plaintiffs did not appeal from the order in bankruptcy.

The plaintiffs, who were the trustees of the will of James Horsfall, deceased, asked: (1) a declaration that the full term created by the lease dated the 20th Aug. 1880, subject to the sub-term created by the mortgage of the 24th June 1881, became merged and extinguished on the conveyance of the fee simple in the demised premises to Milward, the lessee; and (2) a declaration that the plaintiffs were legally entitled to the premises comprised in the lease for the residue of the term created by the mortgage, subject only to the nominal rent reserved by the mortgage and to the equity of redemption subsisting thereunder.

A motion to dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court had been dismissed, both by Swinfen Eady, J. (89 L. T. Rep. 744) and the Court of Appeal (90 L. T. Rep. 265).

Micklem, K.C. and Druce for the plaintiffs.—The order in the Birmingham County Court had no effect if the lease had merged, and the plaintiffs are not prejudiced by the order if the lease is not subsisting. When Milward took a conveyance of the fee in 1882 the lease merged. The County Court judge had no jurisdiction to determine the question.

Haldane, K.O. and Wootten for the defendant.—The County Court judge had full jurisdiction to decide the question of merger, and it was fully argued before him. The case stood over until the case Capital and Counties Bank v. Rhodes (88 L. T. Rep. 255; (1903) 1 Ch. 631) had been reported. After this had been done, the registrar decided that there was no merger. The registrar was exercising a judicial discretion:

Re Britton, 61 L. T. Rep. 52;

Re Smith; Ex parte Hepburn, 63 L. T. Rep. 621; 25 Q. B. Div. 536.

As the plaintiffs did not appeal, they are estopped from again raising the question.

Micklem, K.C. replied.

April 29.—SWINFEN EADY, J.—It is clear that if the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 was a subsisting lease and had not been merged or extinguished at the date of the bankruptcy, the defendant Thursby was entitled to apply to the Bankruptcy Court for such an order. This right is conferred by sect. 55 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883. It has been decided that, under this section, the landlord may apply that the mortgages shall take a vesting order or be excluded from all interest in the disclaimed property: (Re Finley; Ex parte Clothworkers' Company, 60 L. T. Rep. 134; 21 Q. B. Div. 475; see also Re Baker; Ex parte Lupton, 85 L. T. Rep. 33; (1901) 2 K. B. 628). The court to which this application was made was the only court having jurisdiction in the matter—namely, the Birmingham County Court, in which the bankruptcy proceedings against Milward were then pending. Upon the hearing of this application the question arose whether the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 was subsisting or had been merged. Upon the evidence before me it appears that the court deemed it expedient or necessary to decide that question for the purpose of doing complete justice. The right of the applicant Thursby to apply for and obtain a vesting order (assuming always that the lease was subsisting at the date of the bankruptcy) was a right or claim arising out of the bankruptcy of Milward and the subsequent disclaimer by the trustee, and could only have been enforced by him in the Bankruptcy Court, and certainly could not, before the passing of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, have been enforced by action in the High Court within the proviso in sect. 102, sub-sect. 1, of the Bankruptcy Act 1883, and the consent of all parties to the County Court exercising jurisdiction was not necessary. In my opinion, the County Court in bankruptcy had full jurisdiction under sect. 102 of the Bankruptcy Act 1883 to decide upon the claim of Thursby and all questions of law or fact arising thereon, including the question whether the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 was subsisting or had been merged by the conveyance in fee of the 27th March 1882. What took place before the registrar was this. There was first a preliminary discussion, upon the effect of which the parties are not agreed. The plaintiffs contend that the question was raised as to the jurisdiction of the registrar to decide the question of merger; the recollection of the defendant Thursby's counsel, Mr. Wootten—who was present before the registrar—is that the only question raised was whether the registrar had jurisdiction to dispose of Thursby's application or whether it should be adjourned to the judge. I believe that Mr. Wootten's recollection is the more accurate, and this is quite consistent with the evidence given by the plaintiffs' solicitor, Mr. Tom Hadley, of what he heard stated by his counsel to the registrar. The point, however, is not of importance, as the defendant Thursby does not rely on any consent as giving jurisdiction to the County Court. The registrar stated that he certainly had jurisdiction, and proceeded to deal with the matter. It is common ground between the parties that the question whether there had been a merger of the lease or whether it was subsisting at the date of the petition was fully and elaborately argued before the registrar. The first hearing was on the 30th Jan. 1903; and upon its being represented to the registrar that the case then pending and since decided and reported—namely, Capital and Counties Bank v. Rhodes (ubi sup.)—would probably affect the matter under consideration, he adjourned the further hearing until that case had been decided. After that case had been decided and reported, the adjourned hearing of the defendant Thursby's application took place—namely, on the 5th May 1903; and the registrar then made the order of that date. According to Mr. Wootten's recollection, the registrar said: "I do not think there was a merger—I shall make the order in the terms of the notice of motion." The defendant Thursby then applied for and obtained an order for the payment of the costs of the application by the present plaintiffs, who had throughout resisted the motion. Having regard to sect. 13 of the Bankruptcy Act 1890, and to the cases of Re Britton (ubi sup.) and Re Smith; Ex parte Hepburn (ubi sup.), it seems clear that the Court of Bankruptcy is exercising a judicial discretion, and not merely acting ministerially in dealing with applications for vesting orders. The Bankruptcy Court has so dealt with the defendant Thursby's application on its merits and has made an order, and has, in fact, decided that the lease has not merged. The plaintiffs deliberately determined not to appeal from this decision; and in my judgment they are estopped by the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, and cannot have the merits tried over again in this court. I may add that even if the plaintiffs were entitled to have the matter decided again on the merits, my judgment would be that the lease was subsisting at the date of the bankruptcy petition and had not merged in the inheritance. The law as to merger is summed up by Cozens-Hardy, L.J. in Capital and Counties Bank v. Rhodes (1903) 1 Ch. 631, at pp. 652-653). He says: "The courts of equity . . . had regard to the intention of the parties, and, in the absence of any direct evidence of intention, they presumed that merger was not intended, if it was to the interest of the party, or only consistent with the duty of the party, that merger should not take place. . . . A court of equity had regard to the intention of the parties, to the duty of the parties, and to the contract of the parties, in determining whether a term was to be treated as merged in the freehold." Since the Judicature Act, if there would have been no merger in equity, there is now no merger at law. In my opinion it was for the benefit of Milward that the term should not merge upon the conveyance of the freehold reversion. Such a merger would have fettered his own dealing with the property he had just bought. If there was no merger he could sell it, mortgage it, or otherwise deal with it as he pleased without paying off the mortgagee of the term and without his concurrence. Seeing that the timber and mines were reserved to the reversioners when the lease of the 20th Aug. 1880 was granted, he could have dealt with those items without the concurrence of the mortgagee of the term. Again, on the very date on which he obtained a conveyance of the reversion—the 27th March 1882—he signed a further charge indorsed on the mortgage of the term for 2000*l.*, bringing up the whole loan on the term to 8000*l.* There is no reference to the freehold reversion, or to the term being merged in the inheritance, but by further charging the term he indicated an intention of keeping it subsisting. The subsequent dealings by Milward with the property clearly show that he then treated the term as still subsisting, and the parties dealt with him on the footing that it was subsisting. The conveyance by Milward to Farnham of the 1st Aug. 1885 is a conveyance of the reversion expressly subject to and with the benefit of the term created by the deed of the 20th Aug. 1880. The conclusion I have come to is that it was for the benefit of Milward, and it was the intention of Milward that the term should be kept alive. The result is that the plaintiffs' claim fails and substantial justice is done between the parties. The plaintiffs advanced 8000*l.* on a leasehold interest, which, it now appears, is of no value, and, having declined to accept the lease subject to rent and covenants, they now have no security for their money. But they could have had, if they had wished, the whole estate and interest of the bankrupt in the lease. They do not gain the windfall which they hoped had fallen to their lot. On the other hand, the defendant Thursby, who bought the freehold for 6000*l.*, free from incumbrance, does not suffer the injustice of having a first mortgage for 8000*l.* charged upon the premises in priority to his interest. The action is dismissed with costs.

HARRIS v. FLOWER AND SONS. (a)

Right of way — Abandonment — Non-user — Excessive user.

In 1891 certain premises were conveyed to M., together with a right of way over land coloured yellow on the plan on the deed. The land coloured yellow was subsequently conveyed to J., who covenanted to permit the use of the right of way. M. owned other adjoining premises, and erected assembly rooms partly on the land to which there was a right of way and partly on the adjoining premises. The licensing magistrates objected to a gateway opening on the right of way, but in 1892 a wall was built with an opening for a gateway 6ft. 9in. wide, this opening being temporarily closed with sliding scaffold boards. In 1894 the hereditaments formerly belonging to M. were sold to F., together with the right of way, and in December of that year the scaffold boards were removed to enable building material to be taken along the right of way. In 1896 a further application to the magistrates to allow gates to be placed at the gateway was refused, and the magistrates insisted on the gateway being bricked up. In 1898 the premises, together with the right of way, were conveyed to G. M. In 1903 an opening was made in the wall and a gate 4ft. 4in. wide placed there, and materials for altering the premises were conveyed along the right of way. The only access to the building, at the rear of the assembly rooms, was over the right of way.

The present owners of the land coloured yellow claimed that the right of way had been abandoned, or, if not, as it was used to buildings not wholly erected on the dominant tenement, that the user was excessive. They brought an action against G. M. and his mortgagees claiming to restrain the use of the right of way.

Held, (1) that there had been no abandonment of the right of way; (2) that the user was bonâ fide, although a portion of the building extended beyond the boundary of the land entitled to the right of way; and (3) that the mortgagees were not necessary or proper parties to the action.

ACTION.

Both the plaintiff and the defendants derived title from the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway on the occasion of that company's selling certain surplus lands in 1891. The conveyance to the defendants' predecessor in title, William Murrin, was dated the 1st July 1891; it comprised certain freehold hereditaments then known as No. 80, Royal-hill, Greenwich, coloured pink on the plan on that deed, together with a right of way over certain land coloured yellow and brown on that deed. The grant of the right of way was in the following terms:

The company do hereby grant unto the said William Murrin, his heirs and assigns, full and free right and liberty, in common with the owner and occupier for the time being of the messuages and hereditaments known as No. 90, Royal-hill, aforesaid, of ingress, egress, and regress, passage, and way, into and upon the said hereditaments and premises hereby conveyed or intended so to be, from a certain street called Prior-street, and situate in the parish of Greenwich aforesaid, over and upon certain lands, hereditaments, and premises, more particularly delineated and described in the said plan drawn in the margin of these presents and therein coloured yellow and brown, but so, nevertheless, as not to obstruct or interfere with the occupation or enjoyment of the said messuages and hereditaments, No. 90, Royal-hill, aforesaid.

The land coloured yellow was subsequently—namely, on the 13th July 1891—conveyed to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, John Jennings; and the conveyance contained a covenant by him for himself, his heirs and assigns, that he would at all times allow the company, their successors and assigns, and the owner and occupier for the time being of the messuage and hereditaments known as No. 80, Royal-hill, full and free right and liberty of ingress, egress, regress, passage, and way over and upon the yellow land. The land coloured brown was retained by the company. The right of way here in dispute was over the yellow land. When William Murrin purchased No. 80, Royal-hill, in 1891, he was already the owner of the Prince Albert, No. 72, Royal-hill, including certain land at the rear, and this land in the rear (which was coloured blue on the conveyance hereinafter referred to of the 13th Nov. 1894) adjoined at the rear the rear portion of No. 80, Royal-hill; but Nos. 72 and 80 were separated by intervening houses on the frontage to Royal-hill. William Murrin, after buying No. 80, determined to build certain assembly rooms at the back of the Prince Albert, partly on the pink land (which formed part of No. 80) and partly on the blue land (which formed part of No. 72). He submitted plans to the licensing magistrates, which had been prepared by Mr. Henry Roberts, an architect and surveyor of Lewisham, and these plans showed a proposed gateway in the side wall of the premises, leading from the back of the house No. 80 to the yellow land and thence to Prior-street, thus giving the premises a back entrance. The magistrates attended and viewed the premises on the 21st July 1891, and were attended by Mr. Henry Roberts. They objected to the proposed gateway and said that they could not allow any opening in the wall, leading from the licensed premises to another street. Mr. Roberts tried to obtain permission for a gate for coals and dust, but the magistrates said, "No; not even for private purposes, lest it might be used by the public." The plan was then altered so as to omit the proposed gateway, and was passed by the magistrates and initialled by the chairman on the 25th Aug. 1891. The new buildings were commenced and proceeded with; but monetary difficulties arose, and the works were stopped in Aug. 1892. At this date the roof was on, and the building partly plastered; but the cross-wall (in which Murrin had wished to leave a gateway) was not built. The materials for the new building had been brought along the right of way. An agreement, dated the 20th April 1892, was entered into between the parties relating to this matter; but as it was expressed to be "without prejudice to the respective rights of the said parties over the said road, as per conditions of sale under which the said parties hold their land," nothing turned on it. William Murrin then conveyed his premises to Messrs. Parker and Thomas; and in March 1894 they instructed Mr. G. G. Pye to prepare plans for the completion of the buildings—that was, the assembly rooms—and the reconstruction of the interior of the Prince Albert. The contract was signed in June 1894, and the works completed in Nov. 1894. The cross-wall was built, and, notwithstanding the view taken by the licensing magistrates, an opening was left for a gateway 6ft. 9in. wide, as the owners were desirous of retaining this back entrance, if it could be managed. The opening so left in the brickwork was temporarily closed by means of some sliding scaffold boards. On the 10th Nov. 1894 Messrs. Parker and Thomas sold and conveyed to Mrs. Flight the house, No. 80, Royal-hill, with a portion of the pink land at the rear, but not extending to the railway wall, and granted her a right of way out at the back to Prior-street, but in common with the owner and occupier for the time being of the messuage known as the Prince Albert. The plan on that conveyance showed the Prince Albert as including the assembly rooms built at the rear. On the 13th Nov. 1894 Messrs. Parker and Thomas conveyed to the London and Manchester Industrial Assurance Company Limited the Prince Albert, including the completed assembly rooms, together with a right of ingress, egress, and regress over the way in the rear to and from Prior-street. In Dec. 1894 the sliding boards closing the opening in the wall were removed to enable Mr. Comber, the builder, to take away some building plant through the opening, and this was afterwards closed again by replacing the sliding boards. In July 1896 Mr. G. G. Pye, on the instructions of the freeholders of the Prince Albert, made a further attempt to obtain the sanction of the magistrates to an entrance at the rear. He prepared a plan showing an intended pair of gates, to be placed where the sliding boards still were. He attended before the magistrates and supported the application on the 17th July 1896, but the application was refused; and, moreover, the magistrates then required that the opening in the wall should be bricked up; and this was done. Swinfen Eady, J. held that down to this date William Murrin and the persons deriving title through him not only had not shown any intention of abandoning their right of way, but had evinced their determination to retain it. On the 16th Feb. 1898 the Prince Albert, including both the pink and the blue land, was conveyed to the defendant George Robert Murrell, and the conveyance contained an express grant of ingress, egress, and regress into and upon the premises coloured pink on the plan from and to Prior-street. In the summer of 1898 the defendant Murrell again altered the Prince Albert, as shown by a plan marked "W.E.S. 1." All openings between the front portion and the rear portion of the Prince Albert were closed with brickwork, both on the ground floor and the first floor, and all communication between the front portion and the rear portion entirely severed, and the licence confined to the front portion. An opening was made in the cross-wall in or about June 1903 and a gate about 4ft. 4in. wide placed there, and all the materials for the alteration were brought along the right of way and through that gate. At the present time the only access to the building at the rear of the Prince Albert was along the right of way. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had lost the right of way by abandonment, and asked that they should be restrained from using the right of way as a means of access to a factory and premises which at one time formed part of the licensed premises known as the Prince Albert.

Mickletham, K.C. and Johnston Edwards for the plaintiff.—Although mere non-user from 1894 to 1903 would not be enough to prove abandonment, here something was done preventing the enjoyment of the easement, and indicating to other people that the easement had been abandoned.

HARRIS v. FLOWER AND SONS.

[CHAN. DIV.]

[SWINFEN EADY, J.—Merely blocking up temporarily is not an abandonment. If there was a right of way under an archway, it might be necessary to block the right of way, to rebuild the archway.] Erecting a blank wall is an abandonment of a right to ancient light :

Moore v. Rawson, 3 B. & C. 332.

It must also be an abandonment of a right of way. There is evidence of an intention to abandon or renounce the right of way :

Reg. v. Chorley, 12 Q. B. 513, pp. 518, 519.

In any event the right of way has been used excessively, and imposes a greater burden on the plaintiff's land than is imposed by the conveyance of the 1st July 1891. As it is practically impossible to separate the lawful from the excessive user, the right of way cannot be used at all.

Theobald, K.C. and Hodge for the mortgagees. —The mortgagees are not necessary or proper parties to the action. They are not parties to the contract under which the works are executed; all they have done is to advance money to Murrell to enable him to effect alterations in the premises. They have never claimed any right of way over the land in question.

Eve, K.C. and Martelli for the defendant Murrell.—There has been no abandonment of the right of way; there has been mere non-user for a short time to comply with the wishes of the licensing magistrates. The grant of a private way to a particular place cannot be restricted to the use required at the time of the grant :

Finch v. Great Western Railway Company, 41 L. T. Rep. 731; 5 Ex. Div. 254 :

United Land Company v. Great Eastern Railway Company, 33 L. T. Rep. 292; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 586;

Cur. adv. vult.

May 7.—SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the facts, said:—Upon these facts the plaintiff, who in 1898 purchased Primrose Villa, which is built upon part of the land comprised in the conveyance to John Jennings of the 13th July 1891, contends that the defendant Murrell and Messrs. Flower and Sons, his mortgagees, or their predecessors in title, have abandoned the right of way granted by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company by the deed of the 1st July 1891. It is necessary to consider whether there has been any intention to abandon or renounce the right by William Murrin or any person claiming through him. As was said by Lord Denman, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Chorley (12 Q. B., at p. 519), it is not so much the duration of the cesser to use an easement as the nature of the act done by the grantee of the easement and the intention which it indicates which are material for the consideration of the jury. Again, in the case in the Privy Council of James v. Stevenson (68 L. T. Rep. 539; (1893) A. C. 162), Sir Edward Fry said (at p. 167) that whether a right of way had been abandoned or not was a question of intention, to be decided upon the facts of each particular case. In the present case I am clearly of opinion that William Murrin and his successors in title, owners of the pink lands, have never abandoned and never had the slightest intention of abandoning any portion of the right of way granted by the deed of the 1st July 1891. On the contrary, they have persevered in an attempt to induce the magistrates to allow them to use the back entrance even when the premises were licensed, and they only bricked up the wall when absolutely required to do so by the magistrates, reopening it again directly the rear portion was structurally separated from the licensed premises. The cross-wall was not even built at the extremity of the defendants' land, but a strip of the defendants' land intervened between the wall and the right of way, and the only access to this strip was over the right of way. The cesser of the user, from July 1896 to June 1903, which was merely to comply with the imperative requirements of the magistrates, has been fully explained by the evidence, and was without any intention whatever of abandoning the easement. The easement has not, in my judgment, been abandoned. It was then urged that the defendants' predecessors, by building the assembly rooms at the back of the Prince Albert and so adding them on to licensed premises, had made such a substantial alteration in the original object of the right of way as to extinguish the easement; also that, as the rear building (now proposed to be used as a factory) has been erected partly on the pink land and partly on the blue, the user of the right of way as a means of access to the factory would be excessive, and would constitute a greater burden than is imposed on the land of the plaintiff by the indenture of the 1st July 1891, and an injunction was claimed to restrain the user of the right of way as a passage to the factory or any part of it. The case of Finch v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) established that where there is an express grant of a private right of way to a particular place, to the unrestricted use of which the grantee of the right of way is entitled, the grant is not to be restricted to access to the land for purposes for which access would be required at the time of the grant. This case followed the decisions of the Court of Appeal in United Land Company v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) and Newcomen v. Coulson (ubi sup.). In the former case Mellish, L.J. stated that when a right of way is created by grant it must depend on the proper construction of the grant whether the right of way is to be used for all purposes, or for only limited purposes, and that if there is no limit in the grant the way may be used for all purposes. In the subsequent case of Newcomen v. Coulson (ubi sup.) Malins, V.C. (5 Ch. Div., p. 139) referred to the decision in United Land Company v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) in the following terms: "If there is any other case to refer to, I think it is the case of United Land Company v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.), which I decided originally, and which was affirmed on appeal. What was the case there? There was a piece of land which, at the time of the grant of right of way, was used for agricultural purposes, and which it was in the last degree improbable would ever be used for any other purpose, because it did not at that time seem to be adapted for any other purpose. But in progress of time it was found expedient to build on that land. There was a right of way over a railway, and this argument was again used, that the right of way was only a right of way for the purpose for which the land was used at the time the right of way was granted. I took a wider view of the case. I decided it meant a right of way for all purposes for which the land could be lawfully used in all time, and my decision on that subject was affirmed on appeal." The Vice-Chancellor then proceeded to deal with the way in dispute in Newcomen v. Coulson (ubi sup.), which was a right of way set out under an inclosure award, and held that it was a right of way over those lands for all purposes to which it could be applied—a right of way to be used in the most beneficial manner in which such right of way could be used for the time being. This decision was affirmed on appeal. In accordance with these decisions I determine that the right of way granted in general terms to the defendants' predecessors in title has not been extinguished by the alterations made in the dominant tenement. In the present case about two third parts of the factory, including the entrance doorway, stand upon the pink land, and the remaining third is upon the blue land, and in my opinion the defendants cannot be restrained from using the right of way as a means of access, and indeed the only means of access, to the factory, because having entered by the doorway they may pass to another portion of the building erected on the blue land. They are using the right of way bona fide for the purpose of access to the pink land and to the building thereon, and none the less so because a portion of the building extends beyond the boundary of the pink land. This fact distinguishes the present case from Skull v. Glenister (9 L. T. Rep. 763; 16 C. B. N. S. 81), which was observed upon by Mr. Justice Stephen in Finch v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.). The result is that the action fails and must be dismissed with costs. I may add that in any case the defendants Flower and Sons were not necessary or proper parties to the action. They are mortgagees of Murrell, but they have not entered into possession. They are not any parties to the contract under which the work was executed of structurally separating the back portion of the building from the front portion and bringing the building materials along the way; they only advanced the money to Murrell to enable him to complete the alterations, and I entirely accept and believe Mr. Potheary's statement that he did not tell Mr. Hoare or lead him to believe that he was claiming any right of way on behalf of Messrs. Flower and Sons; he said that Messrs. Flower and Sons were only mortgagees, and he produced and discussed the draft conveyance to Mr. Murrell dated the 16th Feb. 1898, and said that Murrell had a right of way over the land in question. Mr. Potheary's clerk at the previous interview seems to have said that Murrell was a man of straw, and this probably explains the reason why the plaintiff determined to make Messrs. Flower and Sons defendants as well as Mr. Murrell.

TOUGH (app.) v. HOPKINS (resp.). (a) Metropolis — Smoke from tug — Nuisance — "Chimney" — Prohibition order — Specifying works—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 5 (4) (5), 23, 24.

The funnel of a tug plying to and fro in the river Thames, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority of London, is a "chimney" within sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

If a court of summary jurisdiction makes a prohibition order under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, such order need not specify the works to be done by the person against whom the order is made if in the opinion of the court no works could be done to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 for that on the 24th Aug. 1903, on the Thames and within the port of London, upon a certain vessel—to wit, the steamship Richmond—the following nuisance existed—namely, a chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance—and that the appellant, being the owner of such vessel, had made default in complying with a notice served under such section.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted by the appellant:

He was then the owner of a steam-tug known as the Richmond.

On the 25th April 1903 a notice was served upon him at the instance of the port sanitary authority of London, a copy whereof is set out below.

On the 24th Aug. 1903 the steam-tug was towing six barges, and was proceeding from below the Custom House to Southwark Bridge and beyond, within the jurisdiction of the port sanitary authority, and while the tug was proceeding between the Custom House and Southwark Bridge there was being sent forth from the funnel thereof dense black smoke for the space of about five minutes in such quantity as to be a nuisance.

The steam-tug was then being navigated by a master, engineer, and crew employed by the appellant, who was not on board, and who had no personal knowledge of such emission of black smoke.

The steam-tug did not stop or lie up at any point of the voyage of the 24th Aug., but was then proceeding to Kingston-on-Thames, where she was in the habit of lying every night. The steam-tug was employed throughout the day in plying for hire as a tug between Woolwich and Kingston-on-Thames.

The engines and boilers on board the steam-tug were of modern construction and of the best known type of marine engines and boilers, and were constructed as to consume as far as possible all the smoke caused therein, having regard to

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

TOUGH (app.) v. HOPKINS (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

the funnel being a short one, and adapted for passing under bridges at high-water level by hinging backwards nearly to deck level.

The appellant had given strict instructions to his servants to prevent, as far as possible, the production of black smoke on the steam-tug, and good Welsh steam coal procured by the appellant was burnt on board, and the furnaces of the tug had been freshly stoked with such coal at about opposite the Custom House on the 24th Aug., and from three to four minutes was not an unreasonable time to allow the fresh fuel to cease emitting black smoke on such a vessel.

The emission of smoke from the funnel of the tug could have been prevented by the fire being kept bright by frequent and careful stoking or by the use of steam coal.

Upon the above facts it was contended by the appellant: (1) that sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 was inapplicable to a steam-tug such as the Richmond while plying to and fro on the river Thames as described above; (2) that the Richmond on the 24th Aug. was not a vessel lying within the district of the port sanitary authority within the meaning of art. 3 of an order of the Local Government Board, dated the 25th March 1892, and made under sect. 112 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891; (3) that if by reason of such order of the Local Government Board the sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 was applicable to a vessel used as the steam-tug was being used on the 24th Aug. 1903, then the proceedings under such section should have been taken against the master of the vessel and not against the appellant; (4) that proceedings in respect of smoke from vessels plying on the river Thames could only be taken under the provisions of sect. 23 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended: (1) that the funnel of the steam-tug was a "chimney" within the meaning of that expression in sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891; (2) that the alleged nuisance arose owing to the appellant not having used anthracite coal in the furnaces of the tug and from the coal that was used having been carelessly and improperly stoked; (3) that the appellant was liable for the acts of his servants and was a person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose; (4) that the magistrate had a discretion as to whether or not he specified on the prohibition order any works to be done by the appellant to prevent the recurrence of the nuisance, and that it was for him to determine whether or not it was desirable to do so.

His attention was called to the case of Weeks v. King (15 Cox C. C. 733; 49 J. P. 704).

The magistrate found as a fact that the funnel of the steam-tug was a chimney within the meaning of sect. 24 of the statute and that black smoke had been sent forth from it in such quantities as to be a nuisance at the place and time and on the day mentioned in the information. He also found as a fact that no works that could be ordered would cure the alleged nuisance, but that it was a question of stoking with proper fuel, and that if a bright fire were kept up by frequent and careful stoking the nuisance could be prevented. He was of opinion that the information had been properly laid under sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 and that the appellant was a person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose, and he overruled the contentions of the appellant and convicted him of the nuisance alleged in the information and made an order upon him prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance.

The appellant, after the magistrate had convicted him as above-mentioned, required him on making the prohibition order against him under sect. 5, sub-sects. 4 and 5, of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, to specify therein the works to be executed by him for the purpose of preventing the recurrence of the nuisance, but the magistrate refused to specify any works in the order, because it was not, in his opinion, desirable to do so, because there was no question of works here involved, but only a question of careful and skilful stoking with proper fuel.

The notice referred to above was as follows:

Take notice that under the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 the port sanitary authority of the port of London, being satisfied of the existence of a nuisance on the above-mentioned vessel, arising from a chimney—to wit, the funnel of the boiler furnace on the said vessel (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance—do hereby require you, within forty-eight hours from the service of this notice, to abate the same, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose, and to do what is necessary for preventing the recurrence of the said nuisance. If you make default in complying with the requisitions of this notice within the time above specified a summons will be issued requiring your attendance before a petty sessional court to answer a complaint which will be made for the purpose of enforcing the abatement of the said nuisance or prohibiting the recurrence thereof, or both, and for recovering the costs and penalties that may be incurred thereby.—Dated 25th April 1903.—JAMES BELL, Town Clerk.

By sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76):

(1) If either—(a) the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served as aforesaid makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof within the time specified, or (b) the nuisance, although abated since the service of the notice is, in the opinion of the sanitary authority, likely to recur on the same premises, the sanitary authority shall make a complaint, and the petty sessional court hearing the complaint may make on such person a summary order (in this Act referred to as a nuisance order). (2) A nuisance order may be an abatement order, a prohibition order, or a closing order, or a combination of such orders. (3) An abatement order may require a person to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order. (4) A prohibition order may prohibit the recurrence of a nuisance. (5) An abatement order or prohibition order shall, if the person on whom the order is made so requires, or the court considers it desirable, specify the works to be executed by such person for the purpose of abating or preventing the recurrence of the nuisance.

And by sect. 23:

(3) Every steam engine and furnace used in the working of any steam vessel on the river Thames either above London Bridge or plying to and fro between London Bridge and any place on the river Thames westward of the Nore light, shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such engine and furnace; and if any such steam engine or furnace is not so constructed, or being so constructed is wilfully or negligently used so that the smoke arising therefrom is not effectually consumed or burnt, the owner or master of such vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and on a second conviction to a fine of 10*l.*, and on every subsequent conviction to a fine of double the amount of the fine imposed on the last preceding conviction.

And by sect. 24:

(a) Any fireplace or furnace which does not, as far as practicable, consume the smoke arising from the combustible used therein and which is used for working engines by steam, or in any mill, factory, dye-house, brewery, bake-house, or gaswork, or in any manufacturing or trade process whatsoever; and (b) any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance shall be nuisances liable to be dealt with summarily under this Act, and the provisions of the Act relating to those nuisances shall apply accordingly: Provided that the court hearing a complaint against a person in respect of a nuisance arising from a fireplace or furnace which does not consume the smoke arising from the combustible used in such fireplace or furnace shall hold that no nuisance is created and dismiss the complaint, if satisfied that such fireplace or furnace is constructed in such manner as to consume, as far as practicable, having regard to the nature of the manufacture or trade, all smoke arising therefrom, and that such fireplace or furnace has been carefully attended to by the person having the charge thereof.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. and Bigham for the appellant.—Sect. 24 does not refer to the funnel of a steamboat on the Thames but merely applies to a chimney in the ordinary sense of the word. A case like the present comes under sect. 23 (3). Further, the order made did not specify the works to be done in order to prevent a recurrence of the nuisance which it should have under sect. 5 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. The mere fact that the powers and duties under sect. 24 of the Act of 1891 are assigned to the port sanitary authority cannot make that section applicable to the funnel of a steam vessel on the Thames.

Danckwerts, K.C. and R. Cunningham Glen for the respondent.—The order assigning to the port sanitary authority the powers of an ordinary sanitary authority under the Act of 1891 provides that any vessel lying within the port sanitary authority shall be liable to their jurisdiction as if it were a house. Sect. 24 deals with a nuisance arising from smoke and sect. 23 deals with the construction of the furnace. They therefore deal with different matters, and sect. 24 applies to a nuisance arising from the smoke of a vessel. With regard to the order made in this case, if no actual works are necessary they need not be specified.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Notwithstanding the very ingenious argument of Mr. Hamilton and the observations which Mr. Bigham has made, I think that this decision was right. I quite agree with them that the order of the Local Government Board of the 25th March 1892 has not increased the responsibility of persons who own tugs in respect of nuisances from tugs or ships. It merely provided that the port sanitary authority was to take such proceedings as could be taken under the Act in respect of "ships, vessels, boats, waters, or persons within their jurisdiction," and it includes sect. 24 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891. Whatever the opinion of the draftsman may have been, the mere inclusion in that order would not increase the responsibility if we were of opinion that sect. 24 could not apply to the chimney or funnel of a steam-tug plying on the Thames. The point has admitted of argument, and I think there is some ground for thinking at the first blush that the reading of sect. 24 would indicate that it was intended to apply to chimneys on land in the ordinary sense of the word, but when we look at the object of the legislation, and certain expressions in sect. 24 itself, I think any such construction would be too narrow. It is, as far as this part of the section is concerned, essentially what may be called a black smoke section—that is to say, it is a section which provides that "any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance" shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. Sect. 23, the previous section, has undoubtedly dealt specifically with the steam engines and furnaces used in the working of steam vessels which were being worked in the district where this vessel was being worked. It provides that they "shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such engine and furnace; and if such steam engine or furnace is not so constructed, or being so constructed is wilfully or negligently used so that the smoke arising therefrom is not effectually consumed or burnt, the owner or master of such vessel shall be liable to a fine not exceeding 5*l.*, and on a second conviction to a fine of 10*l.*," and then it goes on: "Provided that in this section the words 'consume or burn the smoke' shall not be held in all cases to mean 'consume or burn all the smoke,' and the court hearing an information against a person may remit the fine if of opinion that such person has so constructed his furnace as to consume or burn as far as possible all the smoke arising from such furnace, and has carefully attended to the same, and consumed or burned as far as possible the smoke arising from such furnace." Those words show that there are special provisions with regard to the construction of furnaces and engines upon the steamers and the negligent use of them, but it is to be observed, and I think the argument of Mr. Glen is of importance, that there is a corresponding provision with regard to furnaces upon land, because sub-sect. 1 of sect. 23 also provides that the furnaces employed in the working of engines by steam and a number of other furnaces, all of which must be on land, "shall be constructed so as to consume or burn the smoke arising from such furnace," and there is a corresponding sub-section with regard to their negligent user. Therefore we have with regard to both furnaces on land and furnaces on ships the sort of provision which goes a certain distance for the proper construction of the engines and furnaces and for the non-negligent user. Then we come to sect. 24, which is unquestionably a nuisance section. I think it is not without importance that it immediately follows sect. 23, and is under the same heading, "Smoke consumption." If the words to which I am about to refer can be fairly applied to a chimney on board a steamship, there is no reason why this should not apply. The first provision of sect. 24 says: "Any fireplace or furnace which does not so far as practicable consume the smoke" shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. Then comes the important clause: "Any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such a quantity as to be a nuisance" shall be a nuisance liable to be dealt with summarily. I think that, quite apart from negligence, is meant to deal with the case, which has not been covered by the previous section, of a chimney other than that of a dwelling-house sending forth black smoke. We have had our attention directed to the other legislation of a similar character with regard to railway engines and with regard to traction engines, and there does not appear to be any black smoke nuisance section in any of them. Therefore one would rather assume that this legislation is something which may be said to be additional protection, unless the words "any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house)" are sufficient to show that a steamship would not be included. I think both the purview of this section and the object of the legislation would point to black smoke being emitted within the port from the chimney or funnel of a steamer as constituting an offence. It is quite obvious there may be cases in which the black smoke would come from a chimney which would not ordinarily be called a funnel. I do not think any argument can be based upon the fact that the word "chimney" is used because the word "funnel" is a technical and almost secondary meaning for that kind of chimney. I cannot see any reason why emission of black smoke from steamers constantly plying on the Thames should not be as much prevented as the emitting of black smoke from chimneys on land. I therefore come to the conclusion that sect. 23 does not contain, as Mr. Bigham pressed us that it did, the whole code with regard to nuisances coming from steamships or smoke coming from steamboats. The language of sect. 24 is not enough to enable us to hold that it does not include the chimney of a steamship. Therefore I think this conviction was right. Upon the second point which Mr. Hamilton mentioned, I ought perhaps just to say we held the other day in Central London Railway Company v. Hammersmith Borough Council (ante, p. 645), and I think we were right in saying so, that the order was not bad, because it did not specify works to be done, though the defendant asked for the specification of them if there were no works that could be done. I do not think that objection prevails. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed.

A. GOERZ AND Co. LIMITED (apps.) v. BELL (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. To my mind the only point which certainly is not wholly free from difficulty I agree is the question as to whether sect. 24 (b), "Any chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling-house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance," includes the funnel of a tug-boat or steamer. Usually, no doubt, "chimney" is a phrase applicable to that through which smoke passes from a fire of some sort in a building. It is not the term which is technically the proper term to describe those passages or flues, or whatever you like to call them, on a steamboat, which convey the smoke from the furnace of the steamer to the upper air, but I see nothing to prevent "chimney" being used in what one may call its natural sense—namely, that of a passage by which smoke from a fire is carried away upwards.

Otherwise you would have no "black smoke section," as my Lord has described it shortly, with regard to the description of thing which may send out smoke in quite as great quantities with quite as great mischief if it is enough to create a nuisance, as what may be more usually described by the word "chimney"—namely, the smoke passage from the roof of a building." There is no definite clause relating to the word "chimney" in this Act, as far as I know, and certainly one would expect it to have been referred to if there was one after the care that Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Bigham have shown in arguing this case. We have not heard that chimney is anywhere defined, and if it is not defined it seems to me naturally enough intended to cover here that which it may cover in a popular though not in a technical sense. I need not add anything on the other point to that which my Lord has said.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree. I think "chimney" in this section is used simply as the thing from which smoke does issue into the open air. It might quite well be found that the cases of funnels of steam vessels or of funnels of locomotive engines or other movable smoke-producing apparatus might be so dealt with elsewhere in the Act as to lead one to come to the conclusion that they were not intended to be included in these general words in sect. 24 (b), but in fact the operation of sect. 24 is only to apply the particular summary procedure in reference to certain cases of smoke nuisances, cases coming under (a) and coming under (b). The other sections deal with the construction and user of apparatus producing smoke, and do not deal, as sect. 24 does, with the consequences or results of it, which in certain cases may be dealt with under the summary procedure in reference to nuisances. The result seems to me to be that sect. 24 and sect. 23 are dealing not with different subject-matters but with different consequences of the subject-matter, and there is no reason, therefore, because steam vessels are specially dealt with under sect. 23 to say they cannot come under sect. 24. I see no reason for cutting down what seems to me the primary meaning of the word "chimney" in sect. 24. Appeal dismissed.

Revenue—Income tax—Company resident in United Kingdom—Income Tax Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, sched. D.

The appellant company was registered as a joint stock company at Pretoria, in the South African Republic, but had never been registered in the United Kingdom.

The business of the appellant company consisted in the purchase and prospecting of lands with mining possibilities, or the obtaining of options over such lands with the view to the formation and flotation of companies for the purpose of working the same and the making of a market for the shares.

The profits made by the appellant company were directly obtained (inter alia) by the sale and realisation of shares in subsidiary companies. The bulk of the company's capital was invested in South African shares and in mining properties in South Africa.

The evidence produced showed that with regard to the purchase and sale of shares by the company, 56½ per cent. of the purchases of shares, and 49 per cent. of the sale of shares by the company were carried out in London during the year in question.

The first general meeting of the company was held in April 1899 in Johannesburg. The second general meeting was held in London in June 1901, subsequent to the year of assessment. With regard to the directors' meetings, the directors' minute-book kept in London, which was the only minute-book of the company, was produced and showed that almost every transaction of importance affecting the management, control, and direction of the company was dealt with, controlled, and decided at the board meetings of the directors in London.

A considerable number of important matters requiring local management were carried out by the managing director in Johannesburg on behalf of the board under powers delegated by the board in London. A copy of the minutes of the board meetings in London were forwarded after each meeting to Johannesburg. With regard to the staff, the chairman and three of the nine directors were resident in England. The directors held monthly meetings at the company's office in London. Only one meeting was held out of England. The accounts of the Johannesburg, Paris, and Berlin offices were brought to London where the balance-sheets and accounts of the company were made up and audited. The dividends were fixed and authorised by resolutions of the directors at meetings held in London for that purpose, and the dividend warrants in respect of certain registered shares were also issued in London.

Held, that the appellant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom and liable as such to be assessed under sect. 2 of the Income Tax Act 1853, sched. D.

CASE stated under the statute 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

At meetings of the commissioners held at the Guildhall in the City on the 9th May 1901, the 4th July, and the 11th July 1901, A. Goerz and Co. Limited (hereinafter termed the appellant company), of 20, Bishopsgate-street Within, in the City of London, appealed against an assessment made upon them in respect of their estimated profits as merchants and financiers from the 5th April 1899 to the 5th April 1900 of the sum of 75,000*l.* increased by the commissioners on the hearing of the appeals under the provisions of the Taxes Management Act, s. 57, sub-s. 8, to 142,429*l.*

The appellant company was registered as a joint stock company at Pretoria, in the South African Republic, on the 8th Dec. 1897, according to the laws then subsisting in the Republic.

The appellant company is not and has never been registered in the United Kingdom as a joint stock company.

The articles of association, which were passed at Johannesburg on the 7th Dec. 1897, provided (inter alia) as follows:

NAME AND CONSTITUTION.

3. The head office of the company shall be either in London or elsewhere on the continent of Europe, or in Johannesburg in the South African Republic, or at such other place elsewhere with such branch or branches in this Republic and elsewhere as the directors may from time to time determine.

OBJECTS.

5. The objects for which the company is established are: (a) To adopt a certain agreement bearing date the 7th Dec. 1897, entered into between Ad. Goerz and Co. (a company limited under German law) of the first part, the Deutsche Bank of Berlin of the second part, and Henry Charles Hall, acting as trustees for this company, of the third part, and to carry the same into effect, with full power, nevertheless, from time to time to agree to any modification thereof. Such adoption shall take place at the first meeting of the board of directors. (b) To carry on the business of merchants, dealers in shares, stocks, and other securities, financial and general agents, miners and mining in all its branches, and generally to carry on and undertake any business transaction or operation commonly carried on by capitalists, promoters, and financiers, contractors for public and other works or agents. (c) To acquire by purchase, concession, lease, or otherwise, any lands, farms, houses, buildings, mining properties, mines, claims, water rights, and other rights, properties, and privileges of every description, and also any metals, minerals, quartz, ores, machinery, plant, utensils, patents for inventions, licences to use patents of every kind, real and personal property of every description in South Africa and elsewhere, and to deal with, develop, and turn the same or any of them into account. (d) To form, promote, reconstruct, reform, subsidise, and assist any companies, syndicates, or partnerships of all kinds. (e) To sell the whole or any part of the assets, property, and undertaking of this company for such consideration as the company may deem fit, and in particular for money and shares or stock of any company having objects similar or partly similar to the objects of this company, or for the debentures of any company, or wholly for such shares or stock, also to let, mortgage, abandon, dispose of, or otherwise deal with all or any part of this company's property and rights, and also to reconstruct, reformat, reform, or otherwise deal with the company with all or any of its rights, property, and assets. (f) To lend, invest, put out at interest, or otherwise deal with any funds and moneys belonging to the company, and to discount and deal in bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other securities. (g) To promote and aid in the promotion of measures for the protection of the mining industry in the South African Republic and elsewhere, and to promote or oppose legislative and other measures affecting the said industry.

CAPITAL AND SHARES.

6. The present nominal capital of the company is the sum of one million and fifteen thousand pounds (1,015,000*l.*) sterling, divided into 15,000 founders' shares of 1*l.* each, and into one million ordinary shares of 1*l.* each, which shares are in respect of dividends and otherwise subject to the provisions of the agreement referred to in sub-sect. (a) of sect. 5 of these presents.

GENERAL MEETINGS.

40. All meetings of the company shall, until otherwise determined by the company or by the board, be held in Johannesburg.

DIRECTORS.

64. The directors shall not be less than five or more than fifteen, and they may reside in the South African Republic, in Europe, or elsewhere.

PROCEEDINGS OF DIRECTORS.

81. The directors may meet together at such place or places in Berlin, London, Johannesburg, Paris, or elsewhere, for the dispatch of business, adjourn or otherwise regulate their meetings as they think fit, and determine the quorum necessary for the transaction of business. Until otherwise determined two directors shall be a quorum. Questions arising at any meeting shall be decided by a majority of votes. In case of an equality of votes the chairman shall have a second or casting vote.

POWERS OF DIRECTORS.

87. The management of the business, and the control of the company shall be vested in the directors, who may exercise all such powers and do all such acts and things as are not hereby or by statute expressly required or directed to be done by the company in general meeting, but subject, nevertheless, to such management not being inconsistent with these presents nor to any resolution passed at any meeting of shareholders, but no resolution passed by the company shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such resolution had not been passed.

88. Without prejudice to the general powers conferred upon the directors by these presents it is hereby declared that the directors shall be intrusted with the following powers: (c) To sell, let, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or abandon the whole or any part or parts of the company's present or future property upon such terms and conditions as they may think fit, but the directors shall have no power to liquidate the company, except with the consent of the shareholders as mentioned in sect. 113 hereof. (e) To borrow and raise money and to execute in the name of the company any mortgages, deeds of sale, leases, debentures, and other contracts, and also to make, draw, accept and indorse, bills, notes, and other instruments, provided that the amount borrowed shall not exceed in the aggregate one half of the amount of the issued capital of the company for the time being. (d) To appoint any person to accept and hold in trust property belonging to the company. Also to appoint a managing director or directors, and to remunerate such person or managing director either by way of salary or commission, or participation in profits, or by any or all of these as they think fit. (h) To delegate all or any of their powers to any person or persons and to appoint attorneys and agents to represent the company.

LOCAL BOARD.

89. The directors may from time to time provide for the management and transaction of the affairs of the company, either in the South African Republic or elsewhere, in such manner as they think fit, and the provisions contained in the next three following clauses shall be without prejudice to the general powers conferred by this clause.

90. The directors may from time to time and at any time establish any local board or agency for managing any of the affairs of the company, and may appoint any person to be members of such local board, or managers, or agents, and may fix their remuneration. And the directors may from time to time and at any time delegate to any person so appointed any of the powers, authorities, and discretions for the time being vested in directors other than their power to make calls, and may authorise the members for the time being of any such local board or any of them to fill up any vacancies therein, and to act notwithstanding vacancies, and any such appointment or delegation may be made on such terms and subject to such conditions as the directors think fit, and the directors may at any time remove any person so appointed, and may annul or vary any such delegation.

91. The directors may at any time and from time to time by power of attorney appoint any person or persons to be the attorney or attorneys of the company for such purposes and with such powers, authorities, and discretions (not exceeding those vested in or exercisable by the directors under these presents), and for such period and subject to such conditions as the directors may from time to time think fit, and any such appointment may (if the directors think fit) be made in favour of the members or any of the members of any local board established as aforesaid in favour of any company or of the members, directors, nominees, or managers of any company or firm or otherwise, in favour of any fluctuating body of persons, whether nominated directly or indirectly by the directors, and any such power of attorney may contain such powers for the protection or convenience of persons dealing with such attorney as the directors may think fit.

92. Any such delegates or attorneys as aforesaid may be authorised by the directors to sub-delegate all or any of the powers, authorities, and discretions for the time being vested in them.

93. Without prejudice to the powers of the directors to grant additional powers to a local board or boards as from time to time appointed and from time to time to vary such powers, any local board if and when appointed by the directors shall be intrusted with the following powers—namely: (a) To open a branch office of the company in such towns or cities as the directors may appoint, and to pay the rent and other expenses connected therewith. (b) To engage and at the discretion of the local board to remove or suspend a local secretary, clerks, or servants in connection with the business of the company, and to determine their duties and pay their salaries as fixed by the directors of the company. (c) To obtain an official recognition and quotation of the shares, stocks, and debentures of the company upon any stock or share exchange or bourse in Europe, and to subscribe and to comply with rules and regulations of every such exchange and bourse, and to make all such payments as may from time to time be due and payable to any such exchange and bourse.

ACCOUNTS.

101. The directors shall cause true account to be kept of the money received and expended by the company, and the matters in respect of which such receipts and expenditure take place, and of the assets, credits, and liabilities of the company.

102. Such of the books of account as shall be in the South African Republic shall be kept at the office of the company in the said Republic or such other place or places as the directors may think fit. All other books of the company shall be kept at such offices and places either in this Republic, England, or elsewhere in Europe as the board may from time to time determine.

The business of the appellant company consists in the purchase and prospecting of lands with mining possibilities or the obtaining of options over such lands with a view to the formation and flotation of companies for the purpose of working the same, the formation and flotation of such subsidiary companies either alone or in participation with others, and the making of a market for the shares of these subsidiary companies in London, Berlin, Paris, and Johannesburg, and dealing in and selling such shares, also in dealing in the other shares, principally of South African companies, including the sale and realisation of the shares and other assets taken over under the agreement of the 7th Dec. 1897.

The working capital of the subsidiary companies is provided by the appellant company, either alone

K.B. Div.]

[K.B. Div.]

or in conjunction with others as a syndicate in agreed proportions, and the nominal share capital of the subsidiary companies is then either taken as a whole by the appellant company or distributed pro rata among the members of the syndicate. The working capital of the subsidiary companies is almost invariably subscribed by the syndicate to enable them to be floated fully equipped. The syndicates usually consisted of capitalists and financiers carrying on business in Europe and South Africa. No prospectuses are issued by the subsidiary companies, but a market is made and the shares then distributed and dealt in and gradually realised on the stock markets of London, Paris, Berlin, and Johannesburg. The profits made by the appellant company were directly obtained by the sale and realisation of shares in such subsidiary companies as aforesaid, but additional profit was made on ordinary purchases and sales of shares in various other companies.

Some additional sources of profit by the appellant company were interest on money lent, dividends on shares held by it, agency fees from other companies, and the like. The bulk of the company's capital is invested in the South African shares and in mining properties in the Witwatersrand district in South Africa.

The company's interests outside of South Africa only stand at about 50,000*l.*, and half of this amount is invested in the United States and Mexico, and the other half in shares in various mining companies in Western Australia and Chili. An option for the purchase and working of certain lands and interests in British India was acquired, but not during the year of assessment, but after prospecting the lands and interests the option and operations were not carried out.

On the 31st Dec. 1899 the value of the shares and debentures in other companies held by the appellant company, as shown by the balance-sheet, amounted to the sum of 719,365*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* The value of claim holdings, participations, and interests amounted to 224,395*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* The value of the temporary advances against securities (including shares and stocks taken in) amounted to the sum of 144,520*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* Such advances were made in London to the extent of 37,900*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* and in Paris to the extent of 106,619*l.* 17*s.* The amount of cash on deposit accounts and in hand amounted to 326,884*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.* and was held in London to the extent of 171,819*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, in Berlin to the extent of 123,301*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, in Paris to the extent of 9205*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.*, and in Johannesburg to the extent of 22,557*l.* 9*s.* 2*d.*

During 1898, 1899, 1900, with regard to the purchase and sale of shares by the company, 56½ per cent. of the purchases of shares and 49 per cent. of the sale of shares were carried out in London.

The profits, the subject of the assessment, were made in the mode described above.

The transaction of the affairs of the appellant company was effected in the manner shown, as follows:

With regard to the general meetings of the company, the first general meeting of the appellant company was held on the 28th of April 1899 at the company's office in Johannesburg in the above-named Republic and was adjourned to the 5th May 1899 when the same was held at the office. From that date till the end of the year of assessment no further general meeting was held by reason of the war with the United Kingdom which was declared by the South African Republic on the 11th Oct. 1899.

The second general meeting was held in London on the 26th June 1901, subsequent to the year of assessment.

With regard to the directors' meetings, the directors' minute-book kept in London, which is the only minute-book of the company, was produced in evidence, and contained a great number of items and minutes of resolutions relating to the affairs of the company which, in the opinion of the commissioners, showed that almost every transaction of importance affecting the management, control, and direction of the company was dealt with, controlled, and decided at the board meetings of the directors in London.

A considerable number of important matters requiring local management and dealing were carried out by the managing director in Johannesburg on behalf of the board, under powers delegated by the board in London, and under powers of attorney sealed and executed by the board in London, and in some instances such matters, though reported to the managing director in London, were not formally reported to the board until settled. A copy of the minutes of the board meetings in London was forwarded after each meeting to Johannesburg. No other minute-book was kept at Johannesburg.

With regard to the staff, the chairman and three directors of the company were resident in in England, four directors (all of whom were permanent directors nominated by the vendors in accordance with clause 66 of the articles of association) were resident in Germany, one director was resident in Paris, and one director in the South African Republic. The directors resident in Germany and Paris attended the board meetings in London.

In the year 1899, being the year of assessment, there was one managing director of the company—viz., Mr. Adolf Goerz—who was resident in London. Mr. Brakhan was appointed managing director in Johannesburg, and was there resident. The board appointed also two managers in London, two in Johannesburg, one in Paris, and one in Berlin. The Johannesburg staff of the company numbered twenty-five, including surveyors and engineers, and received salaries, commissions, and bonuses totalling 24,322*l.* for the year. The London staff numbered twenty-six, and received salaries, commissions, and bonuses totalling 17,374*l.* for the year. The Berlin staff numbered thirteen, and received salaries, commissions, and bonuses totalling 4609*l.* for the year; and the Paris staff numbered nine, and received salaries, commissions, and bonuses totalling 4643*l.* for the year.

All the meetings of the directors took place (with the exception hereinafter mentioned) at the company's offices at 20, Bishopsgate-street Within, in the city of London, where the London staff was located.

Since the 1st Feb. 1898 the directors have held monthly meetings in London, and not elsewhere, with the exception of one meeting held at Paris on the 4th April 1901, which was expressed in the minute-book to be called in furtherance of "the idea being to hold meetings on the Continent instead of in London, say once a year.

[K.B. Div.]

The accounts of the Johannesburg, Paris, and Berlin offices are brought to London, where the full balance-sheet and profit and loss accounts of the company are made up and audited, and where alone the full accounts of the company are kept. In the preparation of accounts it has been usual for the Berlin office accounts to be audited in Berlin, and for these and the Paris office accounts to be brought to London. The Johannesburg office accounts are audited in Johannesburg, and the whole of these branch accounts are then incorporated in the full accounts, which are made up and audited in London.

The complete accounts with a directors' report are prepared, approved, and passed in London by the board of directors in the first instance in English, and are then translated into French and German for the use of the shareholders resident in those countries.

The dividends were fixed and authorised by resolutions of the directors at meetings held in London for that purpose, and the dividend warrants in respect of 801,524 registered shares were also issued by them from London. The coupons on bearer shares were paid in 1899 as to 52,294 shares in Berlin and Paris, and as to 11,182 shares in London, and eventually were brought to account in London.

The appellants contended that the appellant company should be assessed as a person not resident within the United Kingdom drawing profit from a trade exercised in the United Kingdom, and on such profits only. They cited and relied on the decision of Attorney-General v. Alexander (31 L. T. Rep. 694; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 20).

The commissioners having heard counsel for the appellants and the surveyor of taxes for the Inland Revenue, and having taken the evidence of various witnesses, found as facts (1) that the trade and business of the company constituted one trade or business, and was carried on and exercised by the appellants within the United Kingdom at their London office; (2) that the head and seat and directing power of affairs of the appellant company were at the office of the company in London, from whence the whole of the operations of the company both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere were controlled and directed.

The commissioners having considered the cases of Cesena Sulphur Company Limited v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Mills Company Limited v. Nicholson (35 L. T. Rep. 275; 1 Ex. Div. 428; 1 Tax Cas. 83), San Paulo Brazilian Railway Company Limited v. Carter (73 L. T. Rep. 538; (1896) A. C. 31; 3 Tax Cas. 407), Attorney-General v. Alexander (31 L. T. Rep. 694; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 20), and other cases determined that the appellant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom, and liable as such to be assessed under sect. 2 of the Income Tax Act 1853, sched. D, first paragraph, on the whole of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any trade, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and accordingly confirmed the assessment in the sum of 142,429l.

The commissioners on the hearing of the 11th July 1901, when giving their decision on the appeal and communicating their intention to confirm the assessment, stated that they found as facts that the trade, employment, and vocation of the company were carried on and exercised by the appellants within the United Kingdom at their London office, and that the head and seat and directing power of the affairs of the appellant company were at the office of the company in London.

The appellants on the settlement of the draft case raised the objection that the words so used were not identical with the formal statement of the findings set forth above, and that the commissioners had no power to alter, vary, or enlarge such words above set out.

With regard to this objection the commissioners reported that the statement was merely a concise statement of their decision, and was not intended to be a full, complete, or formal statement, or to embody the whole of their findings, whether of law or of fact, nor was it intended that other material findings or statements should be excluded from the final written statement of this case. The statements set out above are correct, and, after hearing the evidence, the commissioners found the facts, and arrived at the determination set out therein. They were of opinion that they had power to amplify and explain in this special case the basis on which they confirmed the assessment; but to avoid the expense and delay consequent on a reference back by the High Court the commissioners reported the objection so raised on behalf of the appellants and their explanation by way of reply thereto.

By the Income Tax Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2:

For the purpose of classifying and distinguishing the several properties, profits, and gains, for and in respect of which the said duties are by this Act granted, and for the purposes of the provisions for assessing, raising, levying, and collecting such duties respectively, the said duties shall be deemed to be granted and made payable yearly for and in respect of the several properties, profits, and gains respectively described or comprised in the several schedules contained in this Act, and marked respectively (A), (B), (C), (D), and (E), and to be charged under such respective schedules; (that is to say) Schedule D. For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and to be charged for every 20s. share of the annual amount of such profits and gains. And for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, although not resident in the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, exercised within the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every 20s. share of the annual amount of such profits and gains. And for and in respect of all interest of money, annuities, and other annual profits and gains not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules contained in this Act, and to be charged for every 20s. share of the annual amount thereof.

Asquith, K.C., Scrutton, K.C. and J. R. Atkin for the appellants.—It has never been held that a company incorporated and registered in a foreign country is resident in the United Kingdom. In all the cases on this point which have been before

A. GOEBZ AND CO. LIMITED (apps.) v. BELL (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

the courts the company has either been found to be English or residing in England. They referred to Cesena Sulphur Company Limited v. Nicholson, 35 L. T. Rep. 275; 1 Ex. Div. 428;

San Paulo Brazilian Railway Company v. Carter,
73 L. T. 538; (1896) A. C. 31.

In both those cases the company was registered in England, and so clearly was resident here, and the same fact—namely, that they were registered in England—is to be found in Frank Jones Brewing Company v. Apthorpe (15 Times L. Rep. 113; 4 Tax Cas. 6), United States Brewing Company v. Apthorpe (4 Tax Cas. 17), St. Louis Breweries Limited v. Apthorpe (79 L. T. Rep. 551), and Apthorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Company (80 L. T. Rep. 395). When one looks at the whole of the facts in the case it is clear that this company resides, if a company can be said to reside anywhere, in South Africa, for it was incorporated there, it was registered there, the general meetings of the company are to be held there, and for the purpose of the Income Tax Acts, which is the only purpose to be considered in this case, it resides there. A company may reside in one place and carry on business elsewhere. That this is so is plain from sched. D to the Income Tax Act 1853. They referred to

Attorney-General v. Alexander, 31 L. T. Rep. 694;
L. Rep. 10 Ex. 20;

Wingate v. Inland Revenue, 24 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Rettie, 939; 34 So. L. Rep. 699; 3 Tax Cas.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) and Rowlatt for the respondent.—Incorporation and registration does not determine the residence of a company. A company resides where its place of business is, and here its head office was in London; the board meetings of the directors are held in London, and the accounts are kept and the dividends declared also in London. In fact, the whole of the control of the business is in London. How, then, can it be said that the company does not carry on business here? And if it carries on business, not merely by means of agents, as in Wingate v. Inland Revenue (sup.), then it is "residing in the United Kingdom" within sched. D. of the Income Tax Act 1853. In Attorney-General v. Alexander (sup.) the company could not have any residence outside the Ottoman Empire, because it was prevented by its charter, but here by the articles of association the head office, which may be said to be the business of the company, may be in London, or in any other place that the directors may determine.

Asquith, K.C. in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I have come to a conclusion as to what my judgment should be, and although, as it is not very likely that the case will stop here and be in any sense an authority, I might desire to put my judgment into writing so that the words in which I express it might possibly be more accurate, yet I think I can explain my views sufficiently for the assistance of the parties to enable them to go anywhere else they desire to go to, and also to comply with the requirements of the Court of Appeal, who I believe desire to have a judge express some sort of reasons, good or bad, for his judgment rather than pass it on to them simply for them to decide. I think it convenient first to dispose of the sort of preliminary point that is raised by the last paragraph of the case, as to the mode in which the case is stated, and as to how far the findings which appear to be there are to be taken as binding. The tax commissioners announced their decision, and made a short statement of some findings. Upon that they were asked to state a case and agreed to do so, and then, when the case was stated, there were further findings in it which the appellants objected to, and eventually this paragraph comes into the case, as the commissioners state, in order to avoid the possibility of it going back to be restated. The objection is that the matters that appear in the case are different from those that were stated at the time. I think that is what the objections must come to. I think, on the one hand, it is clear that when any tribunal which gives a decision to which there can be an appeal states its determination and agrees to state the case, it cannot afterwards revise its decision and improve upon it, but I think it may amplify it and explain it more clearly, and that is what the commissioners say they have done. As to some of the objections, I think it is quite clear that is what they have done. For instance, they gave their decision in this way: The commissioners on "communicating their intention to confirm the assessment stated that they found as facts that the trade, employment, and vocation of the company were carried on and exercised by the appellants within the United Kingdom at their London office, and that the head and seat and directing powers of the affairs of the appellant company were at the office of the company in London." That has been amplified into: "That the trade and business of the company constituted one trade and business and was carried on by the appellants." It is only adding "one business," and they call it before "the business." I do not think it is more than an amplification, and no court would send the case back to be restated by striking out that allegation that it is "one business." It is quite consistent with what they found and stated they found. If it had been inconsistent with their findings it would have been different. The other paragraph is nearly the same: "That the head and seat and directing power of the affairs of the appellant company were at the office of the company in London, from whence the whole of the operations of the company, both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, were controlled and directed." It is that latter part which does not appear in terms in the other statement of their finding, although they had "directing power" in. There is very little difference there except different words. The other and more important thing is that they have now distinctly found, and it does not appear upon their original statement whether they intended to find it or not, that the appellant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom. That is the real importance of any alteration or any addition to the finding that there is. But, in the first place, I think they must have intended to find that, although they did not state it, because these others are the grounds on which they found it, and in the next place, that is the point upon which the case is stated, and this finding of residence, having regard to the fact that it is the finding of residence of a company, is certainly a mixed question of law and fact, and not a mere finding of fact by which I should be bound. I consider that what I have to do mainly in this case is to consider that finding, if necessary review it and set it aside, and, consequently, that it is not a matter upon which the case could be sent back to the tax commissioners to restate as far as regards the facts. It is a point of law open upon the case, and it ought to be open upon the case, and is open. If it had been stated as a fact, so as to conclude it as a matter of fact, then I think that somehow or other the case would require altering, but as it is put in a shape in which it can be reviewed, I think there can be no real objection taken to the case. That disposes of what I call the subsidiary point, and leaves one free to go to what is really the main point in the case. I know there are, in certain views of the case, two points, but the main point in the case is as to whether or not this company is residing in the United Kingdom for the purpose of this taxation. Mr. Asquith began by calling my attention to a dictum of James, L.J. in Ex parte Breull (43 L. T. Rep. 580; 16 Ch. Div. 484), in which he pointed out that a word like "residence" might be, and probably is, used in different statutes with different meanings, and, for instance, that which constitutes residence for registration purposes, or anything of that sort, might not necessarily amount to residence for the purposes of this taxation. I entirely accept that, and I think that makes it desirable to look at the Act that I have to construe, and to consider what the meaning of introducing "residence in the United Kingdom" is. What it says in the first clause is that a person residing in the United Kingdom is to be taxed for income tax to the whole extent of the profits and gains arising from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised by him, whether carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. That is, whether in the United Kingdom entirely, whether elsewhere entirely, or whether partly in one and partly in the other, and he is to be taxed to the entire extent of his profit in reference to that. On the other hand, if he is not resident within the United Kingdom, then he is only to be taxed to the extent, speaking roughly, and not going into it very accurately, of the trade that he does in the United Kingdom. That seems to mean this, that if a person is resident in the United Kingdom he takes the benefit of the Government of the country, the security to his life and limb, and liberty, and the opportunity of doing his business in the way in which the Government of a settled and civilised country enables it to be done. He is taking the benefit of the Government of the country, and accordingly he has to pay, like other inhabitants in the country, his full share towards the expenses of that Government in taxation. On the other hand, if he is not resident in the country, and does not thereby get the full benefit of the expenses incurred in governing the country, then he does not pay taxes in reference to his full income, like the other inhabitants of the country, but he only pays a sort of toll, as it were, in respect of the use which he does make of the Government of the country by coming into this country and doing business here. That appears to be the policy of the Act, and it assists one possibly in understanding how to apply it in the case of individuals, but unfortunately I do not think it throws a very great deal of light upon the question that I have to deal with, as to how to decide the question whether or not there is residence within the United Kingdom of this company, this artificial entity, as it has been called, which has not a physical existence in one sense, and does not dwell in the ordinary sense in any particular place. It does not assist one much, but it does assist a little, I think. The company does get the benefit of the Government of the country, and the rights which it gets by that registration. It gets a certain amount of benefit, and that, of course, is the main consideration which the appellants here rely on to say that their real residence is in the South African Republic, where the company was registered, and not in this country. On the other hand, the company, by having its head office here, and doing its business here through the board of directors here, does also get a certain amount of benefit from the law and order of the country and from the Government of the country, and therefore, so far as those considerations apply, there is something to be said in reference to either view, and I do not think it helps one a great deal, but I think it does help just a little. As I have said, the contentions on the one side and the other mainly are as to the effect of the registration and incorporation of the company in the one country and as to it having its head office in the other. Each side, perhaps, has got a little more. Mr. Asquith relied upon the company meetings, or company meeting, at any rate, having been at Johannesburg, and the Attorney-General probably had some other things besides the head office, but those are the main things on each side. To a certain extent it is a question which of them prevails, but I think it is rather more accurate to say that the question is whether the registration and incorporation of the company in the foreign country prevents it being resident in this country because it is possible—I do not decide one way or the other—that the company may have two residences. I think it is certainly possible that an individual may have two residences; for many purposes undoubtedly he may have, and I think for tax purposes he may have. In most cases, or the great majority of cases, it is provided for in the incidence of taxation. In reference to this I see, in a book handed up to me, there has been at least one Scotch case which says that a man may have residence within the United Kingdom notwithstanding he has a residence elsewhere. That is a "man," and I should think the condition of things might be the same in reference to a company. So that the most accurate way, I think, of stating the question before me is whether the incorporation of this company in a foreign country prevents it having a residence in this country, and whether, if it does not so prevent it, it is shown in this case that it has a residence in this country. The difficulty is created, as I said just now, by the fact that I have to deal with an artificial entity which in the ordinary sense has not got a residence at all, and what is one to attribute to it as being its residence. Such a body for some purposes must have what I call a local habitation. It must be communicated with. People must know where to find it who want

[K.B. Div.]

A. GOERZ AND CO. LIMITED (apps.) v. BELL (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

A. GOERZ AND CO. LIMITED (apps.) v. BELL (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

to deal with it. So that certainly in some sense it must have a local habitation. Now, our law provides in one sense for that, because it provides that every company, at any rate under what are called "The Companies Acts," must have a registered office, and the registered office is the place where anybody who wants officially as it were to find the company has to go. So far as I can judge, the law of the South African Republic did not provide necessarily that there should be a registered office. We discussed yesterday what the presumptions of English law as to foreign law were, and it may be, if I had nothing whatever to guide me, I ought to presume that the law of the Transvaal, as our law, did require that every company should register its office. But, even if that is so, it is a very artificial presumption, and I think I have enough before me to show that the law of the Transvaal does not do so, because I think that the articles of association registered under that law must be presumed to be in accordance with it, and they do not state any registered office, but they do something that is somewhat like it. They deal with the head office of the company, and in art. 119, which corresponds to what would be found in all articles of association in an English company, there is this statement that services of all summonses, processes, notices, and the like, are to be valid and effectual if served at the head office of the company. That seems to me to be equivalent to saying—and there are other clauses, I think, also in the articles which show it—that if you want to go and find this company, the place where to go and find them is the head office of the company—which is very much the same as saying that, so far as the company has a local habitation, it is at the head office. The head office is to be subject to the determination of the directors from time to time. Then there is the clause as to meetings of the company or the directors, but the clause as to that is a little different from the clause as to the head office, because the meetings of the company are to be in Johannesburg until otherwise determined. The clause as to the head office of the company is that it is to be "either in London or elsewhere on the Continent of Europe, or in Johannesburg in the South African Republic, or at such other place elsewhere with such branch or branches in this Republic and elsewhere as the directors may from time to time determine." It puts London first there. I do not know that there is any great difference in putting London first; but the fact is that these directors did immediately commence to meet in London and continued to meet in London, with a few exceptions, when they occasionally accommodated their foreign colleagues by going over once a year to Paris. Still they habitually met here. There is a finding which I think I must take as a finding of fact as to the head office; but whether that is a finding of fact that I am bound by or not, it seems to me that the evidence fully supports it and that the office which they had here undoubtedly was, as between that office and any other office that the company had, in point of fact the head office. The result therefore, so far as the document which is the constitution of this company tells us anything about it—so far as it tells people who want to find this company where they can find it, what it tells them is that they can find it in London because it tells them that they can find it at the head office and that head office is assumed to be probably London and is in fact London. It is subject to the determination of the directors, and the directors have either determined that it should not be elsewhere or determined that it should be here by acting on it and it being here. So far as the constitution of the company indicates where its locality is to be, what it indicates is that its locality, if the head office is its locality, is to be in such place as the directors determine, and they have determined London. Then it undoubtedly contemplates that it should be a company which does business nearly all over the world—certainly in the principal countries of the world. It is contemplated that it should have a head office. It is contemplated that it should have branches. Although one would think from its being incorporated in the South African Republic that most likely that would be its principal place of business, it most distinctly contemplates that its principal place of business may be elsewhere and that in the Republic there may be nothing but a branch. That is the light which the document forming the constitution of the company throws upon it. Then, so far as regards the facts they are in accordance with that. The directors of the company in the general control of its affairs undoubtedly proceeded from the board in London. They gave powers of attorney to the people who were to do the business for them in the Transvaal, and although I do not know that it is clear that they exactly treated their business in the Transvaal as a branch only, still, they very nearly did that, and they treated it rather as a branch than as the main business. Those are the facts. Under those circumstances, does the fact that it was incorporated in the South African Republic show that its residence was necessarily there and not elsewhere? The next thing, I think, is to come to the light that the cases throw upon it. It is the fact that there is no case reported, that I am aware of, in which a company incorporated in one country has been held to be registered in another. But there is also no case, as far as I know, which has come before the courts in reference to these matters in which the company has been incorporated in one country and has not had its head office in the same country. In the Ottoman Bank case—Attorney-General v. Alexander (31 L. T. Rep. 694; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 20)—it is quite clear that the head office in fact was in Constantinople. It is equally clear that the constitution of the company provided that it should be there, and consequently you have there the two matters as to which I have apparently to decide here which is the overriding one on the same side. Then the Scotch case of the Norwegian company—Wingate v. Inland Revenue (24 Ct. Sess. Cas. 4th Rettie, 939; 34 Sc. L. Rep. 699; 3 Tax Cas. 569)—is possibly the nearest to this, but there the company, being registered in Norway, had also, as was stated in the case, its registered office in Norway, and it in fact did all its company business as distinguished from its trading business in Norway, and although it did its main business—namely, its trading business—in Glasgow, it did it there by an agent; a firm who were agents for the company did the business, and it happened that they did the entire profitable business, but they did it as agents of the company, and not as officers of the company. All companies must in one sense act by agents. The directors, the secretary, and everybody are agents of the company, but I think there is a distinction between persons who are officers of the company who directly represent the company and firms who are mere agents for the company, and when one considers within which branch of this Income Tax Act a particular company is to fall, that question of agency seems to me to be of some importance. The 1st clause, "resident in this country," contemplates the resident carrying on his business, whether here or elsewhere, but carrying it on himself. The 2nd clause, referring to a person not resident in this country, but, nevertheless, carrying on a profession, trade, or employment in this country, obviously refers mainly to cases where the resident abroad carries on something in this country by agents in this country, and the Tax Acts provide—it is, I think, the 41st section of the Act of 1842—for the agents being accountable in cases coming within the 2nd clause of this sched. D. There you go to the agent, and in this case of Wingate v. Inland Revenue what was held by the court was that the Glasgow agents were accountable, but accountable for the whole profits of the Norwegian company, because the whole profits of the Norwegian company were made in Glasgow. It was the agent that was in Glasgow, not the company. Now, the question is, which is it that is here? What is here is the head office, the directing power, persons who are in one sense agents of the company—directors and managing director, and so on—but those persons, the agents of the company, are also officers of the company. They are the company, so far as the company has a corporal existence other than the corporation by name after being incorporated. It seems to me that what is here is the company, and not merely agents of the company. Therefore, I think that the true inference is that here the company must be held to be resident in this country within the 1st clause. I think that the considerations which go to make up that which is the local habitation of such a body as this, go more to show, if it was necessary to decide between Johannesburg and London, that this company is in fact to be found in London, and not to be found in Johannesburg; but there are agents to be found in Johannesburg and the company is to be found here, whereas in the Scotch case it was the company to be found in Norway and the agents of the company to be found in Glasgow. I think I must come to that conclusion. As I have said, I do not think the cases throw a very great deal of light upon it, because of the fact that in all the cases the considerations which in this case go on the one side or on the other in those cases all went on the one side, and therefore they do not really help us. I cannot help thinking that, although the company, by getting itself registered in the South African Republic, undoubtedly desired, so far as the company before its incorporation would have any desire, to take advantage of the law of the Transvaal, yet, having regard to the constitution of the company as framed there, I cannot see that it was prevented, after it had become incorporated, from residing elsewhere, either instead of the Transvaal or as well as the Transvaal. I think it did, or the promoters of it did intend to get the benefit of the Transvaal law, and did get it. There can be no doubt about that. So far as the company could be either, it was intended that this company should be a "Boer" and not an "Uitlander"—there is no doubt about that; and I have no doubt it got very substantial advantages in its operations by being incorporated in that country instead of being incorporated here; but it was incorporated in that country for that purpose. It shows, in my view, that it was intended from the first that its operations might be mainly out of the Transvaal, and that, in fact, they were mainly outside the Transvaal. I think that upon the various dicta—they are nothing more—it must be taken to be resident within this country. On those grounds I think I must affirm the decision. Under these circumstances I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything about the second point, which it was agreed in certain events I should deal with, but deal with separately. I do not think it is necessary. I only want just to say that in approaching that point it confirms my view upon the other point, because I think if one were to deal with this case under the 2nd clause as a non-resident company, what one would look to would be to find who you were to make answerable for such part of the business as was done within this country. If you were to look for the agents of this non-resident company, and when you went to look for them, you would find not them, because you would find the company itself. That goes to confirm the view that the case really comes within the first clause, and not within the second. On those grounds I think my judgment must be for the Crown.

Judgment accordingly.

HAGMAIER (app.) v. OVERSEERS OF WILLESSEN (resps.). (a)

Justices—Summary jurisdiction—Lists of persons liable to serve on juries—Justices sitting in "special petty sessions" for revising jury lists—Power of justices to state special case—Juries Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 50), s. 10—Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—Interpretation Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 13, sub-ss. 11, 12.

Justices sitting in special petty sessions under sect. 10 of the Juries Act 1825, for revising the lists of jurors, are not a court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of sect. 13, sub-sect. 11, of the Interpretation Act 1889, and have no power under sect. 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, or otherwise, to state a special case for the opinion of the High Court, upon the application of a person aggrieved by their decision.

CASE stated upon the application of the appellant by four justices of the peace sitting and acting on the 24th Sept. 1903, under the Juries Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 50), s. 10, at a special petty sessions in and for the division of Willesden in the county of Middlesex, for the purpose of reviewing and allowing the lists of persons liable to serve on juries for that county, subject first to the decision of the court as to whether under the circumstances the justices sitting as a special petty sessions under sect. 10 of the Juries Act 1825 had the power to state a special case.

On the date aforesaid the respondents, the overseers of the parish of Willesden, submitted to the justices a list of persons in the parish for settlement and approval as being liable to serve on juries in and for the county of Middlesex, and therein was included the name of the appellant, with his description as veterinary surgeon.

The appellant, who was a member of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, and who was carrying on practice as a veterinary surgeon in the parish, appeared by his solicitor and claimed exemption from service on juries on the ground that, being on the register of veterinary surgeons, he was a registered medical practitioner within the meaning of the Juries Act 1870, and was thereby exempt from service on juries.

The justices, after hearing the parties, found and determined that the appellant was not a "registered medical practitioner" within the meaning of the words in the Juries Act 1870, being of opinion that those words meant a person registered under the provisions of the Medical Act 1858, and defined by sect. 34 of that Act, and they declined to remove the appellant's name from the list.

They then stated this case for the opinion of the court as to whether the appellant was exempt from service on juries by virtue of his being in actual practice as a veterinary surgeon, but subject to the preliminary question as to whether they had power to state a case.

The following were the reasons which in the opinion of the justices rendered it doubtful whether they had power to state a special case upon this matter: (a) there was no hearing of an "information or complaint," as required by sect. 2 of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 (the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1857); (b) they were not a "court of summary jurisdiction," as provided by sect. 33 of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49 (the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879).

The Interpretation Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63) enacts as follows:

Sect. 13 (11). The expression "court of summary jurisdiction" shall mean any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, whether in England, Wales, or Ireland, and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law.

The justices conceived that this definition of "court of summary jurisdiction" must be governed by the words "to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts"; otherwise the words at the end of the section would mean justices acting in any capacity whatever.

Their jurisdiction was not given to them in this matter under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but under special Acts relating to jurors. They could only sit in special sessions within the last seven days of September (6 Geo. 4, c. 50, s. 10), with an adjournment thereof within another seven days (25 & 26 Vict. c. 107, the Juries Act 1862, s. 8).

It was held that justices sitting in special sessions for licensing matters were not a court of summary jurisdiction (Boulter v. Kent Justices, 77 L. T. Rep. 288; (1897) A. C. 556); nor were justices sitting at special sessions for granting game licences (Reg. v. Bird and others, 62 J. P. 309).

For these reasons the justices considered it doubtful whether, sitting as they were at a special petty sessions under sect. 10 of the Juries Act 1825 for reviewing the lists of jurors, they had power to state a special case for the opinion of the court, and they submitted that point for the decision of the court.

Sect. 8 of the Juries Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 50) provides that churchwardens and overseers are to make out lists of every man residing within their parishes or townships who shall be qualified and liable to serve on juries; and sect. 9 provides that, having made out the list, the churchwardens and overseers shall fix a true copy of the same upon the church doors, with a notice subjoined thereto stating that all objections to the list will be heard by the justices at a time and place to be mentioned in such notice, and shall sign their names at the foot of such copy.

Sect. 10 provides:

The justices of the peace in every division in England and Wales shall hold a special petty sessions for the purposes herein mentioned, within the last seven days of September in every year, on some day and at some place, of which notice shall be given by their clerk before the 20th day of August next preceding, to the churchwardens and overseers of every parish, and to the overseers of every township, within such division, and the churchwardens and overseers of each parish, and the overseers of each township, shall then and there produce the list of men qualified and liable to serve on juries as aforesaid, within their respective parishes or townships, by them prepared and made out, as hereinbefore directed, and shall answer upon oath such questions touching the same as shall be put to them, or any of them, by the justices then present; and if any man, not qualified and liable to serve on juries as aforesaid, is inserted in any such list, it shall be lawful for the said justices, upon satisfaction from the oath of the party complaining, or other proof, or upon their own knowledge, that he is not qualified and liable to serve on juries, to strike his name out of such list, and also to strike thereout the names of men disabled by lunacy or imbecility of mind, or by deafness, blindness, or other permanent infirmity of body, from serving on juries; and it shall also be lawful for such justices to insert in such list the name of any man omitted therein, and likewise to reform any errors or omissions which shall appear to them to have been committed in respect to the name, place of abode, title, quality, calling, business, or the nature of the qualification of any man included in any such list. . . ."

Morton Smith for the appellant.—The preliminary question is whether the justices had power to state a special case. The justices were sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, and they had power to state a case. They were sitting and acting under the provisions of sect. 10 of the Juries Act 1825 as a "special petty sessions" for revising the jurors' lists; and they were therefore a court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. A "special petty sessions" is simply a "petty

HAGMAIER (app.) v. OVERSEERS OF WILLESDEN (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

sessions" held for special purposes. The old term for a court of summary jurisdiction was a petty sessions court, and every petty sessions court is a court of summary jurisdiction. At the time this Act was passed in the reign of George IV. justices sitting together were called justices sitting in special petty sessions, and the court was called a special petty sessions court or a petty sessions court. Now they are called a court of summary jurisdiction, but the former was the title they held until the Summary Jurisdiction Acts clothed them with the name of "court of summary jurisdiction." The definition of "court of summary jurisdiction" is given in sect. 13, sub-sect. 11, of the Interpretation Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), and that definition includes any justice or justices, whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, "or under any other Act," or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law. That definition could scarcely be more comprehensive, and it shows that justices may be a court of summary jurisdiction, not only when they are acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but also when they are acting "under any other Act." Here the justices were sitting and acting under some other Act—namely, the Juries Act 1825. The definition of "court of summary jurisdiction" in force before the Interpretation Act of 1889 was given in sect. 50 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), which was: "Any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is or are authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of such Acts. This definition was added to by the Interpretation Act 1889, by adding on the words: "Or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law"; showing the clear intention of the Legislature that a court of summary jurisdiction should not be confined to justices acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, but should be extended so as to include justices acting under any other Act whatever. In the next sub-section (sub-sect. 12 of sect. 13 of the Act of 1889) "petty sessional court" is defined as meaning "a court of summary jurisdiction, consisting of two or more justices when sitting in a petty sessional court-house," and so forth. The justices in the present case come within that definition and are a court of summary jurisdiction, and being a court of summary jurisdiction, they have power to state a case, under sect. 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, on the application of any person aggrieved by their order. The two cases which seem to have been decided against the appellant's contention are Boulter v. Kent Justices (77 L. T. Rep. 288; (1897) A. C. 556) and Reg. v. Bird and others (62 J. P. 309). Those cases are distinguishable. In Boulter v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.) the justices were sitting at the general annual licensing meeting, and the decision of the House of Lords was that they were not a court at all, and therefore not a court of summary jurisdiction, and Lord Halsbury, L.C. in his judgment says that they were not a court at all. That case, therefore, is distinguishable on the ground that the justices were sitting as an administrative body, and were not a court. The next time the question arose whether justices were a court of summary jurisdiction was in

Vol. XC., 2333.

Reg. v. Bird and others (ubi sup.), in which an application was made to licensing justices for a licence to deal in game, and the same answer applies. The only other case in which the question seems to have arisen as to the power to state a case is Re Bethel (63 J. P. 453), which was an application made to justices by William Bethel for an order under sect. 299 of the Lunacy Act 1890. There it was held that the justices were not a court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore had no power to state a case. The answer to that case is that the application under that section was one that could be made to one justice sitting alone, and one justice sitting alone cannot be a court of summary jurisdiction except specially made so by statute, as in the case of metropolitan police and stipendiary magistrates. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—That case seems to show that the court, to state a case under these sections, must be sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore, if you can show that this court was sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction, it carries you a long way.] Under this sub-section of the Act of 1889, justices sitting to hear an application for the issue of a distress warrant for nonpayment of poor rates have power to state a case:

Fourth City Mutual Building Society v. Churchwardens, &c., of East Ham, (1892) 1 Q. B. 661.

[Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The point is whether the justices were acting as a court of summary jurisdiction in settling this list. I presume there is no other power given to them to state a case except that given in sect. 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879.] That seems to be so, as under sect. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43) a case could only be stated on the hearing of an "information or complaint," and the present case would not come within those words. Unless by case stated there can be no appeal, as by the Juries Act 1870, s. 12, the list, when revised by the justices, is made absolutely conclusive.

The respondents did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The point raised by the magistrates as to their power to state a special case, which counsel has argued before us, is certainly one of difficulty; and, if our decision that there is no power to state a special case should be found to be right, it is desirable that the matter should be made plain, if it is thought advisable that there should be means of questioning the discretion or the exercise of jurisdiction of the magistrates under sect. 10 of the Juries Act 1825. The power to state a special case is now given by the words of sect. 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879: "Any person aggrieved who desires to question a conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction on the ground that it is erroneous in point of law, or is in excess of jurisdiction, may apply to the court to state a special case." Those words are wider than the words of the former section giving power to state a case—namely, sect. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1857. They are a re-enactment of the provisions of the old Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1857, with the subsequent Act, and they contain the words, not "information or complaint," as the earlier Act did, but "conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction"; but they still leave untouched the question of whether or not the body that is acting, or is called upon to state a special case, is a court of summary jurisdiction. Then, in order to make out that this court was a court of summary jurisdiction, counsel has called our attention to sub-sect. 11 of sect. 13 of the Interpretation Act of 1889, which says: "The expression 'court of summary jurisdiction' shall mean any justice or justices of the peace, or other magistrate, by whatever name called, to whom jurisdiction is given by, or who is authorised to act under, the Summary Jurisdiction Acts"—it is not, of course, contended that the justices in the present case fulfil or come within those words—"whether in England, Wales, or Ireland, and whether acting under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them, or under any other Act, or by virtue of his commission, or under the common law." In my opinion, that latter part of the section practically implies that the justices are acting as a court of summary jurisdiction; that they are, so to speak, exercising the same sort of jurisdiction as is intended to be exercised by a court of summary jurisdiction, though that jurisdiction may be given by some other Act, or by common law, and not directly under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or any of them. The question which we have to consider is whether or not, when the justices sit in special petty sessions under sect. 10 of the Juries Act of 1825, for revising the lists of persons liable to serve on juries, that is a court of summary jurisdiction within the meaning of the Interpretation Act 1889, s. 13, sub-s. 11. I do not think that the question can be answered simply by the suggestion that they are a court of petty sessions. I quite agree that courts of petty sessions may have powers under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts and may act under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; but it seems to me that courts of petty sessions were perfectly well known at the time of the Interpretation Act of 1889; and the next sub-section of sect. 13 of the Interpretation Act deals with petty sessional courts and refers to them as being courts of summary jurisdiction consisting of two or more justices, when sitting in a petty sessional court-house, and so on. If it had been intended in the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 to say that all magistrates sitting in petty sessions should have power to state a case, one would not expect to find the language "Any person aggrieved who desires to question a conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction." Looking at the purview of sect. 10 of the Juries Act of 1825, and the object of that section, it seems to me, speaking for myself, that the class or sort of jurisdiction there exercised is not such jurisdiction as would be rightly described as being under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, or under other Acts giving what I may call similar powers to the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. The overseers have to sign the list (sect. 9). They have to justify it by being present there and answering any questions upon it, and, if any man not qualified and liable to serve is inserted in such list, "it shall be lawful for the justices, upon satisfaction from the oath of the party complaining, or other proof, or upon their own knowledge, that he is not qualified and liable to serve on juries, to strike his name out of such list," and so on. It seems to me that that is a class of jurisdiction which can scarcely be aptly described as the proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction. It is like a public authority who know the neighbourhood, who are allowed to act upon their own knowledge, and who really are not bound and fettered by the ordinary rules of evidence, as, of course, they ought not to be when they are proceeding to revise this list, as to which they have a good deal of personal knowledge; and I cannot help thinking that it would require clearer words than are contained even in the extended provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 to justify us in coming to the conclusion that these justices constituted that class of court which has power to state a special case. In my opinion, therefore, the objection raised by the magistrates—namely, that they had no power to state a special case—is one to which we must give effect, and consequently we ought not to entertain this special case.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to add to what my Lord has said by pointing out that the expression "petty sessional court," as used in sub-sect. 12 of sect. 13 of the Interpretation Act 1889, is a comparatively modern phrase. I doubt exceedingly whether it could even be found in any Act passed more than fifty years ago, although there are expressions to be found in Acts passed long before—for instance, in this Juries Act—namely, "petty sessions," or "special petty sessions." I cannot help thinking that if the Interpretation Act, properly considered, had intended to include those expressions as well as "petty sessional court," it would have said so. I think there is a reason for the distinction—that is to say, "petty sessional court" being a phrase of modern origin, in all probability it will be found that it never is used unless the tribunal or meeting of justices, to which it is applied, was really exercising judicial powers and judicial functions. Therefore there may be a very good reason for saying that, wherever the term "petty sessional court" is used, the phrase shall mean and shall involve that the tribunal is a court of summary jurisdiction, whereas it would be a very considerable extension of the existing notions upon the subject to bring all meetings of justices in petty sessions into the same category and say that they are to be looked upon as having the same power as a court of summary jurisdiction, which would, of course, give them the power of stating a case. If the Juries Act of 1825, instead of saying "special petty sessions," had said that they shall hold a "petty sessional court," there would have been no doubt that the Interpretation Act of 1889 would have made them a court of summary jurisdiction. I am quite confident that in the year 1825, when the Juries Act was passed, the phraseology "petty sessional court" was never used.

KENNEDY, J.—I concur in the judgment of my Lord.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Easement—Ancient lights—Substantial interference—Sufficient light for ordinary purposes—Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71).

Where the light which the respondents had enjoyed for more than twenty years had been interfered with by the appellant's building, but not to such an extent as to make it insufficient for ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business:

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that they were not entitled to relief.

The Prescription Act has not in any way altered the pre-existing law in that respect.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.), reported 85 L. T. Rep. 701; (1902) 1 Ch. 302, who had reversed a decision of Joyce, J., reported 83 L. T. Rep. 759.

The respondents brought the action against the appellant claiming an injunction to restrain him from erecting in Worship-street, in the city of London, any building which would darken, injure, or obstruct any ancient lights of the plaintiffs.

The question in dispute related to the windows on the ground-floor of the plaintiffs' building, which was used as a clerk's office, and had, as was admitted, enjoyed light for more than twenty years. The room was an unusually long one, with no window at the back, and in ordinary weather it was usually necessary to use artificial light at the back part of the room. It was admitted that the erection of the defendant's building would diminish the amount of light previously enjoyed, but it was proved that it would leave sufficient light for all ordinary business purposes.

Joyce, J. gave judgment for the defendant, but his judgment was reversed as above mentioned.

The defendant appealed to the House of Lords.

May 15, 18, 19, and 22, 1903.—The case was argued before the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), Lords Shand, Davey, and Robertson.

R. Bray, K.C., O. L. Clare, and Nutter appeared for the appellant, and contended that the owner of the dominant tenement was only entitled to a reasonable amount of light for ordinary purposes, and the burden of proof of damage is on him. The evidence here is that there was sufficient light for an ordinary room, but not for this particular room, which was unusually large and deep. The Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) has not affected the extent of the right, but only the method of establishing it. See the series of authorities beginning with Haldane, K.C., T. R. Hughes, K.C., and Vernon, for the respondents, argued that the decision in Warren v. Brown shows that a right to an extraordinary amount of light may be acquired by prescription, but this case does not go as far as that case. See also

[The LORD CHANCELLOR.—That seems rather a surprising decision.] The effect of the authorities is that if a building, apart from its use for any special purpose, has enjoyed light for twenty years, and a neighbour's building operations cause a material diminution of that light, which makes the building less habitable, or more uncomfortable, or less fitted for ordinary business purposes, then there is a right of action; and the evidence shows that to be the case in this case.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 2, 1904.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case, which was tried before Joyce, J., the learned judge gave judgment for the defendants upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove any actionable wrong, although he found that the erection of the buildings of which the plaintiff complained had appreciably diminished the light which the plaintiff had previously enjoyed. The Court of Appeal, as I understand their judgment, thought this wrong, and ordered a mandatory injunction to pull the premises down so as to restore all the light that had been previously enjoyed. If this principle should be sanctioned by your Lordships, it would be for the first time that, in this House at all events, such a principle had been determined. I do not deny that authorities may be found for it, some of which have been cited at the Bar; but I do not think that the exact question which is now in debate has ever been brought before this House until now. The question may be very simply stated thus: After an enjoyment of light for twenty years, or if the question arose before the Act for such a period as would justify the presumption of a lost grant, would the owner of the tenement in respect of which such enjoyment had been possessed be entitled to all the light without any diminution whatsoever at the end of such a period? If that were the law it would be very far-reaching in its consequences, and the application of it to its strict logical conclusion would render it almost impossible for towns to grow, and would formidably restrict the rights of people to utilise their own land. Strictly applied it would undoubtedly prevent many buildings which have hitherto been admitted to be too far removed from others to be actionable; but if the broad proposition which underlies the judgment of the Court of Appeal be true, it is not a question of 45 degrees, but any appreciable diminution of light which has been enjoyed (that is to say, has existed uninterruptedly) for twenty years constitutes a right of action, and gives a right to the proprietor of a tenement that has had this enjoyment to prevent his neighbour from building on his own land. I do not think that this is the law. The argument seems to me to rest upon a false analogy, as though the access to and enjoyment of light constituted a sort of proprietary right in the light itself. Light, like air, is the common property of all, or, to speak more accurately, it is the common right of all to enjoy it, but it is the exclusive property of none. If the same proposition against which I am protesting could be maintained in respect of air, the progressive building of any town would be impossible. The access of air is undoubtedly interfered with by the buildings which are being built every day round London. The difference between the town and country is very appreciable to the dweller in cities when he goes to the open country or to the top of a mountain or even a small hill in the country, but would the possessor for twenty years of a house on the edge of a town be at liberty to restrain his neighbour from building near him because he had enjoyed the free access of air without buildings near him for twenty years? No doubt this is an extreme case, but it is one of the extreme cases which tries the principle. The truth is that, though there were objections to asking a jury whether the enjoyment talis qualis was such that they might presume a lost grant when nobody supposed that such a grant was ever really made, yet it gave the opportunity of considering what was the extent of the supposed grant, and if anything so extreme as I have just supposed were claimed no jurymen in their senses would have affirmed such a grant. The statute upon which reliance is placed in this case illustrates the danger of attempting to put a principle of law into the iron framework of a statute. The statute literally construed by the use of the words "the light" would mean all the light which for twenty years has existed in the surroundings of the tenement which has enjoyed it; yet, singularly enough, there has been a complete uniformity of decision upon the construction of the statute that it has made no difference in the right conferred, but is only concerned with the mode of proof; but though I quite concur with this construction, which is supported by an overwhelming body of authority, yet I cannot but think that the language of the statute has led to some of the decisions which your Lordships are now called upon to review. Certainly, in the older decisions which have been brought to your Lordships' notice in Mr. Bray's very able argument the proposition which, as I have said, underlies the judgment now under appeal finds no place. Lord Hardwicke, long ago in 1752 (Fishmongers' Company v. East India Company, 1 Dickens, 163), dealing with this very question, the alleged obstruction to light, laid down what I believe to be law to-day. "It is not sufficient," he said, "to say that it will alter the plaintiff's light, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city, and here there will be 17ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance." Lord Cranworth, in Clarke v. Clark (13 L. T. Rep. 482; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 16), adopted the same test, and his observation, though a subsequent decision of his seemed to throw doubt upon it, has received the assent of some of the most learned judges who ever sat upon the English Bench. I think that the whole subject has been confused by certain decisions which were dependent on the facts proved, and were incautiously reported as laying down principles of law, when they were, in my view, only intended to be findings of fact in that particular case. At all events, I am prepared to hold that the test given by Lord Hardwicke is the true one, and I do not think that a better example could be found than the present case to show to what extravagant results the other theory leads. The owner of a tenement on one side of a street 40ft. wide seeks to restrain his opposite neighbour from erecting a house which, when erected, will not then be of the same height as the house belonging to the complaining neighbour, and the only plausible ground on which the complaint rests is that on the ground-floor he has a room not built in the ordinary way of rooms in an ordinary dwelling-house, but built so that one long room goes through the whole width of the house to a back wall and has no window at the back or sides, and was, therefore, at the back of it, too dark for some purposes without the use of artificial light even before the building on the other side of the street was erected. I think that no tribunal ought to find as a fact that the building is a nuisance; and altogether apart from the inappropriateness of the remedy by injunction, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendant. The test of the right is, I think, whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance, and, as it appears to me, the value of the test makes the amount of right acquired depend upon the surroundings and circumstances of light coming from other sources, as well as the question of the proximity of the building complained of. What may be called the uncertainty of the test may also be described as its elasticity. A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise as if he lived in the country, and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell, and noise may give a cause of action, but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and whether in each case it amounts to a nuisance which will give a right of action. I have not thought it necessary to enter into a discussion of the authorities, because I think that it has been most carefully and accurately done by Wright, J. in Warren v. Brown (83 L. T. Rep. 313; (1900) 2 Q. B. 722). Of course, it must be taken that the foundation of this judgment rests upon the finding of fact by Joyce, J., that the buildings of the defendant had not so materially interfered with the light previously enjoyed by the plaintiff as to amount to a nuisance. It follows that, in my judgment, the case of Warren v. Brown was rightly decided by Wright, J., and ought to have been affirmed by the Court of Appeal. It was, however, reversed in accordance with the same views which guided that court in the case now under review. For the reasons which I have given I have to move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and the judgment of Joyce, J. restored, and that the respondents do pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: The right of a person who is owner or occupier of a building with windows in it, privileged as ancient lights, in regard to the protection of the light coming to those windows is a purely legal right. It is an easement belonging to the class known as negative easements. It is nothing more or less than the right to prevent the owner or occupier of an adjoining tenement from building or placing on his own land anything which has the effect of illegally obstructing or obscuring the light of the dominant tenement. This right in early times was vindicated by an action on the case for nuisance, in which damages might be recovered and judgment had for removal or abatement of the nuisance: (Baten's case, 9 Rep. 53). In Aldred's case (9 Rep. 57a) Lord Coke says that an action lies for nuisance done to light as one of the three essential requisites of habitation. "An action lies," he says, "for hindrance of the light, for the ancient form of the action was significant, sc.—quod messuagium horridâ tenebritate obscuravit." It was not every diminution of light that would support such an action. The form of the action itself shows that. In later times when an action for the protection of ancient lights came to be regarded rather as an action for disturbance of an easement than an action grounded on nuisance—as an action to prevent the infringement of a right rather than an action to redress a wrong—the necessity of showing the gravity of the injury complained of was not so obviously apparent. Still the principle was the same, and it must always be the same. "It is not sufficient," as Lord Hardwicke observed in Fishmongers' Company v. East India Company, "to say it will alter the plaintiff's lights. . . . The law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance": (1 Dickens, 163). Probably the most satisfactory statement of the rule to be applied in all cases of ancient lights is to be found in Back v. Stacey (2 C. & P. 465) and Parker v. Smith (5 C. & P. 438). Back v. Stacey was an issue directed by the Lord Chancellor to try two questions—(1) Whether the ancient lights of the plaintiff in his dwelling-house in Norwich had been "illegally" obstructed by a building of the defendant; and (2), if so, what damage the plaintiff had sustained in respect of the injury. So that if the jury had found that the obstruction complained of was an illegal obstruction the damages would have gone to the whole of the injury and not merely to the loss sustained up to the date of the writ. It was contended there that as it was evident that the quantity of light previously enjoyed had been diminished the plaintiff was at any rate entitled to a verdict on the first issue, any obstruction of ancient lights being illegal. But according to the report, "Best, C.J. told the jury, who had viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient lights had undergone. It was not sufficient, to constitute an illegal obstruction, that the plaintiff had in fact less light than before, nor that his warehouse, the part of his house principally affected, could not be used for all the purposes to which it might otherwise have been applied. In order to give a right of action and sustain the issue there must be a substantial privation of light, sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) on the premises as beneficially as he had formerly done. His Lordship added that it might be difficult to draw the line, but the jury must distinguish between a partial inconvenience and a real injury to the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the premises." Back v. Stacey was determined in 1826. Parker v. Smith was heard during the sittings after Michaelmas Term 1832. It is, I think, the earliest reported case dealing with the question of light after the passing of the Prescription Act, which came into operation on the first day of Michaelmas Term 1832. It was tried before Tindal, C.J. The marginal note states, accurately I think, the effect of the decision in these words: "That diminution of light and air which the law recognises as the ground of an action against a party who builds near another's premises is such as really makes them to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business or occupation." It does not seem to have been suggested either by the counsel or by the judge that the Prescription Act had made the slightest alteration in the nature of the right to light or the principle on which the question of an alleged infringement of that right ought to be determined. To these two cases I would only add the case of Wells v. Ody (7 C. & P. 410), before Parke, B. in 1836. In his charge to the jury the learned judge said that he entirely adopted the law as laid down by Tindal, C.J. in Parker v. Smith. And then, after reading a passage from Parker v. Smith, he concluded his address to the jury by saying: "The question, therefore, which I shall leave to you is whether the effect of the defendant's building is to diminish the light and air so as sensibly to affect the occupation of the plaintiff's premises and make them less fit for occupation." So much for the right at law. Courts of equity had no original jurisdiction in the matter. Their province was simply to grant an injunction in aid of the legal right where there was danger of irreparable mischief or where an injunction was required to prevent multiplicity of actions. Under Lord Cairns' Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27), the court was empowered, in all cases in which it had jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction. The Act commonly known as Sir John Rolt's Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 42) provided that in all cases in which any relief or remedy within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was sought, whether the title to such relief or remedy was or was not incident to or dependent upon a legal right, every question of law or fact cognisable in a court of common law on the determination of which the title to such relief or remedy depended, should be determined by or before the same court. These Acts are superseded by the Judicature Act, and now the High Court has all the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and of the several courts of law. But still, so far as the right in question is a legal right, the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, must be guided by the principles established at law. And those principles, in my opinion, are still to be found most clearly and most concisely exhibited in the cases before Best, C.J. and Tindal, C.J. to which I have already referred. Although the question thus stated appears tolerably simple, it cannot be disputed that the reported cases on questions of light in recent times are not altogether consistent. There seem to be two divergent views, neither of which, I think, is absolutely accurate. The extreme view on one side is that the right which is acquired by so-called statutory prescription is a right to a continuance of the whole or substantially the whole quantity of light which has come to the windows during a period of twenty years. This view is conspicuous in Calcraft v. Thompson (15 W. R. 387, before Lord Chelmsford, L.C., and in Scott v. Pape (54 L. T. Rep. 399; 31 Ch. Div. 554), where Cotton, L.J. speaks of a "cone of light" and Bowen, L.J. of "a specific quantity of light" as the measure of the plaintiff's right. The extreme view on the other side is that the right is limited to a sufficient quantity of light for ordinary purposes. I think that this divergence of view comes from a difference of opinion, consciously or unconsciously entertained, as to the meaning and effect of the provisions of the Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), and if I am not mistaken it may be traced to certain expressions, not; perhaps sufficiently guarded, which are to be found in judgments delivered in this House in the case of Tapling v. Jones (12 L. T. Rep. 555; 11 H. L. 290). In that case Lord Westbury, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Chelmsford all assume that a period of twenty years' enjoyment of the access and use of light to a building creates an absolute and indefeasible right immediately on the expiration of the period of twenty years. No doubt sect. 3 says so in terms, but sect. 4 must be read in connection with sect. 3, and if the two sections are read together it will be seen that the period is not a period in gross, but a period next before some suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into question. Unless and until the claim or matter is thus brought into question no absolute or indefeasible right can arise under the Act. There is what has been described as an inchoate right. The owner of the dominant tenement after twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment is in a position to avail himself of the Act if his claim is brought into question. But in the meantime, however long the enjoyment may have been, his right is just the same, and the origin of his right is just the same as if the Act had never been passed. No title is as yet acquired under the Act. This point seems to have been much discussed shortly after the Act was passed. It was finally settled in a series of cases at common law, beginning, I think, with Wright v. Williams (1 M. & W. 77), and including Richards v. Fry (7 A. & E. 698) and Cooper v. Hubback (12 C. B. N. S. 456), in which there is an interesting controversy between Willes and Williams, J.J. on the question whether the twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment under the 3rd section is the period of twenty years before any suit or action or twenty years before each suit or action in which the point may from time to time arise. The former construction, in which Erle, C.J. and Byles, J. concurred with Willes, J., eventually prevailed. The question is of little or no practical importance. But the construction established by the series of decisions to which I have referred, in accordance with the express language of the statute, goes, I think, a long way to show that the view taken by James and Mellish, L.J.J. and Lord Selborne as to the effect of the Act is absolutely correct, and that the qualification suggested by Bowen, L.J. in Scott v. Pape (ubi sup.) is not well founded. It certainly would be strange if the court had been compelled to hold that the Prescription Act confers upon a person whose right is questionable, at least to this extent that it has been actually brought into question, a higher and a larger right than that possessed by a person whose prescriptive claim to the enjoyment of light is so clear as to be beyond all question. I have, therefore, no doubt that the Prescription Act has not in the slightest degree altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of the right of access of light or the principle on which it is to be determined in any particular case whether the right has been infringed. Now, if this be so, it seems to me, in accordance with the opinion expressed by James and Brett, L.JJ. in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino (42 L. T. Rep. 201; 14 Ch. Div. 213), and by many other judges, that the direction given by Best, C.J. in Back v. Stacey is the direction which a court exercising the functions of both judge and jury ought to keep steadily in view. Having come to this conclusion, I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with any comments upon the mass of cases by which in comparatively modern times the question has been elucidated or obscured. It is enough, I think, to refer to what was said in Kelk v. Pearson (ubi sup.), City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant (ubi sup.), and Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino (ubi sup.). Speaking for myself I doubt very much whether it is a profitable task to re-try actions which depend simply on questions of fact or to review and endeavour to reconcile or distinguish a number of cases that naturally enough contain some statements which, taken by themselves and apart from the context, may seem to be contradictory, but must all proceed upon the same principle. It would only be another link in the embarrassing chain of authority, or, if I may venture to say so, only another handful of dust to be cast into one scale or the other when the claims of opposing litigants come to be weighed in the balance. I think there is much good sense in the observations of Brett, L.J. in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino: "To my mind," said his Lordship, "the taking some expression of a judge used in deciding a question of fact as to his own view of some one fact being material on a particular occasion as laying down a rule of conduct for other judges in considering a similar state of facts in another case is a false mode of treating authority. It appears to me that the view of a learned judge in a particular case as to the value of a particular piece of evidence is of no use to other judges who have to determine a similar question of fact in other cases where there may be many different circumstances to be taken into consideration." If I may trespass for a few minutes longer on your Lordships' attention, I would rather spend the time in making one or two practical suggestions. I do not put them forward as carrying any authority. But they may possibly be of use to those who have to try such questions as this, if and so far as they appear to be consistent with good sense. It will be observed that in Back v. Stacey the learned judge told the jury who had viewed the buildings that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient light had undergone. Now, a judge who exercises the functions of both judge and jury cannot be expected to view the buildings himself, even if he considers himself an expert in such matters. But I have often wondered why the court does not more frequently avail itself of the power of calling in a competent adviser to report to the court upon the question. There are plenty of experienced surveyors accustomed to deal with large properties in London who might be trusted to make a perfectly fair and impartial report, subject, of course, to examination in court if required. I am not in the least surprised that the plaintiffs in the present case objected to a report from a disinterested surveyor; but, in my opinion, the court ought to have obtained such a report for its own guidance. Then, with regard to giving damages in addition to or substitution for an injunction—that, no doubt, is a delicate matter. It is a matter for the discretion of the court, and the discretion is a judicial discretion. It has been said that an injunction ought to be granted when substantial damages would be given at law. I have some difficulty in following out this rule. I observe that in some cases juries have been directed to give 1s. damages as a notice to the defendant to remove the obstruction complained of. And then, if the obstruction was not removed, in a subsequent action the damages were largely increased. In others a substantial sum has been awarded to be reduced to nominal damages on removal of the obstruction. But the recovery of damages, whatever the amount may be, indicates a violation of right, and in former times, unless there were something special in the case, would have entitled the plaintiff as of course to an injunction in equity. I rather doubt whether the amount of the damages which may be supposed to be recoverable at law affords a satisfactory test. In some cases, of course, an injunction is necessary—if, for instance, the injury cannot fairly be compensated by money; if the defendant has acted in a high-handed manner; if he has endeavoured to steal a march upon the plaintiff or to evade the jurisdiction of the court. In all these cases an injunction is necessary, in order to do justice to the plaintiff and as a warning to others. But if there is really a question as to whether the obstruction is legal or not, and if the defendant has acted fairly and not in an unneighbourly spirit, I am disposed to think that the court ought to incline to damages rather than to an injunction. It is quite true that a man ought not to be compelled to part with his property against his will, or to have the value of his property diminished, without an Act of Parliament. On the other hand, the court ought to be very careful not to allow an action for the protection of ancient lights to be used as a means of extorting money. Often a person who is engaged in a large building scheme has to pay money right and left in order to avoid litigation, which will put him to even greater expense by delaying his proceedings. As far as my own experience goes, there is quite as much oppression on the part of those who invoke the assistance of the court to protect some ancient lights which they have never before considered of any great value as there is on the part of those who are improving the neighbourhood by the erection of buildings that must necessarily to some extent interfere with the light of adjoining premises. The common form of injunction which has been in use since the case of Yates v. Jack (14 L. T. Rep. 151; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 295) is not, I think, altogether free from objection. I think it would be better that the order, when expressed in general terms, should restrain the defendant from erecting any building so as to cause a nuisance or illegal obstruction to the plaintiff's ancient windows, as the same existed previously to the taking down of the house which formerly stood on the site of the defendant's new buildings. If the action is brought to a hearing before the defendant's new buildings are completed, and there seems to be good ground for the plaintiff's apprehensions, an order, I think, might be conveniently made in that form, with costs up to the hearing, and liberty to the plaintiff within a fixed time after completion to apply for further relief by way of mandatory injunction or damages as he might be advised. With the present case I may deal very briefly. It cannot be disputed that some diminution of light is caused by the defendant's buildings, but such as it is I think it is exactly what Best, C.J. described as partial inconvenience rather than serious injury. I am satisfied that if the case had been tried at law before the question was so much embarrassed by the multiplicity of decisions no jury would have given any damages. Perhaps I ought to add a word about Warren v. Brown (ubi sup.), which is referred to in both the judgments below. I cannot say that that case is quite satisfactory to my mind either as dealt with in the court of first instance or in the Court of Appeal. In the court of first instance the learned judge who tried the case found a special verdict, which is not very easy to understand. The room in which the light has been materially diminished "in its present state is," he says, "better lighted than the ground-floor front rooms in many of the principal streets." I do not see what bearing that fact had on the question at issue. Then, instead of keeping in view the direction which judges over and over again have said ought to be kept in view, the learned judge embarks on an inquiry to determine which of two extreme views is correct. I doubt whether either the one or the other can be accepted as a safe guide without qualification. The Court of Appeal in their turn, instead of dealing with the facts of the case before them, combat a particular view, which rightly or wrongly they attribute to Wright, J. I do not think that Warren v. Brown helps one much. I think that the appeal ought to be allowed with costs here and below.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I am of opinion that the finding of the learned judge who tried this action as to the facts of this case is borne out by the evidence, and I accept his finding as the basis of my judgment. After describing the dimensions of the room on the ground-floor of the plaintiffs' house, which is used as an office, Joyce, J. says: "It is, I think, the result of the evidence that it has ordinarily, if not always, been the practice to make use of the electric light in the back part of the room, and a most extraordinary amount of light from the windows in Worship-street would be required to enable the use of the electric light in the back part of the room to be dispensed with, even on ordinary days. Practically, I think, it may be taken that the use of electric or some other artificial light is now and must always be necessary in order to light the back part of the room, even in the daytime. There is no evidence to show that such an extraordinary amount of light has been enjoyed or acquired for anything like the period of twenty years." And the learned judge sums up his finding in these words: "Apart from any question with respect to the back part of the plaintiffs' premises and to the extraordinary light required if it be possible to be obtained so far back in the absence of illumination by electric light, the plaintiffs' premises would still, in my opinion, after the erection of the defendant's building be well and sufficiently lighted for all ordinary purposes of occupancy as a place of business. For all ordinary days they have amply sufficient light—at present they have abundance of light, and are in my opinion unusually well lighted. If, as it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs, they are entitled to the full amount of light now enjoyed without appreciable diminution, the plaintiffs would have a good cause of action upon the erection of the defendant's building, though it might perhaps be doubted whether the diminution that would be caused by the defendant's building if and when erected is sufficiently serious to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction." On these findings the learned judge, following the judgment of Wright, J. in Warren v. Brown (83 L. T. Rep. 318; (1900) 2 Q. B. 722), which had not then been reversed by the Court of Appeal, held that the action failed and must be dismissed. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. The legal grounds of their judgment are contained in a single sentence. "If ancient lights," says Cozens-Hardy, L.J., "are interfered with substantially, and real damage thereby ensues to tenant or owner, then that tenant or owner is entitled to relief." By the expression "interfered with substantially" I understand the Lord Justice to mean "if the amount of light having access to the premises by means of the ancient lights is substantially diminished." This proposition appears to me to assume or imply that the owner of the dominant tenement is entitled to have the full amount of light which has gained access to the tenement by the ancient windows during the previous twenty years maintained without substantial diminution. The "real damage" may be occasioned by an alteration in the internal structure of the dominant tenement which has been made within the period of twenty years or its adaptation within that period to some special use for which an extraordinary amount of light is required, but, nevertheless, if the proposition be sound, the owner or occupier of the tenement is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the light required for his altered buildings or for the special use to which he has put them. In perfect consistency with this view of the law, Vaughan Williams, L.J. expressed a doubt whether the rule of 45 degrees can any longer be applied even as a rough measure. The question for your Lordships to determine is whether this view of the law is correct—or, in other words, what is the true nature and extent in English law of the easement of light. It must be regretfully admitted that the numerous decisions on this subject in the courts are not easily reconcilable and are not infrequently contradictory. No judgment of this House has been referred to, except that in the case of Tapling v. Jones (12 L. T. Rep. 555; 11 H. L. 290), the decision in which does not directly affect the point now before your Lordships. I do not propose to travel through the long catena of authorities. They were copiously referred to at the Bar, and the principal cases are stated and carefully analysed in the judgment of Wright, J. in Warren v. Brown. You will find that in the earlier authorities the obscuration of light to a tenement having ancient lights is dealt with on the footing of a nuisance. In Aldred's case (9 Rep. 57a) the "hindrance of light" is treated in the same category as the nuisance of fouling the air by pigstyes. In Fishmongers'

Company v. East India Company (1 Dickens, 163) Lord Hardwicke said: "As to the question whether the plaintiffs' messuage is an ancient building so as to entitle them to the right of the lights, and whether the plaintiffs' lights will be darkened, I will not determine it here, for if it clearly appeared that what the defendants are doing is what the law considers as a nuisance, I would put it in a way to be tried. . . . But I am of opinion that it is not a nuisance contrary to law, for it is not sufficient to say it will alter the plaintiffs' lights, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on the City, and here there will be 17ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance. It is true the value of the plaintiffs' house may be reduced by rendering the prospect less pleasant, but there is no reason to hinder a man from building on his own ground." Consistent with this view is the direction of Best, C.J. to the jury in the oft-quoted case of Back v. Stacey (ubi sup.). The learned judge said: "It is not sufficient to constitute an illegal obstruction that the plaintiff has in fact less light than before; nor that his warehouse, the part of his house principally affected, cannot be used for all the purposes to which it might otherwise be applied. In order to give a right of action there must be a substantial privation of light, sufficient to render the occupation uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business on the premises as beneficially as he has formerly done." In Clarke v. Clark (13 L. T. Rep. 482; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 16) Lord Cranworth stated the question thus: "Whether the obstruction is such as to deprive the party of such a supply of light as he might reasonably calculate on enjoying." After saying that the plaintiffs' rooms were rendered less cheerful, he adds, "but I cannot think that this is such an obstruction of light as to amount to a nuisance. . . . What the plaintiff is bound to show is that the buildings cause such an obstruction of light as to interfere with the ordinary occupations of life." In Robson v. Whittingham, decided in the following year (13 L. T. Rep. 730; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 442), Knight Bruce and Turner, L.JJ. expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with Lord Cranworth's judgment, and Turner, L.J. accentuated his approval by saying that he thought this class of cases had been carried too far before the decision in Clarke v. Clark was pronounced. Nothing that I can say will add to the respect and authority which the opinions of those two learned and experienced judges must command with your Lordships. It has been thought that the 3rd section of the Prescription Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) altered substantially the previously existing law as to ancient lights, and had the effect of conferring on the owner of the dominant tenement, by twenty years' enjoyment, an absolute and indefeasible right to the full amount of the light enjoyed during that period. And it must be admitted that the language of the section lends some plausibility to that opinion. It is, however, not consistent with the language of Lord Cranworth in Clarke v. Clark, and the point was expressly determined by James and Mellish, L.JJ. in Kelk v. Pearson (24 L. T. Rep. 390; L. Rep. 6 Ch. 809), decided by the year 1871. James, L.J. there says: "I am of opinion that the statute has in no degree whatever altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of this right. The nature and extent of the right before that statute was to have that amount of light through the windows of a house which was sufficient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of that house as a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house if it were a warehouse, shop, or other place of business. That was the extent of the easement, a right to prevent your neighbour from building on his land so as to obstruct the access of sufficient light and air to such an extent as to render the house substantially less comfortable and convenient." The statute, in fact, has only altered the conditions or length of user by which the right may be acquired, but not the nature of the right. In the case of City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant (29 L. T. Rep. 755; L. Rep. 9 Ch. 212), Lord Selborne, L.C. expressed his complete adherence to the view of the law taken in the case of Kelk v. Pearson, correcting some impressions which might have arisen from the language used in some former cases by some learned judges. This doctrine, however, has not been unchallenged. In an Irish case of Mackey v. Scottish Widows' Society (Ir. Rep. 11 Eq. 541), decided in 1877, Christian, L.J. criticised in vigorous language the judgments of James, L.J. and Lord Selborne, and held that the right is to an average maximum of the light which nature has been shedding upon the window for twenty years before the defendant interrupted it. It is also difficult to reconcile the language used by Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. in the case of Scott v. Pope (54 L. T. Rep. 399; 31 Ch. Div. 554), or the language of the Queen's Bench judges in Moore v. Hall (38 L. T. Rep. 419; 3 Q. B. Div. 178), with the decisions in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant, though the authority of those cases was not in terms questioned by them. I regard the decisions in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant as complementary to, and on the same lines with, Lord Cranworth's judgment in Clarke v. Clark. And, so regarding it, I entirely approve of it. Romer, L.J., however, in delivering the judgment of the court in Warren v. Brown (85 L. T. Rep. 444; (1902) 1 K. B. 15), seems to have taken a different view of the effect of Kelk v. Pearson. He says: "Since Kelk v. Pearson it is impossible to hold properly that the statutory right is not interfered with merely because after the interference the house comes up to a supposed standard as to what a house ordinarily requires by way of light for purposes of inhabitancy or business," and he quotes some words used by Mellish, L.J. I must remark that the particular point which was under discussion in Warren v. Brown, and in another form in the present case, was not before the court in Kelk v. Pearson. There was no question there of a claim for protection in the use of an extraordinary amount of light required for some special purpose, or required by some unusual peculiarity in the internal structure of the building. And I regard what was said by Mellish, L.J. as directed to the arguments addressed to the court in that case. According to any standard short of holding that the right is to all the light which has come through the window, the right to light has a ragged edge to it, and it is impossible to assert that any man has a right to a fixed amount of light ascertainable by metes and bounds. I do not think that Mellish, L.J. intended to differ from James, L.J., and in City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant, when James, L.J. repeated the substance of what he had said in the earlier case, Mellish, L.J., according to the report, contented himself with a simple concurrence. I must advert for a few moments to an impression which has been entertained by some distinguished judges, and was the subject of argument at the Bar, to the effect that within the space of a few months Lord Cranworth overruled himself. The judgment in Clarke v. Clark was delivered on the 25th Nov. 1865, and that in Yates v. Jack was delivered on the 24th March 1866. It was thought by Lord Chelmsford in Catcraft v. Thompson that the effect of the later case was to hold the dominant tenement entitled to the whole light that had previously been enjoyed, and Wood, V.C. in Dent v. Auction Mart Company (ubi sup.) to a certain extent shared the same impression. There is not a hint in the judgment in Yates v. Jack which indicates that Lord Cranworth thought that he was departing from the law as laid down in his earlier judgment. Both cases were decided and probably reported before Robson v. Whittingham, but the Lords Justices, as we have seen, adopted Clarke v. Clark as an authority which had their approval. And if the question at issue in Yates v. Jack be looked at, it will be seen that the argument to which Lord Cranworth's judgment was directed was that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to have the ordinary quantity of light because the business which he was carrying on required a diminished quantity only. That was the argument to which Lord Cranworth could not accede. So understood, and reading it by the light of Clarke v. Clark, I do not dissent from the language used by Lord Cranworth in Yates v. Jack: "The right conferred by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71, is an absolute indefeasible right to the enjoyment of the light without reference to the purposes for which it has been used." Your Lordships were told, and my experience at the Bar confirms it, that the order made in Yates v. Jack has been adopted as a common form of order in cases of this description. I think this unfortunate. It was a very proper order to make in that case, and in nineteen cases out of twenty, or perhaps ninety-nine out of 100, where no question arises such as that in the present case, it would be sufficient and appropriate. But it is an erroneous proceeding to deduce an absolute rule of law from the form of an order made in a particular case. In Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie (16 L. T. Rep. 114; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 421) Malins, V.C. held that a person could not, by using the dominant tenement for a period less than twenty years for some special purpose requiring an extraordinary amount of light in excess of what was required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business, entitle himself to protection for such extraordinary requirements, and thereby impose an additional restriction on his neighbour's use of his own land. In that case, as in the present one, it was not proved that the extraordinary amount of light had been used for twenty years. "No man," said the Vice-Chancellor, quoting the words of another judge, "can by any act of his own suddenly impose a new restriction on his neighbour." In their judgment in Warren v. Brown the Court of Appeal dissented from this decision, and their opinion was the logical conclusion from the views which they expressed as to the nature and extent of the easement. I do not concur with the opinion of the Court of Appeal, for I think that the case of Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie was rightly decided. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that it would be contrary to the principles of the law relating to easements that the burden on the servient tenement should be increased or varied from time to time at the will of the owner of the dominant tenement. The easement is for access of light to the building, and if the building retains its substantial identity, or if the ancient lights retain their substantial identity, it does not seem to me to depend on the use which is made of the chambers in it, or to be varied by any alteration which may be made in the internal structure of it. I do not propose to discuss at length the question how far a variation in a tenement will destroy an easement appurtenant to it. The law on that subject is as old as Luttrell's case (4 Rep. 86a). In the case of Martin v. Goble (1 Camp. 320) a malthouse had been converted into a workhouse, and it was held that the house was entitled to the degree of light necessary for a malthouse, not for a dwelling-house. That case has been the subject of much criticism, and I think that some judges have thought that the language of the Lord Chief Baron had a wider scope than it was intended to have. Following the suggestion of Wood, V.C., it may be supported on the ground that (to use the language of Luttrell's case) the alteration affected the substance and not only the quality of the tenement. But while agreeing that a person does not lose his easement by any change in the internal structure of his building or the use to which it is put, and that regard may be had not only to the present use, but also to any ordinary uses to which the tenement is adapted, I think it quite another question whether he is entitled to be protected at the expense of his neighbour in the enjoyment of the light for some special or extraordinary purpose. It is agreed on all hands that a man does not lose or restrict his right to light by non-user of his ancient lights or by not using the full measure of light which the law permits. If that measure be by common law or by the statute, the whole amount of light which has had access to his windows, cadit questio. But if this view of the law be not accepted, you must introduce that "supposed standard" which Romer, L.J. repudiates. If the actual user is not the test where the use falls below the standard of what may reasonably be required for the ordinary uses of inhabitancy and business, why (it may be asked) should it be made a test where the use has been of a special or extraordinary character in excess of that standard. It does seem to me unreasonable to hold that where a man for his own convenience or profit converts two or more rooms of his house into one without making provision for lighting them, or converts a portion of his house into a photographic studio, or puts it to some similar purpose, he can suddenly call upon his neighbour to leave him a supply of light which is rendered necessary only by such alterations, and thereby impose what is in substance and in truth an increased burden on his neighbour. If the action be brought a month before the change it would be dismissed. If it be brought a month afterwards an injunction would be granted. I am of opinion that the courts have gone too far in this question of lights, and have imposed undue restrictions on persons in the exercise of their lawful right to build on their own land. In the second argument before your Lordships the leading counsel for the respondents contended that his clients had for more than twenty years enjoyed the access of light over the appellant's land to their ground-floor office in its present condition. I believe that all your Lordships are agreed with Joyce, J. that there is no proof to support such a contention. The fact relied on was not put in issue at the trial, and the evidence was not directed to it. If the plaintiffs had intended to claim and rely on a special easement of that description, it was for them to state their claim and prove the facts to support it. It is unnecessary to say, therefore, whether such a claim would be good in law. Malins, V.C. thought that it could be sustained if the special user was had with the knowledge of the owner of the servient tenement. I will only say that I see some difficulties in the way, and reserve my opinion. I must apologise for the length at which I have trespassed on your attention. According to both principle and authority, I am of opinion that the owner or occupier of the dominant tenement is entitled to the uninterrupted access through his ancient windows of a quantity of light, the measure of which is what is required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind, and that the question for what purpose he has thought fit to use that light, or the mode in which he finds it convenient to arrange the internal structure of his tenement, does not affect the question. The actual user will neither increase nor diminish the right. The single question in these cases is still what it was in the days of Lord Hardwicke and Lord Eldon, whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance. I do not myself think that this rule is difficult of application in practice. In the majority of cases no such questions as those which have been raised in Warren v. Brown and the present case occur. The experience of surveyors who are practically conversant with this matter is entitled to great respect. As is stated in the evidence, they have adopted a working rule for the purpose of advising those who consult them and settling differences by negotiation. The rule of 45 degrees is not, of course, a rule of law, and is not applicable to every case. But I agree with Lord Selborne in City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant (ubi sup.) that it may properly be used as prima facie evidence. For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed, and the decree of Joyce, J. restored with costs here and below.

COLLS v. HOME AND COLONIAL STORES LIMITED.

[H. OF L.]

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I agree with the judgment of Lord Davey.

Lord LINDLEY.—My Lords: Joyce, J., who was asked to grant an injunction before the defendant's building had been erected, considered that, although the building would sensibly diminish the plaintiffs' light, the diminution would not materially affect their comfort or convenience, and would not be sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to any relief, and he dismissed their action. The Court of Appeal, however, took a different view, and granted a mandatory injunction ordering the defendant to pull down part of his building which had been completed after the injunction had been refused. Hence this appeal. The language of sect. 3 of the Prescription Act 1832 shows that in order to acquire a right to light there must be: First, access and use of light, not access alone. Access here is understood to refer to free passage of light over the servient tenement: (see per Fry, L.J. in Scott v. Pape, ubi sup., and per Kay, J. in Cooper v. Straker, 59 L. T. Rep. 849; 40 Ch. Div. 21). Secondly, such access and use must be to and for some dwelling-house, workshop, or other building (as to which see Harris v. De Pinna, 54 L. T. Rep. 38, 770; 31 Ch. Div. 238.) Thirdly, such access and use must be actually enjoyed therewith. Fourthly, such enjoyment must be without interruption for twenty years. Fifthly, if all these are proved, the right to the access and use of light so enjoyed becomes absolute and indefeasible unless it can be explained by some deed or writing. Pausing here for a moment, it will be observed that the statute does not in terms confer a right to light, but rather assumes its acquisition by use and enjoyment, and declares it to be "absolute and indefeasible." Again, it will be observed that nothing is said about enjoyment as of right; and notwithstanding sect. 5 of the Act, which refers to the enjoyment as of right, it was early decided that as regards light claimed under sect. 3 enjoyment as of right need not be alleged or proved; and that the right, whatever it may be, is acquired by twenty years' use and enjoyment without interruption and without written consent: (see Truscott v. Merchant Taylors' Company, 11 Ex. 855; Frewen v. Phillips, 11 C. B. N. S. 449; Simper v. Foley, 2 J. & H. 555, and Harbidge v. Warwick, 3 Ex. 552). This was not so under the old law. As regards use and enjoyment there are some instructive decisions on unfinished and uninhabited houses, and on windows kept closed by shutters. These decisions show that a right to light may be acquired in respect of a house which has stood for twenty years without being occupied or even finished so as to be fit for occupation; and that the fact that shutters have been closed for some months at a time does not prevent the acquisition of a right to light through the windows: (see Courtauld v. Legh, 20 L. T. Rep. 496; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 126; Cooper v. Straker (ubi sup.); Collis v. Laugher, 71 L. T. Rep. 226; (1894) 3 Ch. 659; and Smith v. Baxter, 82 L. T. Rep. 650; (1900) 2 Ch. 138). These decisions did not, however, turn upon or settle with any precision the amount of light to which a right is acquired by twenty years' user. Nor is the statute clear upon this point. At one time it appears to have been considered that in all cases the size and situation of the aperture through which light had come for twenty years formed both the maximum and minimum measure of the right acquired, without reference to the use and enjoyment of the light which had so come. This view was based on some observations made by Lord Westbury in Tapling v. Jones, and on Lord Cranworth's judgment in Yates v. Jack, which I will notice presently. Lord Chelmsford took the same view in Calcraft v. Thompson. But this view was emphatically negatived by the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Kelk v. Pearson, City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant, and

COLLS v. HOME AND COLONIAL STORES LIMITED.

[H. OF L.]

Leech v. Schweder. In Moore v. Hall, however, both Mellor and Manisty, JJ. adopted the interpretation thus repudiated, but it does not appear that they were aware of the repudiation. Kelk v. Pearson shows that in ordinary cases a person does not necessarily acquire a right to all the light which he has had for twenty years. He may have had more than he reasonably required either for domestic or business purposes; and in that case his right is limited to the amount of light reasonably required. There can be no doubt that Lord Cranworth's language in Yates v. Jack and the form of injunction granted have been regarded as authorities for the view that in all cases the statute confers a right to all the light which has come to a window for twenty years; and there are passages in the judgments of Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. in Scott v. Pape which support the same view. This is to be regretted, as it has tended to unsettle the rule laid down in Kelk v. Pearson. The decision in Yates v. Jack did not, however, really go so far as has been supposed, for the plaintiff's windows were darkened to such an extent as to render the house much less convenient for purposes of business than it was before. The case did not turn on the mere fact that some diminution of light was proved. The plaintiff's right to light was clearly infringed, whether the measure of the light to which he was entitled was all that had come through his windows, or only so much as was reasonably necessary for business purposes. If these facts are borne in mind, nothing will be found in the actual decision which conflicts with the views previously expressed by Lord Cranworth in Clarke v. Clark, and adopted by the Court of Appeal in the cases already mentioned. The common form of injunction in these cases is that adopted in Yates v. Jack and Dent v. Auction Mart Company. It is to restrain the defendant from erecting any building so as to obstruct the free access of light to the ancient windows of the plaintiff as such access was enjoyed previously to the taking down of the house which formerly stood on the site of the defendant's new buildings. This form is framed upon the supposition that the plaintiff has established his right to the amount of light which he in fact enjoyed before the obstruction complained of. But it by no means follows from the form that everyone is entitled to an injunction who can prove that he has been deprived of some of the light which he in fact had before it was interfered with. He may have had more than he can acquire a right to use and enjoy in future. I am, however, under the impression that this inference has been drawn, and that the form has been regarded as strengthening the view of the law repudiated in Kelk v. Pearson. So to regard the form is, in my opinion, a mistake. The doctrine laid down in Back v. Stacey, as I understand it, is the same as that laid down, although in somewhat different language, by the Court of Appeal in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant, and must, I think, be taken as finally established and as good sound law which this House should adopt, notwithstanding the observations in the Irish case of Mackey v. Scottish Widows' Company. That doctrine, as stated in City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant, is that, generally speaking, an owner of ancient lights is entitled to sufficient light according to the ordinary notions of mankind for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house if it is a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house if it is a warehouse, a shop, or other place of business. The expressions "the ordinary notions of mankind," "comfortable use and enjoyment," and "beneficial use and occupation," introduce elements of uncertainty; but similar uncertainty has always existed, and exists still, in all cases of nuisance; and in this country an obstruction of light has commonly been regarded as a nuisance, although the right to light has been regarded as a peculiar kind of easement. If a more absolute standard had been adopted in all cases certainty would, no doubt, have been gained; but the consequences would frequently have been very oppressive to the owner of the servient tenement, and far more so than under the old law. The owner of the servient tenement could have done nothing on his own land which in fact diminished the light acquired by his neighbour, even if all of it was not wanted for comfortable enjoyment or business purposes. It would follow that the owner of a piece of vacant land opposite to a house in an ordinary street could not build upon it at all after twenty years. The adherence to the old but uncertain standard of comfort and convenience avoids the danger of oppression and extortion, and renders it necessary to take a wider view of each case, especially when an injunction is asked for. The decision in Kelk v. Pearson has a far-reaching effect. If there is no absolute right to all the light which comes to a given window, no action will lie for an obstruction to that light unless the obstruction amounts to a nuisance. If there is no right of action, a fortiori, there is no right to an injunction to prevent a permanent diminution of light unless it amounts to a nuisance. But in considering what is an actionable nuisance regard is had not to special circumstances which cause something to be an annoyance to a particular person, but to the habits and requirements of ordinary people, and it is by no means to be taken for granted that a person who wants an extraordinary amount of light for a particular business can maintain an action for diminution of light if only his special requirements are interfered with: (see, as to nuisances to persons carrying on delicate trades or requiring more comfort or freedom from annoyance than ordinary people, Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315; Crump v. Lambert, 17 L. T. Rep. 133; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 409; and Eastern and South African Telegraph Company v. Cape Town Tramways Company, 86 L. T. Rep. 457; (1902) A. C. 381; and as to the character of the neighbourhood, see St. Helens Smelting Company v. Tipping, 11 H. L. C. 642). The expression "right to light" is sanctioned by the Prescription Act, and is convenient; but its use is apt to lead to error and to forgetfulness of the burden thrown on the servient tenement. This burden, however, ought never to be lost sight of in considering the extent of the right claimed in respect of the dominant tenement. But the adoption of the more flexible standard of comfort and convenience has introduced difficulties of a serious nature, especially when dealing with places of business; and it is not surprising that different views on this subject should have been taken, and that the decisions

COLLS v. HOME AND COLONIAL STORES LIMITED.

upon it should be inconsistent with each other. That they are inconsistent is apparent from the careful review of them by Wright, J. in Warren v. Brown. In applying the rule laid down in Kelk v. Pearson it is impossible to avoid considering how much light is left and where it comes from. But the question to be decided is not how much light is left, but whether the plaintiff has been deprived of so much as to constitute an actionable nuisance. If he has, it is no defence to say that he has as much light left as most other people: (see Dent v. Auction Mart Company, ubi sup.). Too much weight may have been given by Wright, J. to the amount of light left in Warren v. Brown, and this explains the reversal of his decision by the Court of Appeal. There is no rule of law that if a person has 45 degrees of unobstructed light through a particular window left to him he cannot maintain an action for a nuisance caused by diminishing the light which formerly came through that window: (Theed v. Debenham, 2 Ch. Div. 165). But experience shows that it is, generally speaking, a fair working rule to consider that no substantial injury is done to him where an angle of 45 degrees is left to him, especially if there is good light from other directions as well. Cotton, L.J. pointed this out in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino (ubi sup.); see also Parker v. First Avenue Hotel Company (49 L. T. Rep. 318; 24 Ch. Div. 282). As regards light from other quarters, such light cannot be disregarded; for, as pointed out by James, V.C. in Dyers' Company v. King (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 438), the light from other quarters and the light the obstruction of which is complained of may be so much in excess of what is protected by law as to render the interference complained of non-actionable. I apprehend, however, that light to which a right has not been acquired by grant or prescription, and of which the plaintiff may be deprived at any time, ought not to be taken into account. The purpose for which a person may desire to use a particular room or building in future does not either enlarge or diminish the easement which he has acquired. If he chooses in future to use a well-lighted room or building for a lumber room, for which little light is required, he does not lose his right to use the same room or building for some other purpose for which more light is required. Aynsley v. Glover (ubi sup.) is in accordance with this view. But if a room or building has been so built as to be badly lighted, the owner or occupier cannot by enlarging the windows or altering the purpose for which he uses it increase the burden on the servient tenement. Martin v. Goble, where a malthouse was turned into a workhouse, may, I think, be upheld on this principle, and the observations of Wood, V.C. on Martin v. Goble in Dent v. Auction Mart Company support this view. There was in fact no substantial interference with the light to which they were entitled. Coming now to the present case, I am clearly of opinion that no injunction, and certainly no mandatory injunction, ought to have been granted. Joyce, J. was asked for an injunction and he refused it, and, in my opinion, quite rightly. He came to the conclusion that, although there would be a sensible diminution of light and some inconvenience to the plaintiffs, yet they had not established by twenty years' user a right to all the light which they had had, and that the obstruction complained of would not amount to an actionable nuisance, and so infringe the plaintiffs' right. The Court of Appeal, taking a different view of the amount of light to which the plaintiffs were entitled, reversed this decision, and ordered a partial demolition of the buildings erected by the defendant. For the reasons already given, I have come to the conclusion that this was wrong. I should stop here, were it not that I feel very strongly that in any view of the case it was not one for a mandatory injunction. I am convinced that, even if the plaintiffs have a cause of action, the damages which could properly be awarded them would be very small, and to grant a mandatory injunction in such a case as this would be unduly oppressive and not in accordance with the principles on which equitable relief has been usually granted—see Curriers' Company v. Corbett (2 Dr. & Sm. 355), Robson v. Whittingham (ubi sup.), and National Provincial Plate-Glass Insurance Company v. Prudential Assurance Company (37 L. T. Rep. 91; 6 Ch. Div. 757), in all of which an injunction was refused, although the plaintiff's legal right had been infringed. In Warren v. Brown the Court of Appeal only gave damages. The present case is eminently one in which damages would be an adequate remedy, even assuming that the plaintiffs could prove a small nuisance for which some damages could be properly given; and where that is the case an injunction, and especially a mandatory injunction, ought not to issue. The doctrine that where a legal right is continuously infringed an injunction to protect it ought to be granted is subject to qualification, as was carefully explained by Jessel, M.R. in Aynsley v. Glover, and more recently by the Court of Appeal in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Company (72 L. T. Rep. 34; (1895) 2 Ch. 388). The result of the foregoing review of the authorities is not altogether satisfactory. The general principle deducible from them appears to be that the right to light is in truth no more than a right to be protected against a particular form of nuisance, and that an action for the obstruction of light which has in fact been used and enjoyed for twenty years without interruption or written consent, cannot be sustained unless the obstruction amounts to an actionable nuisance; and this often depends upon considerations wider than facts applicable to the particular case. There are elements of uncertainty which render it impossible to lay down any definite rule applicable to all cases. First, there is the uncertainty as to what amount of obstruction constitutes an actionable nuisance; and, secondly, there is the uncertainty as to whether the proper remedy is an injunction or damages. But, notwithstanding these elements of uncertainty, the good sense of judges and juries may be relied upon for adequately protecting rights to light on the one hand, and freedom from unnecessary burdens on the other. There must be consideration for both sides in all these controversies. In this case the Court of Appeal have, in my opinion, gone too far, and the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

Judgment appealed from reversed. Judgment of Joyce J. restored. Respondents to pay the appellant his costs both here and below.

Re DENTON; LICENSES INSURANCE CORPORATION AND GUARANTEE FUND LIMITED v. DENTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Principal and surety—Mortgage—Insurance of mortgage debt—Contract of insurance or suretyship—Covenant by surety with limited liability—Contribution.

By an indenture made between H. of the first part, D. of the second part, and a bank of the third part, H. mortgaged a public-house to secure 4000*l.* and interest, and H. and D. covenanted to pay the 4000*l.* and interest. There was a proviso that D., who was a surety, should not be liable for more than 1000*l.* and interest. H. covenanted to insure the security in the name of the bank with an assurance company. In the proposal for a policy it was stated "D. will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing 1000*l.* of the mortgage money."

An insurance was accordingly effected with the plaintiff company, and by the policy it was provided that the proposal was to be deemed to be incorporated with the policy, and the company agreed that if the mortgagor made default the company would pay the principal and interest; and it was provided that thereupon the bank (therein called the insured) should assign the mortgage debt and all securities to the company, and do all things necessary for the purpose of enforcing any rights or remedies, or of obtaining relief or indemnity from other parties to which the company should be subrogated upon payment under the policy.

The mortgagor having made default, the company paid the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, and moneys expended in preservation of the property, amounting in all to nearly 5000*l.* They realised 4000*l.*, and claimed the balance from D.

Held, that the plaintiff company and D. were not co-sureties; that the company had guaranteed the payment of the money, and D. was liable for the amount claimed.

Decision of Swinfen Eady, J. (89 L. T. Rep. 62; (1903) 2 Ch. 670) reversed.

Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation Limited (70 L. T. Rep. 83; (1894) 1 Q. B. 54) and Craythorne v. Swinburne (14 Ves. 160) followed.

By an indenture dated the 2nd Nov. 1899, made between Maude Harvey of the first part, George Denton of the second part, and the London, City, and Midland Bank of the third part, Maude Harvey demised to the bank a leasehold public-house known as the Lord Palmerston, at Highgate, for the residue of the term for which she held the same, less one day, by way of mortgage to secure the repayment of 4000*l.* and interest. The mortgagor and Denton jointly and severally covenanted with the bank that they or one of them would pay to the bank on demand by them left at the public-house the sum of 4000*l.* with interest, subject, however, to a proviso that Denton should not be liable under the covenant to pay a larger sum in the whole in respect of the principal and interest taken together than 1000*l.*, together with interest on such sum from the time of demand being made on Denton until payment. The mortgagor also covenanted with the bank that she would insure, and at all times during the continuance of the security keep insured, the principal moneys and interest thereby secured against loss in the name of the bank with the plaintiffs, and would not at any time do any act or commit any default whereby the policy of mortgage insurance might be rendered void or voidable; and, in case the policy or any new policy to be effected as aforesaid should by any means become void, forthwith at her own cost effect a new policy for securing the repayment of the said principal sum and interest "as hereinbefore mentioned." It was provided that the powers of sale conferred upon mortgagees by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1881 should be exercisable by the bank at any time after such demand should have been left as aforesaid (whether any of the aforesaid powers should have been exercised or not), without the necessity for giving any such notice requiring payment of the mortgage money as is provided for by the said Act or any notice whatever. The deed concluded with a stipulation that although as between the mortgagor and Denton the latter was a surety only, yet as between him and the bank he was to be considered a principal debtor to the extent of 1000*l.*

A proposal for insurance had already been made by the mortgagor, dated the 28th Oct. 1899, in which it was stated that Denton would "join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing 1000*l.* of the mortgage money."

The policy was headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy," and recited that the bank (therein called the insured) was entitled to 4000*l.* secured by the mortgage and had delivered to the plaintiff company a proposal in writing "for guaranteeing the mortgage debt and interest," and which proposal contained full particulars of the said mortgage and was to be deemed to be incorporated in the policy and to be the basis of the contract of insurance, and had paid the first year's premium; and it was witnessed that:

The corporation agree with the insured (subject to the conditions on the back hereof, which are to be taken as part of this policy) that if the insured shall become entitled under the power of sale conferred by the said mortgage deed or otherwise to sell the mortgaged property, and shall give notice in writing thereof to the corporation, while this policy is in force the corporation will, after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt by the corporation of a claim in writing by the insured requiring payment, pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage with any interest thereon payable as therein mentioned.

(a) Reported by W. C. Bies, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] Re DENTON; LICENSES INSURANCE CORPORATION, &c. v. DENTON. [CT. OF APP.]

The material conditions were:

5. The insured shall before selling or contracting to sell, or advertising for sale, or being party or privy to the sale or advertisement for sale of the whole or any part of the mortgaged property, give not less than one calendar month's notice in writing to the corporation; and the insured shall not at any time sell, or contract to sell, or advertise for sale or be party or privy to the sale or advertisement for sale of, the whole or any part of the mortgaged property for any sum less than the amount due and owing for principal, interest, and costs and otherwise in connection with the mortgage without previously obtaining the consent in writing of the corporation.

7. The corporation may, within three months after the receipt of a claim under this policy, require the insured forthwith to realise the securities for the mortgage debt, and to give authority in writing to the corporation, or to any person or persons nominated by the corporation, to act as agent or agents of the insured for the purpose of realising the securities, but without prejudice to the right of the insured to require the corporation to pay the amount payable under this policy, notwithstanding that the securities, or some of them, have not been fully realised at the expiration of the time provided for payment by the terms of this policy.

8. If at the time a claim is made under this policy there be any other subsisting insurance or insurances, whether effected by the insured or any other person, covering the same interest in the mortgaged property, the corporation shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than their rateable proportion.

9. Upon payment of the amount which may become payable under this policy, the insured shall assign or transfer to the corporation, or their nominee or nominees, the mortgage debt and interest and all securities held by the insured for the same.

10. The insured and any claimant under this policy shall, at the expense of the corporation, do and concur in doing all such acts and things as may be necessary or reasonably required by the corporation for the purpose of enforcing any rights and remedies or of obtaining relief or indemnity from other parties to which the corporation shall be or would become entitled or subrogated upon payment under this policy, whether such acts and things shall be or become necessary or required before or after payment by the corporation.

The mortgagor made default. The plaintiff company paid the bank the mortgage debt, interest, and costs, and moneys expended in the preservation of the property, which amounted in all to nearly 5000*l.* They realised the security, and there was a deficiency amounting to 984*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*

Denton was then dead, and the plaintiff company claimed the deficiency from his executors.

Swinfen Eady, J. held that Denton was a co-surety with the company, and that there must be contribution by the plaintiff company in the proportion that 4000*l.* with the sum actually due for costs, &c., bore to 1000*l.*, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Haldane, K.C. and Owen Thompson for the appellant company.—The company was not a co-surety with Denton, and he has no right to call on them to contribute. Denton was a surety for the whole debt, but his liability was limited to 1000*l.* The company can only be called on to pay if both Denton and the mortgagor fail to do so. This is shown by the fact that the company bargained by condition 9 of the policy that they should on payment of the amount which should become payable have all the securities assigned or transferred to them:

Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160:

White and Tudor's Lead. Cas., vol. 2, 7th edit., p. 340.

There is a difference between a case where the surety joins for the whole debt and where his liability is limited to a particular amount:

Ellis v. Emmanuel, 34 L. T. Rep. 553; 1 Ex. Div. 157.

The form of the obligation undertaken by the company towards the bank shows the company did not enter into a contract of suretyship, but only of insurance or indemnity:

Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation Limited, 70 L. T. Rep. 83; (1894) 1 Q. B. 54, 60;

Finlay v. Mexican Investment Corporation, 76 L. T. Rep. 257; (1897) 1 Q. B. 517.

If the form of the contract is consistent with the relationship of co-sureties, the facts and the form of the mortgage deed negative any such contract, and show that all the company did was to guarantee the bank against any default:

Craythorne v. Swinburne, 14 Ves. 160.

In Seaton v. Heath (80 L. T. Rep. 579; (1899) 1 Q. B. 782, 792) Romer, L.J. discussed the difference between contracts of "insurance" and contracts of "guarantee," and said the difference between those two classes did not depend on the use of those words. The decision of the Court of Appeal in that case was reversed by the House of Lords (82 L. T. Rep. 205; (1900) A. C. 135), but that part of the judgment of Romer, L.J. was not affected. —This was really one transaction, and the documents show that the plaintiff company and Denton were co-sureties for the mortgagor, and therefore Denton is entitled to contribution from the company as between two sureties, as decided by Swinfen Eady, J. This is so though the sureties covenanted to pay the whole sum:

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a claim made by the Licenses Insurance and Guarantee Fund Corporation, as assignees of a mortgage deed, against the estate of Denton (deceased), a party to the mortgage deed, on a covenant therein contained. The only defence raised is that the corporation and Denton are co-sureties for Miss Harvey, the mortgagor, and that Denton is therefore entitled to deduct from the claim of the plaintiff corporation the contribution due as between two co-sureties. The corporation contends that it is not a co-surety with Denton, but is surety both for the principal debtor, the mortgagor, and for Denton, the surety, under the terms of the mortgage deed; and that, this being so, there is no contribution according to the authority of the decision of Lord Eldon in Craythorne v. Swinburne (ubi sup.). The question whether the plaintiffs and defendants stand, or do not stand, in the relation of co-sureties within the meaning of this decision is the only question in the case. Swinfen Eady, J. has decided that the relation is that of co-sureties, and that Denton has a right of contribution. He bases this conclusion, as I understand, on the ground that, according to the terms of the policy of insurance which embodies the guarantee of the plaintiff corporation, both the corporation and Denton are liable for the same debt upon the same default of the mortgagor. I think that the plaintiff and defendant are liable for the same debt upon the same default of the mortgagor for the reasons given by Swinfen Eady, J. in his judgment; but there is this difference, that, whereas the liability of Denton to pay arises directly on demand left at the mortgaged premises, the liability of the corporation is only to pay after the expiration of six calendar months from the mortgagee, the bank, becoming entitled to exercise the power of sale conferred by the mortgage deed and giving notice thereof to the corporation; so that, even assuming the occasion of the liability arising to be the same because the power of sale is conferred upon leaving a demand for payment at the mortgaged premises without any further demand or not (thus departing from the provisions of the Conveyancing Act 1881), yet the time when payment will accrue due differs by six months, and I do not think that this difference can be left out of consideration when determining whether the corporation and Denton are co-sureties. [His Lordship then stated the effect of the mortgage, and continued:] A "Mortgage Insurance Policy" was executed by the corporation on the 7th March 1900, and it is alleged by the plaintiff corporation that this policy was effected in pursuance of a proposal for insurance dated the 28th Oct. 1899. There is some little difficulty about this, as the proposal and the policy do not quite accord, the proposal relating to a debt repayable by annual instalments, which is not the case with the mortgage debt. But I think that the proposal is sufficient evidence that the insurance was effected by the corporation on the basis that the mortgage debt which the corporation was insuring would be secured by a mortgage deed in which Denton would join for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of 1000*l.* of the principal money. The policy, however, makes no mention of Denton being a party to the mortgage deed. On the contrary, it describes the mortgage deed as made between Maude Harvey of the one part and the "insured" (i.e., the bank) of the other part. It refers, however, to a proposal in writing of the 28th Oct. 1899 for guaranteeing the said mortgage debt and interest, and recites that it is agreed "that the said proposal shall be the basis of the contract of insurance intended." The premium of 18*l.* 15*s.* is recited as the first premium for guaranteeing the said mortgage debt and interest, and the policy goes on to witness "that the corporation agree with the insured . . . that if the insured shall become entitled under the power of sale conferred by the said mortgage deed or otherwise to sell the mortgaged property, and shall give notice in writing thereof to the corporation, while this policy is in force the corporation will, after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt by the corporation of a claim in writing by the insured requiring payment, pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due under the said mortgage with any interest thereon." I think that the proper inference of fact to draw from the proposal of the 28th Oct. 1899, the mortgage deed of the 2nd Nov. 1899, and the policy of the 7th March 1900 is that the mortgagor and mortgagee, Denton and the corporation, knew, at the date both of the mortgage deed and of the policy, that it was intended that Denton should join in the mortgage as surety, and that the mortgage debt and interest should be guaranteed or insured by the corporation. The words "guarantee" and "insure" are used as synonymous in the policy. I mention this inference because I think that the fact that there was one transaction only, to the details of which all were privy, may not be immaterial when one is considering whether the corporation ought to be regarded as co-surety with Denton for the mortgagor, or as surety for both the mortgagor and Denton under a distinct collateral security. The summons claims that the plaintiffs by virtue of a covenant of one Denton contained in a deed of mortgage of the 2nd Nov. 1899, which covenant had been assigned to them, are creditors of the estate of Denton for the sum of 984*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The facts as to that sum are these: The bank having left a demand at the mortgaged premises, after giving notice to the corporation under condition 5 of the policy of their intention to exercise the power of sale, proceeded, not strictly in accordance with the conditions of the policy, to sell the property. This sale realised 4000*l.*, and discharged the whole of the principal money owing on the mortgage. The source of the money thus discharging the principal, although it may have passed through the hands of the insurance corporation, was the proceeds of sale. The plaintiff corporation, in the meanwhile, expended the 984*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* sought to be recovered on this summons on matters such as repairs, &c., clearly necessary and proper for the maintenance of the mortgage security. The utterly unbusinesslike manner in which the business of the corporation was done makes it difficult to ascertain the true facts. It might be suggested that this was a voluntary expenditure by the corporation, who had a clear interest, as Denton also had, that the mortgage security should not be wasted. But I think on the evidence that this expenditure may fairly be taken to be expenditure by the corporation at the request of the bank, and thus expenditure by the bank as mortgagee. If the expenditure cannot be so regarded, there is an end of the claim, but, if it can be so regarded, the only question is, as I have already stated, Are Denton and the corporation co-sureties so as to entitle Denton to contribution? In the first place, I will deal with a contention raised by the corporation and based on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation (ubi sup.). This contention is that, apart from anything else which might negative co-suretyship between the corporation and Denton, the very form of the obligation which they had undertaken towards the bank was sufficient to show that the corporation had not entered into a contract of suretyship, but into a contract of insurance. No doubt the form is that of a policy of insurance. But I think there is nothing in the form of the contract between the bank and the corporation being that of a policy of insurance to prevent the contract being one of guarantee, and I would refer to the judgment of Romer, L.J. in Seaton v. Heath (ubi sup.), which on this point is unaffected by the reversal in the House of Lords of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Romer, L.J., in discussing the difference in substance between these two classes of contract, says: "The difference between these two classes of contract does not depend upon any essential difference between the word 'insurance' and the word 'guarantee.' There is no magic in the use of those words. The words to a great extent have the same meaning and effect, and many contracts, like the one in the case now before us, may with equal propriety be called contracts of insurance or contracts of guarantee." The distinction in substance in cases in which the loss insured against is simply the event of the nonpayment of a debt seems to be, as I read the judgment of Romer, L.J., between contracts in which the person desiring to be insured has means of knowledge as to the risk and the insurer has not the same means and those cases in which the insurer has the same means. Now, it seems to me that, in the case of this mortgage debt, the insurance corporation, knowing the terms of the mortgage deed and the exact nature of the property forming the security, had just as much means of ascertaining the nature of the risk as the bank had, and I do not think that the mere fact that the contract was made between the creditor and the insurance corporation and not between the mortgagor debtor, Miss Harvey, and the corporation would of itself determine the character of the contract to be that of insurance and not of suretyship. This being so, the form and circumstances of the contract being consistent with the relation of co-suretyship between the plaintiff corporation and Denton, are the facts, dates, or the contents of the mortgage deed such as to negative this contract, which according to its terms is a contract of suretyship guaranteeing payment by the mortgagor, being a contract of suretyship constituting co-suretyship in relation to the contract of suretyship taken by Denton on himself by the mortgage deed? If the policy is looked at, it will be seen that, in form at all events, both the insurance company and Denton guarantee the payment of the mortgage debt by the mortgagor, Miss Harvey. The event upon which the obligation to pay arises is the same in each case, and, although the insurance company have six months within which to pay, yet the obligation neither of the insurance company nor of Denton is dependent on what the mortgage security realises. Taking these matters into consideration, there seems much to support the conclusion in fact of Swinfen Eady, J. that the insurance corporation were sureties for and guaranteed the debt of Miss Harvey, and were not sureties only in the event that neither Miss Harvey nor Denton paid. If this conclusion, which seems to me to be a conclusion in fact, is right, it puts the case outside the case of Craythorne v. Swinburne (ubi sup.). It seems plain from the judgment of Lord Eldon in that case that, in considering the question whether the contract of insurance, the second contract in point of date, is to be considered as a collateral or supplemental security, the court may take into consideration evidence as well as the words of the respective contracts. Still, sitting by myself, I should have hesitated to differ from the conclusion of the learned judge, especially as I do not think that the mere fact that the insurance company knew at the time at which the policy was effected, from the mortgage deed or the proposal, that Denton was a surety is sufficient to negative the relation of co-suretyship, and it is certainly a case in which I should have wished to have applied the maxim that equality is equity if the facts allowed it. But, as my brothers take a contrary view of the facts, I do not think that in such a doubtful case, turning largely on inferences of fact, I ought to refuse to concur in the judgment of the court.

STIRLING, L.J.—The question in this case is what is the true nature of the contract entered into between the London, City, and Midland Bank (the mortgagees of a public-house for 4000*l.* and interest, George Denton being surety for the mortgage to the extent of 1000*l.*) and the plaintiffs in the action. The defendant in the action, who is the legal personal representative of George Denton, contends that the contract was one of suretyship, and that by virtue of it the plaintiffs became co-sureties with George Denton; and this is the view which has been taken by Swinfen Eady, J. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, insist that the contract is not one of suretyship at all, but is one of insurance or indemnity, such as was held by Lord Esher, M.R. to exist in Dane v. Mortgage Insurance Corporation (ubi sup.); but they also urge that, even if the contract was one of suretyship, the plaintiffs did not become co-sureties with Denton, but in fact guaranteed the bank against Denton's default, as was held to be the case in Craythorne v. Swinburne (ubi sup.). The answer to the question depends to a great extent on the construction of a document dated the 7th March 1900 and headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy," but, before dealing with it, I think it desirable to refer shortly to the main provisions of the mortgage deed, which bears date the 2nd Nov. 1899. [His Lordship then stated the effects of the mortgage, and continued:] On the 28th Oct. 1899, before the mortgage had been executed, the solicitors of the mortgagor submitted to the plaintiffs a "proposal to insure first mortgage of 4000*l.*" In this document various particulars are given as to the terms of the mortgage, which are inaccurate, but the following statement occurs: "Mr. G. Denton will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of 1000*l.* of the principal money." It is not disputed that the document of the 7th March 1900 was the result of this proposal. The document, as I have already mentioned, is headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy," and in the recitals the proposal of the 28th Oct. 1899 is recited, and "it is agreed that the said proposal shall be the basis of the contract of insurance hereby intended." On the other hand, the proposal is recited as being one "for guaranteeing" the mortgage debt and interest; and the premium is stated to be "for guaranteeing" the mortgage debt and interest. The mortgage deed is stated to be dated the 2nd Nov. 1899, and to be made between Maude Harvey of the one part and the insured of the other part, and it does not appear on the face of the document itself that Denton was a surety for the debt. Still, notwithstanding all inaccuracies in the proposal and in the recitals, there is no question that the mortgage of the 2nd Nov. 1899, as executed by the mortgagor and Denton, was that to which the document of the 7th March 1900 was intended to refer, and with reference to which it must be construed. I think, therefore, that the document must be read as relating to a mortgage in respect of which Denton was to a limited extent surety for payment of principal and interest. [His Lordship then read the operative part of the document and also conditions 8, 9, and 10.] In order that the plaintiffs may become liable under the policy, it is necessary (1) that the insured, the bank, should become entitled, under the power of sale in the mortgage or otherwise, to sell, and it will be remembered that the power of sale in the mortgage becomes exercisable upon a demand for payment in accordance with the covenant of the mortgagor and the surety, being left at the public-house; and that the mortgagor and the surety both became liable upon such demand being so left; (2) that the insured should give notice in writing to the plaintiffs of their having become entitled to exercise the power of sale; (3) that the insured should make a claim in writing on the plaintiffs requiring payment. These conditions being satisfied, the plaintiffs bind themselves after the expiration of six calendar months from the receipt of the claim in writing to pay to the insured the principal money for the time being due on the security with interest. In arriving at this sum there would be taken into account all sums had by the mortgagor or by the surety or realised out of the mortgaged property. Upon payment by the plaintiffs of the amount payable, they are entitled under condition 9 to have assigned or transferred to them the mortgage debt and interest and all securities held by the insured for the same; and this would, according to the natural meaning of conditions 9 and 10, include, in my opinion, the benefit of the covenant by the surety to the full extent to which the mortgagees were entitled thereto. The result is that a period of six months is to elapse between claim made on the plaintiffs and payment. During that period the bank were left to realise their securities, as they saw fit, unless the plaintiffs chose to intervene under the provisions of condition 7. At the expiration of the period the plaintiffs were bound to pay the principal and interest remaining due on the security, quite irrespective of any question whether loss had occurred or was likely to occur. Upon payment, however, the plaintiffs, as it seems to me, became entitled to all the rights and remedies of the mortgagees, and to enforce them just as the mortgagees might have done, as well against the surety as against the mortgagor. Swinfen Eady, J. held that the instrument of the 7th March 1900 was not merely an insurance against loss; and in that respect I agree with him, but it does not follow that the instrument created a mere contract of co-suretyship with Denton. The learned judge, however, does not appear to have had presented to him the second contention raised on behalf of the plaintiffs and strongly urged in this court; at all events, he does not deal with it explicitly in his judgment. The question is, in my opinion, one of difficulty, occasioned by the inaccuracies and ambiguities which are found in the instrument of the 7th March 1900, an instrument framed by the plaintiffs themselves. I have, however, come to the conclusion that, regard being had to all the circumstances, the true meaning of the parties to the transaction was not that the plaintiffs were to become co-sureties with Denton, but that, as between themselves and the bank, Denton should be in the position of a principal; or, in other words, that the transaction was of the same nature as that which was the subject of decision in Craythorne v. Swinburne (ubi sup.). Taking this view, I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is a claim by the Licenses Insurance Corporation (hereinafter called the corporation) against the estate of Denton, who joined as surety in a mortgage by Harvey to a bank. The mortgaged property has been sold for less than the amount due to the bank. The deficiency, which is less than 1000*l.*, has been paid by the corporation to the bank, and a transfer has been executed by the bank to the corporation of the mortgage debt and all securities for the same. There is no answer to this claim, unless it can be established that the corporation and Denton were co-sureties, in which case a right of contribution only would arise. Swinfen Eady, J. has adopted this view, and has made a declaration accordingly. The corporation appeal against this order, and they contend (1) that their contract with the bank was properly a contract of insurance, and not of suretyship; and (2), in the alternative, that, if they were not insurers, they were sureties for both Harvey and Denton, and not co-sureties with Denton for Harvey. The first contention was overruled by the learned judge. The second contention, although raised, seems not to have been strongly insisted upon before him, and it is not directly dealt with in his judgment, but it has been forcibly pressed upon us, particularly by Mr. Owen Thompson in his able argument. It is based upon Craythorne v. Swinburne (ubi sup.). In that case Lord Eldon held that parol evidence was admissible to show whether in truth the defendant was a co-surety with the plaintiff for the principal debtor and as such bound to contribute; or was a surety for both the principal debtor and the plaintiff and as such under no liability to contribute. The principles there laid down are clear, but I have found great difficulty in applying them to the very peculiar circumstances of the present case. There are three documents which, and which alone, have to be considered: Firstly, there is the mortgage dated the 2nd Nov. 1899. [His Lordship then stated the material provisions of that document, and continued:] Denton plainly joins as surety. It is apparent on the face of the mortgage deed that it was part of the bargain with the bank that a security of some kind should be procured from the corporation. Secondly, there is the "proposal to insure first mortgage of 4000*l.*" dated the 28th Oct. 1899. It is obviously inaccurate in some respects. It refers to the mortgage as dated the 2nd Nov. 1899, and states the mortgage debt as repayable by instalments, although this is not the fact. It mentions, however, that Denton will join in the mortgage for the purpose of guaranteeing the repayment of 1000*l.* of the principal money. Thirdly, there is the document imposing a liability on the corporation towards the bank, which is dated the 7th March 1900, four months after the mortgage. It is headed "Mortgage Insurance Policy." It inaccurately recites the mortgage as made between Harvey of the one part and the bank of the other part, and omits all reference to Denton. [His Lordship then read the material parts of the policy and the indorsed conditions Nos. 7, 8, 9, and 10.] It will be observed that the obligation of the corporation to pay does not arise for six months after Denton's obligation to pay arises, and, further, that the corporation stipulates with the bank for transfer of all securities held by the bank, and to be subrogated to all rights and remedies of the bank against other parties as soon as the corporation pays under the policy, an event which has happened. Now, on the construction of this document, I agree with Swinfen Eady, J. that it was not an insurance against loss, but was a guarantee of the mortgage debt, and I adopt the reasoning contained in his very careful judgment on this point. It only remains to consider the second, or what I may call the Craythorne v. Swinburne, point. What was it that the corporation guaranteed? If I look only at the policy, it is reasonably clear that the corporation guaranteed the debt due from Harvey, the principal debtor, and nothing more. If, however, I look at the proposal, which is "deemed to be incorporated in the policy," and also at the mortgage deed, I think it appears that the corporation guaranteed a partially guaranteed debt, or, in other words, guaranteed that Harvey, to the full extent, and Denton, to the extent of 1000*l.*, would pay the bank, Harvey and Denton being as between themselves and the corporation both principal debtors. It is of no moment that Denton is not shown to have been party or privy to the proposal or the policy, for the only obligation imposed on Harvey by the covenant in the mortgage deed, to which Denton was a party, was to insure against loss. This obligation would have been exactly satisfied by a policy of insurance strictly so called. Denton had no right to expect to be relieved by having the corporation as a co-surety. He must accept the position, whatever it may be, as between the bank and the corporation. Upon the whole, I think the appellants' contention on this point must prevail, notwithstanding the difficulties created by the forms of the instruments.

[CHAN. DIV.]

RAY v. HAZELDINE.

[CHAN. DIV.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Thursday, May 5.

(Before KEKEWICH, J.)

RAY v. HAZELDINE. (a)

Easement—Light—Implied reservation on grant by common owner—Easement of necessity—Easement necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of property.

By conveyance dated in 1895 the premises (subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff) were conveyed by the defendant, who retained a messuage also belonging to him at that time immediately adjoining. A portion of the retained premises (containing one window on the ground floor and one window on the first floor) overlooked a yard forming part of the hereditaments conveyed in 1895.

By that conveyance the plaintiff's predecessor in title covenanted with the defendant to permit him at all times to enter upon the land thereby conveyed to point or otherwise repair the buildings erected on his retained adjoining land, but defendant expressly reserved no right of light to his windows.

Plaintiff erected a wall in her yard to obstruct the defendant's windows, and the defendant knocked it down, for the purpose of asserting an easement of necessity in respect of the light to his two windows, alleging that there was no other means by which natural light could enter them, and that the access of light through them was absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of his room and landing in which they were placed.

Held, in accordance with the distinction taken by Stirling, L.J. in Union Lighterage Company Limited v. London Graving Dock Company Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 381, at p. 386; (1902) 2 Ch. 557), that the defendant had not shown that he was entitled by right to an easement of necessity in respect of the light to his windows, but claimed only an easement which was necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of his property, which latter right not having been expressly reserved in the conveyance of 1895, the plaintiff was entitled to build so as to obstruct the light to the two windows, but so as not to trespass on defendant's wall or to infringe the covenant by plaintiff's predecessor in title in the conveyances to him as to pointing or otherwise repairing the buildings on defendant's adjoining land.

ACTION with witnesses in which the plaintiff, Mrs. Isabella Mary Ray, claimed a declaration that she was entitled to build on her hereditaments fronting on Ravenoak-road, Cheadle Hulme, in such a manner as to obstruct the light to two windows in the defendant's hereditaments overlooking a yard forming part of the plaintiff's hereditaments, and an injunction restraining the defendant, his servants or agents, from pulling down any wall on the plaintiff's hereditaments, and other incidental relief.

On the 18th Oct. 1895 the hereditaments conveyed by the indenture next stated were (together with the defendant's hereditaments hereinafter mentioned) owned by the defendant in fee simple subject to yearly rents and to mortgages.

By conveyance dated the 18th Oct. 1895 land situated in Cheadle Hulme or Cheadle Mosley, Cheshire, with the messuage and buildings therein mentioned (hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff's hereditaments) were conveyed to Edward Arthur Ray and his heirs subject to a yearly rentcharge and free from certain mortgages. This conveyance contained no reservation of a right to access of light to the two windows in defendant's hereditaments, but it contained a covenant by the purchaser, Edward A. Ray, that he, his heirs and assigns, would from time to time and at all times thereafter permit the defendant, his heirs and assigns, to enter upon the plaintiff's hereditaments or any part thereof for the purpose of pointing or otherwise repairing the buildings for the time being erected on the defendant's adjoining land.

RAY v. HAZELDINE.

By conveyance dated the 19th Sept. 1902, the plaintiff's hereditaments were conveyed by Edward A. Ray unto and to the use of the plaintiff in fee simple subject to the rentcharge, and at the time of the issue of the writ in this action were still vested in her for such estate.

The messuage (hereinafter called the defendant's hereditaments) immediately adjoining the plaintiff's hereditaments on the south-eastern boundary thereof still belongs to the defendant; and a portion of it (facing west and containing one window on the ground floor and one window on the first floor) overlooks a yard forming part of the plaintiff's hereditaments.

No right of light was reserved by or in favour of the defendant when the plaintiff's hereditaments were sold and conveyed by him, and it was denied by the plaintiff that either of the said windows is an ancient light.

Plaintiff in alleged exercise of her rights, after the 19th Sept. 1902, erected a wall in her yard close to the defendant's two windows, which was carried up to the glazed roof of the yard, but defendant knocked it down from inside his own house through the window.

Plaintiff caused the wall to be partly built again in the same way, i.e. from the face of the wall, opposite the window, keeping clear of the lower window, but defendant put his head out of the window and again pushed it down.

Minor questions of fact in the case, in respect of which by his counter-claim the defendant claimed an injunction, were whether in building these walls plaintiff had built upon the footings of, and trespassed upon the footings of, the defendant's walls, or bonded his walls to defendant's walls, and whether the erection of the wall close to the defendant's buildings would prevent him enjoying the benefit of the covenant as to pointing or repairing his buildings contained in the conveyance of the 18th Oct. 1895, these questions being dealt with in the judgment, but, as stated at the hearing by defendant's counsel, the real question in the action was whether the light to the lower of the two windows was an easement of necessity. As to the two windows, the facts in evidence, most of them being admitted, were as follows:—

The lower window opened into a pantry or store; the window on the first floor lighted a landing and stairs in the defendant's messuage. Before action plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendant asking for an acknowledgment in respect of the light on the first floor, and, as regards the light on the lower floor, asked for an intimation that the defendant did not question the plaintiff's right to block it up. In reply the defendant's solicitor wrote that the windows were necessary for the health and comfort of the occupants; that the defendant had no available means of obtaining light and air to the pantry of his house except through the lower window; that the windows were glazed with obscure glass, and that they were small.

Plaintiff alleged that by reason of the windows (and more particularly the pantry window) overlooking her yard the privacy of her premises was destroyed and their value depreciated, and she adduced evidence of her surveyor that the landing could be lighted through a skylight in the roof; also that light could be obtained for the pantry by defendant opening a window on his premises into his scullery and obtaining a borrowed light through the scullery, or in another way by opening a window at the end of the pantry and obtaining light from the entrance into the house.

A fresh-air inlet as shown on the surveyor's plan would, he stated, provide for ventilation. But plaintiff's surveyor in cross-examination admitted that the room as a pantry would be useless if the defendant's wall was permitted to stand; and also said that if the upper window were blocked it would darken the whole staircase.

D. Stewart-Smith, K.C. and Hon. F. Russell for the plaintiff.—We assert the right to build so as to obstruct the access of light over plaintiff's yard to the defendant's windows. The defendant asserts that, although he has reserved no express right to light over the premises he granted in 1895, his case falls within the exception to the rules laid down by the Court of Appeal in Wheeldon v. Burrows (39 L. T. Rep. 558; on appeal, 41 L. T. Rep. 327, at p. 329; 12 Ch. Div. 31) as being an easement of light of necessity. The question whether light can be got from another source is a question of fact. The plaintiff does not claim to interfere in any way with the exercise by defendant of his admitted rights under the covenant as to pointing and repairing, and submits to any order of the court safeguarding those rights. The means of support of the obstructing wall was that it was bonded into the plaintiff's wall. The defendant's sole ground of objection was the wrongful interruption of the access of light alleged before action. Theisiger, L.J. in Wheeldon v. Burrows (ubi sup.) lays down the two rules governing cases of this kind, and is reported to have said that "if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant." This rule is subject to exception in cases of easements of necessity, and his Lordship says there may be certain other exceptions. This passage refers to cases in which there are reciprocal easements as in the cases of Pyer v. Carter (28 L. T. Rep. O. S. 371; 1 H. & N. 916), Compton v. Richards (1 Pri. 27), and Richards v. Ross (9 Exch. 218), which seem to be the only ones to be found relating to easements of that nature. Stirling, L.J. draws the distinction which we say governs this case in Union Lighterage Company Limited v. London Graving Dock Company Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 381, at p. 386; (1902) 2 Ch. 557; vide also per Romer, L.J., at p. 385). In Wheeldon v. Burrows (ubi sup.) the lights which were the subject of discussion were certainly reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the property retained, and the grantor was held not entitled to an easement in respect of them. If the property cannot be used at all without the easement, then in that case only is there an implied reservation. Applying that principle to the present case, the windows might be darkened, but the defendant's house could be used. In this case the common ownership, conveyance, and the erecting and pulling down of the wall are admitted. [Lawrence, K.C.—We say the wall was built "hush" with our wall. KEKEWICH, J.—The real question is not one of trespass.]

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. and T. T. Methold for the defendant.—The real question is whether we have got the right to light to this bottom window—whether the light to this pantry is an easement of necessity. Wheeldon v. Burrows (ubi sup.) was not the case of an easement of necessity, since the three lights there were not all necessary to the enjoyment of the workshop: (per Bacon, V.C., at p. 562 of 39 L. T. Rep.). On the admitted facts we cannot light that room except through another badly-lighted room, the scullery. This is an easement of necessity necessary to the enjoyment of this part of the property. The test is whether you can enjoy the property in the state in which it is with the obstruction. Stirling, L.J. does not mean that the whole of the property is to be rendered useless before such a reservation is implied. His Lordship means that particular part of the property which is affected. Defendant was justified in knocking down the wall. We have a right to an easement of necessity, and, according to Nicholas v. Chamberlain (1607, Cro. Jac. 121), referred to in Gale on Easements, pp. 103, 138, 7th edit., a right to go on plaintiff's land to repair our wall.

[CHAN. DIV.]

RAY v. HAZELDINE.

[CHAN. DIV.]

A reply was not called for on the main question.

KEKEWICH, J.—If a vendor of land desires to reserve any right in the character of an easement so as to prevent building in such a way as to do injury to his adjacent land which he has not parted with he must do it by express words. That is settled law and expresses the result of the decision in Wheeldon v. Burrows (ubi sup.), where the Court of Appeal affirmed Bacon, V.C. That is a general rule governing cases of this kind, but the rule is subject to certain exceptions. One of them is the well-known exception which attaches to cases of what are known as easements of necessity—that is to say, where the enjoyment of the alleged right over the adjoining land is necessary to the property which is not conveyed, then the court will consider the easement as reserved though it has not been reserved by express words. Now, an easement, or a right in the character of an easement, may be in the nature of a right to an access of light to a particular window. In a large majority of cases the window which lights a room is necessary to the lighting of that room. Many rooms are lighted by one window. Sometimes we have two or more windows. In the large majority of cases, again, a window is one, on the whole, necessary to the comfortable enjoyment of a room, but no one would suggest that, because it is necessary to the comfortable enjoyment of a room, therefore it is a necessary easement exercisable although not reserved from the purchaser of the adjoining land. You may block it notwithstanding that it is essential and in that sense necessary. Where are you to draw the line, supposing that it is not essential in that sense? Does it largely interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of the room if it is blocked? It seems to me that, if you are entitled to block, you cannot draw a line of that character. The line is one of a different character. As was pointed out by Stirling, L.J. in Union Lighterage Company Limited v. London Graving Dock Company Limited (at p. 386 of 87 L. T. Rep.). His Lordship, it seems to me, draws a distinction between an easement of necessity and easements necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of property. His Lordship is reported to have said: "The appellants did not dispute that there is no express reservation in the conveyance to the plaintiffs, but contended that the easement claimed by them, the defendants, was an 'easement of necessity' within the recognised exception of the second rule. Now, in the passages cited, the expressions 'ways of necessity' and 'easements of necessity' are used in contrast with the other expressions 'easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted' and 'easements . . . necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property conveyed'; and the word 'necessity' in the former expressions has plainly a narrower meaning than the word 'necessary' in the latter." And further down he states, after pointing out that certain tie-rods which passed through the plaintiffs' property were in one sense necessary to the enjoyment of the defendants' dock in its present condition, that the dock could not be continued in its present condition without these ties, but that the dock was capable of use without them, and there could not be implied any reservation in respect of them. The dock remained there notwithstanding, and the use of the ties was wrong. He seems to me to draw the distinction between what is absolutely necessary and what is reasonably required for the enjoyment of the land and building as it now exists. It is said here that this is a window, the access of light to which is not expressly reserved, which has it reserved by implication because the light is necessary to the pantry or store. It cannot be that there is any necessity by reason of its being used as a pantry. It cannot be said that a special use of light attaches to it as a pantry, as it can be used for other purposes, and to say, as the defendant does, that the use of the window is reserved to it by necessity, is giving to the word "necessity" a meaning which it does not properly bear in this connection. It seems to have been an afterthought of the pleader which raises the point that in blocking up the window while exercising one right the plaintiff has gone beyond her rights as to another. Now, in the first place, it is said that the plaintiff raised her wall so close to the defendant's wall that the two walls actually touched. It is a very difficult question of evidence; on the balance of evidence my present impression is to hold that it did touch. There are some points of contact. I put that aside. There is another point raised by the defence. In the conveyance to the purchaser there was a covenant. [His Lordship read the covenant in the conveyance of the 18th Oct. 1895.] It is clear that while this obstructing wall is allowed to remain erected it would be impossible for the vendor, though he might have gone on the plaintiff's land, to point or repair the wall, which would not only be obscured but entirely inclosed in this outer casing. Plaintiff's counsel says that a case has not yet arisen for an injunction. It can only arise when defendant wanted to point or repair the wall, and that then he might be entitled to come to the court for an injunction calling on the plaintiff to take down the wall. So far he is perfectly right, and I do not think the court would grant a mandatory injunction ordering the plaintiff to pull down the wall which prevented the defendant from exercising his rights under the covenant. But I think the plaintiff has been careless in this respect, and in exercising one right she has transgressed another. Plaintiff's counsel says that the whole contest was about the obstructing of the light. I think the proper order to make will be a declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to build on her hereditaments in such a manner as to darken, injure, and obstruct the light to the two windows, but not so as to trespass on defendant's wall or to prevent the exercise by him, his heirs and assigns, of the rights reserved to him by the conveyance of the 18th Oct. 1895 as to pointing or otherwise repairing the buildings. No order as to costs.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Saturday, March 19.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.)

BAKER AND WIFE v. WICKS AND OTHERS. (a)

Poor law—Overseers—Distress for rates—Illegal distress by assistant overseer—Liability of overseers for illegal acts of assistant overseer.

Overseers are not liable virtute officii for an illegal and excessive distress by an assistant overseer in the execution of a distress warrant for non-payment of rates.

A distress warrant for nonpayment of rates was issued by justices, addressed in the usual statutory form to the overseers and constables, and it was handed by one of the overseers to the assistant overseer of the parish, who had been duly appointed to act as such assistant overseer. The assistant overseer, while purporting to execute the distress warrant, was guilty of an illegal and excessive distress, the overseers having taken no part in the same.

Held, that the overseers were not liable for the illegal acts of the assistant overseer in executing the warrant.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION by Lord Alverstone, C.J. in an action tried before him at the last Lewes Assizes.

The plaintiffs were Daniel Baker, a farmer residing at a farm in the parish of Ringmer, in the county of Sussex, and his wife, who there resided with him. The defendants were Edward Wicks and Walter Wright, overseers of the parish of Ringmer, and John Webster, an auctioneer residing at Belper, in the county of Derby.

The plaintiffs, in their statement of claim, alleged that on the 3rd Sept. 1903 the defendants, by themselves or their servants or agents, entered the dwelling-house of the plaintiffs and unlawfully, wrongfully, and forcibly took possession of certain furniture and effects, the property of the plaintiffs, and removed the furniture and effects from the dwelling-house of the plaintiffs to the premises of an inn in Lewes and detained the whole of the furniture and effects from the plaintiffs for some nineteen days, when they restored a part only of the same.

Alternatively, the plaintiff Daniel Baker said that he had suffered damage by reason of the defendants having wrongfully distrained for 15s. (the balance of a rate due from the plaintiff) goods of the plaintiff of much greater value than the amount of such balance, although part of the goods was then sufficient to have satisfied the balance of 15s., and the defendants thereby made an excessive and unreasonable distress for such balance.

The defendants Wicks and Wright (the overseers of the parish) in their defence said (inter alia) that if the acts complained of were done and committed by them as alleged (which was denied), the same were done and committed by them in a lawful and peaceable manner upon the furniture and effects of the plaintiff Daniel Baker only, and under the authority of a justices' distress warrant issued for the nonpayment of rates then due by that plaintiff and the costs incidental thereto, both of which he refused to pay. That the justices' warrant was issued against the male plaintiff on the 7th July 1903 for nonpayment of rates due by him amounting to 7l. 19s. 7½d.; that the plaintiff afterwards paid 7l. 4s. 7½d. thereunder, but refused to pay the balance of 15s., and at the date of the alleged distress the sum of 15s. with costs was still due and owing by the plaintiff under the distress warrant.

They further alleged that if any wrongful acts were committed, the same were not done or committed by them, their agents, or servants, but were committed by one Charles Washer, the assistant overseer of the parish, without their authority or knowledge, for which they were in no way responsible.

The defendant Webster in his defence said (inter alia) that if any of the acts complained of were done by him, the same were done in the lawful, peaceable, and proper execution of the warrant against the goods and chattels of the plaintiff Daniel Baker only.

The facts were as follows:—

In June 1903 the plaintiff Daniel Baker, a farmer and ratepayer residing at Ringmer, was served with a demand note for a rate amounting to 7l. 19s. 7½d., under a rate dated the 5th May 1903, but, as he wished to protest against that portion of the rate which was applicable to the support of voluntary or non-provided schools under the Education Act 1902, in June 1903 he told Mr. Charles Washer, who had been appointed in 1892 and then was the assistant overseer of the parish of Ringmer, that he would not pay the rate, and that he was prepared to be summoned for the amount, and he then refused to pay the amount of the rate.

On the 30th June a complaint was made before a justice of the peace by the overseers of the poor of the parish of Ringmer that several persons (including the plaintiff Daniel Baker), whose names were mentioned and set forth in the schedule, being duly rated and assessed to the relief of the poor of the parish in the respective amounts opposite to their names, had not paid the rates or any part thereof, but had refused to do so, and a summons was issued requiring them to appear on the 7th July before justices of the peace to answer the complaint.

On the 7th July 1903 the overseers by Charles Washer, assistant overseer, and some of the ratepayers mentioned appeared before the justices,

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

BAKER AND WIFE v. WICKS AND OTHERS.

[K.B. Div.]

but the plaintiff Daniel Baker did not appear, and a distress warrant was issued against him by the justices in the statutory form given in the schedule to the Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14) (forms C 1 and C 2).

The distress warrant was addressed—as in the statutory form—

To the overseers of the poor of the parish of Ringmer, in the county of Sussex, and to the constables of the East Sussex Constabulary, and to all other peace officers in the said county, and it commanded them forthwith to make distress of the goods and chattels of the several persons, (including the plaintiff Baker) whose names were mentioned and set out in the schedule thereunder written.

At that time one Charles Washer was the assistant overseer of the parish; he had been appointed by the vestry in 1892 and he had been continued in his appointment ever since, and by the terms of his appointment he was empowered to perform all the duties of an overseer.

The distress warrant was handed by the justices to a police constable, but he, apparently under instructions from the chief constable, declined to execute it, and he handed it to the defendant Wicks (one of the overseers), by whom it was handed to the assistant overseer (Washer) for execution, with instructions to do the best he could, to employ a bailiff, and to be careful not to overstep his duty.

Subsequently, on the 16th July, the plaintiff Daniel Baker paid to Washer the amount of the rate due from him, less 15s., which was estimated to be the portion of the rate appropriated to educational purposes, and he continued to refuse to pay the 15s. Certain other rate-payers in the parish, whose names were included in the distress warrant, having also refused to pay the education rate, Washer proceeded to procure a bailiff to execute the warrant, and, not wishing to employ a resident in the neighbourhood for that purpose, he procured the defendant Webster, who was an auctioneer resident at Belper, in Derbyshire, to come to Sussex and effect the distress. The plaintiff heard nothing more of the matter until the 3rd Sept., when a distress was put in. On that day Washer and Webster came to the plaintiff's farm, and there, purporting to act under the warrant of distress, seized and removed from the premises goods and furniture estimated to be of the value of upwards of 100*l.*, to satisfy the claim of 15s., the part of the rate remaining unpaid. They were informed at the time that the whole of the goods, with the exception of about 5*l.* worth, were the property of the female plaintiff, Mrs. Baker, and that the residue only belonged to the husband, and this appeared to be the fact.

The defendants Wicks and Wright (the overseers) were not present when the goods were seized (Wright being abroad at the time), nor did they authorise the seizure of Mrs. Baker's goods; but Washer and Webster were present, and the plaintiff Mr. Baker asked that some goods outside the house and belonging to him should be taken, but this suggestion was not acted on, and the goods inside the house were taken. The goods were taken to an inn in Lewes and were kept there for some three weeks, when the defendant Wicks, having made inquiries in the meantime, caused them to be handed back to the plaintiffs, with expressions of regret, as he was satisfied that they belonged to Mrs. Baker, and he felt that an error had been committed. The other defendant, Wright, was abroad throughout the whole proceedings.

The present action was then brought by the plaintiffs against the three defendants, the two overseers and the auctioneer Webster. Washer (the assistant overseer) was not made a party to the action, but he was brought in by Webster as a third party to the action, as Webster alleged that he acted under the instructions of Washer and claimed that he was entitled to be indemnified by him.

The principal question was as to the liability of the overseers for the acts of the assistant overseer.

Bozall, K.C. and E. E. Humphreys for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to recover against all three defendants. The defendants Wicks and Wright (the overseers) are liable for the acts of the assistant overseer and of Webster. The distress warrant was addressed to them and the duty was thereby imposed on them to execute the warrant, and it is no defence to them that they did not authorise Washer to commit the illegal acts complained of. A distress for rates is not like a distress for rent; it is in the nature of an execution, being, as Lord Mansfield said in Hutchins v. Chambers (1 Burr. 579, at p. 588), much more analogous to the common execution than to the common law distress. By sect. 4 of the Distress for Rates Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 14) the distress warrant for rates may be addressed to the overseers, and in the forms in the schedule to that Act it is so addressed. It was so addressed in this case, and it authorises the overseers to levy, so that they are the responsible persons to carry out the levy. In such case the overseers are in the same position as a sheriff who is required to levy an execution under a writ of fi. fa., and, as the sheriff is responsible for any illegal act committed in carrying out the execution by a subordinate officer to whom he has delegated his authority, so the overseers are liable for the illegal acts of subordinates who execute the distress warrant. The reason of the extended liability of the sheriff for the acts of those to whom he delegates his authority is thus stated by Jervis, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Gregory v. Cottrell (26 L. T. Rep. O.S. 125; 5 E. & B. 571, at p. 585): "He is supposed to be executing his duty in person, as he is bound in the first instance to do. The impossibility of so doing authorises him to delegate that authority to another, and he puts that party in his place; and for whatever that party does, not only when done virtute mandati, but colore mandati, the sheriff is responsible." That applies equally to the overseers who delegate their authority to an assistant overseer to execute the distress warrant. They have no power to delegate their authority so as to relieve themselves of responsibility for the proper execution of the warrant. With regard to the appointment and duties of an assistant overseer, sect. 7 of the Poor Relief Act 1819 (59 Geo. 3, c. 12) and sect. 61 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101) provide as to the appointment of an assistant overseer by the vestry. The vestry may empower him to execute all the duties of the office of overseer, and in fact here they did so empower the assistant overseer, but the warrant in this case was addressed, not to the assistant overseer, but to the overseers themselves, and therefore in the execution of the warrant the assistant overseer must be taken as acting as the servant or bailiff of the overseers. There is another reason for making the overseers liable. By sect. 1 of the Poor Relief Act 1601 (43 Eliz. c. 2) the overseers were to be "substantial householders," but by sect. 7 of the Poor Relief Act 1819 (59 Geo. 3, c. 12) the assistant overseer was only required to be a "discrete person." If the overseers are not liable because the assistant overseer was appointed by statute, still that does not relieve them from liability in respect of Webster, who was not appointed under any statute and by whom the levy was actually made. The defendant Wicks adopted and ratified what was done by Washer, and he is liable on that ground.

Avory, K.C. and Lawless for the defendants Wicks and Wright.—The overseers are not liable for the acts of the assistant overseer. The assistant overseer is in no sense the servant of the overseers; he is appointed by the vestry and not by the overseers, who have nothing whatever to do with his appointment, and his position as assistant overseer is recognised by statute. It may be true that a distress for rates is rather in the nature of an execution than an ordinary distress, but there is this distinction between the case of the liability of a sheriff for the improper acts of his subordinate officer and the liability of overseers for the improper acts of an assistant overseer, that, whereas the officer of the sheriff is directly appointed by the sheriff and has no statutory position apart from the sheriff, the assistant overseer is not directly appointed by the overseers, but is appointed by the vestry (sect. 7 of 59 Geo. 3, c. 12) and has a position recognised by statute wholly independent of the overseers. It was expressed thus by Lord Denman, C.J. in delivering the considered judgment of the court in Reg. v. Watts (7 A. & E. 461, at p. 469): "The assistant overseer is not the servant of the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, but of the vestry, from whom he directly receives his authority"; and Coltman, J. in delivering the considered judgment of the court in Points v. Attwood (6 C. B. 38, at p. 49), after citing the above passage from Lord Denman's judgment, said: "The acts done by him are not, therefore, to be considered as done by him as the agent of the other overseers, but as done by virtue of his own authority derived from the appointment of the vestry." He is, by sect. 7 of 59 Geo. 3, c. 12, to be elected by the vestry, who are to specify the duties to be performed by him and to fix the salary which he is to receive, and such salary is to be paid out of the rates, and he is by that section authorised and empowered to perform all such of the duties of the office of the overseer as shall in the warrant for his appointment be expressed, and he may be required to give security; so that he is a responsible officer, having rights and duties altogether apart from the overseers. It has been argued that the warrant is addressed to the overseers, and that that renders them liable for the acts done; but if the overseers are to be held liable merely because the warrant was addressed to them, then on the same principle the constables of the East Sussex Constabulary would also be liable, as the warrant is addressed to them as well as to the overseers. It was, in fact, to one of the constables that the warrant was first handed. The warrant, having been addressed to the overseers, must be taken as including the assistant overseer, who would be equally empowered to perform all the duties required of the overseers. The defendant Wright, being abroad all the time, cannot be held liable except from his position of overseer, and the above considerations show that Wicks and Wright are not liable merely by the fact of their being overseers. Wicks did not make himself liable merely by handing the warrant to Washer for execution; he did not thereby make Washer his agent for that purpose, or render himself liable for the illegal acts of Washer. If a judgment creditor hands a writ of fi. fa. to a sheriff for execution, without giving any special direction, he is not liable if the sheriff seizes the goods of a wrong person:

Smith v. Keal, 47 L. T. Rep. 142; 9 Q. B. Div. 340;

Morris v. Salberg, 61 L. T. Rep. 283; 22 Q. B. Div. 614.

It is said that Wicks ratified what had been done by Washer. There are two answers to that: first, there was no evidence of any ratification in fact; and, secondly, even if there were, it would not avail, as, if the wrongful act were done without authority, a subsequent ratification of it has no effect:

Woollen v. Wright, 7 L. T. Rep. 73; 1 H. & C. 554.

Lailey for the defendant Webster.

Boxall, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I cannot give my decision without expressing my regret that the plaintiff, Mr. Baker, was not better advised in this case, which strongly brings out the absurdity of raising in this way his objection to paying this rate for educational purposes. He might have taken his objection with equal dignity by simply paying under protest the amount he objected to. It is also much to be regretted that the police should have refused to execute the warrant. It was their duty to have executed it, and if they had done so, this trouble would not have arisen. However, the matter has now to be dealt with as a question of law. The action was brought against the two overseers and the auctioneer, who has brought in Washer, the assistant overseer, as a third party. At the time in question the overseers of the parish were the defendants Wicks and Wright; and there was also an assistant overseer named Washer, who, in 1892, was appointed to perform all the duties of an overseer of the poor, and at the time now in question he was acting under that appointment. A distress warrant had been issued, addressed to the overseers of the poor in respect of the rates owing by the plaintiff, Daniel Baker; but the distress warrant, the execution of which formed the subject of the present action, was at the time of the execution an effective warrant for the sum of 15s. and no more, the rest of the rate having been paid. If the overseers are in the position of sheriffs, the plaintiffs would be entitled to a judgment as against the defendant Wicks; but as to the defendant Wright it has been shown that he had nothing to do with the matter. Wicks appears to have given the assistant overseer Washer, in whose hands the matter was placed, proper advice, but he made no attempt to take the matter out of Washer's hands. Overseers may legally employ a qualified broker to levy the execution, and may obtain an auctioneer to sell the goods. If the auctioneer in this case (Webster) only took an inventory of the goods under the direction of the assistant overseer, then he would not be liable for illegal distress; but the facts proved in evidence show that he did much more than take an inventory of the value of the goods under the directions of Washer. He was a principal in levying the distress, and it was improper conduct on his part; it was a wrongful act and an excessive distress. It was contended that Wicks is responsible for these unlawful acts. That raises the question whether overseers are responsible for the conduct of assistant overseers, and whether the same principle ought to be applied in the case of overseers which is applied in the case of sheriffs, who are responsible for everything done in carrying out the execution. That seems to have been held in the case of Gregory v. Cotterell (ubi sup.), and if that case governs the present case, then the plaintiffs would be entitled to succeed against the overseers. A sheriff is responsible for the acts of his subordinates. Overseers, however, are not in the position of sheriffs, and the principle, therefore, which applies to sheriffs does not apply to the case of an assistant overseer, who is by statute appointed to perform all the duties of an overseer. The assistant overseer is appointed by the vestry, and is the servant of the vestry and not of the overseer; and the overseer is not liable for any act done by the assistant overseer which he has not in any way authorised, and to which he is no party. The assistant overseer acts by virtue of his own authority, and there is a statutory recognition of his office and of the duties he has to perform; and therefore the law with regard to the responsibility of sheriffs for the acts of their subordinates does not apply. The cases of Reg. v. Watts (ubi sup.) and Points v. Attwood (ubi sup.), which have been cited, altogether exclude the view that I ought to apply to overseers the same principle as is applied in the case of sheriffs. Those cases show clearly that the assistant overseer is not the servant of the overseers, but is the servant of the vestry; and, although, perhaps, they are not direct decisions to that effect, but may be said to be dicta only, yet they do lay down that principle in the clearest and strongest way. Moreover, the statutes which have been cited show that there is a statutory recognition that assistant overseers can perform all the duties of overseers, so that apart from authority which is binding on me, the Legislature has recognised that in the case of overseers there may be a statutory officer who has power to do all the acts which the overseers themselves can do. There was no act on the part of the defendants Wicks or Wright which made them responsible for the taking of Mrs. Baker's goods, and judgment must be given for them with costs. As to the defendant Webster, I find that he did levy the distress, and that he took part in an illegal act; and I also find that he had no remedy over as against Washer, so that the third party notice fails against him.

[K.B. Div.]

FRASER v. FRASER. (a)

Practice—Appeal—Specially indorsed writ—Action by consent referred to master—Decision of master—Right to appeal to Divisional Court from decision of master—Order XIV., r. 7.

An appeal does not lie to the Divisional Court from the decision of a master in an action which has been referred to him by consent of the parties under Order XIV., r. 7, which provides that, upon the hearing of an application for leave to enter final judgment, "with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master."

APPLICATION by the defendant for an order that the finding and certificate given and the report or award made and judgment directed on the trial or reference of the action under Order XIV., r. 7, before Master Lord Dunboyne on the 26th May 1903, be set aside or varied and that judgment be entered for the defendant on the claim and for 1009l. on the counter-claim, or alternatively that a new trial or reference may be had or that the action be remitted to the master for reconsideration.

The action was brought to recover from the defendant a large sum of money as commission upon the sale of shares by the plaintiff for the defendant.

The writ was specially indorsed, and the plaintiff applied for leave to sign final judgment under Order XIV. The defendant did not make any affidavit in opposition, and the master made an order giving the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment.

The defendant appealed, and made an affidavit stating his grounds of defence, and setting up a counter-claim.

Thereupon Phillimore, J. at chambers made the following order:

"That the order of Master Lord Dunboyne giving the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment be discharged, and that the defendant be at liberty to defend this action. And it is by consent under Order XIV., r. 7, further ordered that the action be referred to be decided by a master without pleadings."

The matter was heard before the master, and on the 26th May 1903 he gave his certificate as follows: "In pursuance of the order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Phillimore, dated the 5th day of May 1903, I do find and certify that, after allowing the defendant the sum of 234l. 0s. 3d., in respect of his set-off and counter-claim, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of 925l. 1s. 4d. in this action. I direct the defendant to pay the plaintiff his costs of the action and of the reference to be taxed. And

FRASER v. FRASER.

[K.B. Div.]

I direct that judgment may be entered in accordance with this my certificate."

On the 27th May 1903 the judgment was drawn up as follows: "The action having by an order of Phillimore, J., dated the 5th May 1903, been referred for trial to Lord Dunboyne, one of the masters of the Supreme Court, and the said master having tried the said action and by his certificate dated the 26th May 1903 found that, after allowing the defendant the sum of 234l. 0s. 3d. in respect of his set-off and counter-claim, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the sum of 925l. 1s. 4d. in this action, and having directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff his costs of the action and of the reference to be taxed, and having directed judgment to be entered accordingly, it is this day adjudged that the plaintiff recover from the defendant the sum of 925l. 1s. 4d. and the costs of both the reference and the action to be taxed."

From this judgment of the master the defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal asking for judgment or a new trial, the master having given leave to appeal.

On the hearing of the appeal the preliminary objection was taken for the plaintiff that there was no right of appeal at all from the decision of the master when the action was referred to him by consent under Order XIV., r. 7; but that if there was any right of appeal, the appeal did not lie to the Court of Appeal, but to the Divisional Court.

The Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.) held that no appeal lay in such a case to the Court of Appeal, leaving the question open as to whether or not there was any right of appeal to the Divisional Court. See Fraser v. Fraser (89 L. T. Rep. 491; (1904) 1 K. B. 56).

The defendant then appealed to the Divisional Court.

Order XIV., r. 7—introduced in July 1902—provides:

Upon the hearing of the application [that is, an application for leave to enter final judgment under rule 1 of the order] with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master, or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner.

Trevor F. Lloyd for the plaintiff.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal. No appeal lies to the Divisional Court from the decision of the master in this case. The appeal was first taken to the Court of Appeal, but that court held that no appeal lay to them (Fraser v. Fraser, 89 L. T. Rep. 491; (1904) 1 K. B. 56), and, although they did not decide the question, they seemed to think that no appeal lay to any court. The whole reasoning of the judgments in that case, especially of the judgment of Mathew, L.J., tends to the view that there is no right of appeal to any court. An action can only be referred to a master under Order XIV., r. 7, by consent of the parties, and when an action is referred to a master by consent, the master is in the same position as an arbitrator to whom an action has been referred by consent. If the matter had been referred to an arbitrator by consent, there would have been no appeal from the arbitrator's decision; there would only have been a right to impeach his award on the usual and well recognised grounds. So, in this case there is no appeal from the judgment of the master. By Order XXXV., r. 9, a person may appeal from an order or decision of a district registrar to the judge, and the rule expressly provides that such appeal may be made notwithstanding that the order or decision was in respect of a matter as to which the district registrar had jurisdiction only by consent. That shows that it was clear to the framers of the rule that where the matter is sent for decision by consent there would be no appeal except the appeal is given in express terms, and therefore that provision was put in to show that in that case there was an appeal. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.: At present it seems to me that where an action is referred to a master by consent of the parties there is no appeal].

Hume-Williams, K.C. (J. W. McCarthy with him), for the defendants, in support of the appeal.—An appeal lies in this case to the Divisional Court. The master to whom this action was referred was not in the position of an arbitrator and did not act as an arbitrator; he was in the position of a referee, and from the decision of a referee there is an appeal to this court. Order XL., r. 6, provides that where at a trial by a referee he has directed any judgment to be entered, any party may move to set aside such judgment and to enter any other judgment, on the ground that upon the finding the judgment so directed is wrong; and in the King's Bench Division such motion must be made to the Divisional Court. Rule 2 of the same order provides that every referee to whom a cause is referred for trial shall direct how judgment is to be entered, and such judgment is to be entered accordingly, and rule 6 gives a right of appeal from such judgment. Then by rule (6a): "Rules 2 and 6 of Order XL. shall apply to a reference to any officer of the court or special referee or arbitrator under an order of the court." A master is an officer of the court, and therefore, by rule (6a), a reference to him is a reference to a referee to which rule 6 applies, and if rule 6 applies there would be an appeal from his decision expressly given to the Divisional Court, as in the case of an appeal from the judgment of a referee. Sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act 1889 (Annual Practice, vol. 2, p. 567) deals with references under that Act, and it says that in any cause or matter, if all the parties consent, the court or a judge may order the whole cause or matter to be tried before a special referee or arbitrator agreed on by the parties, or before an official referee or officer of the court. That reference is by consent of the parties; almost the same words are used as in Order XIV., r. 7, and the procedure is the same. There is an appeal to the Divisional Court from the decision of the referee after trial under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, notwithstanding that the reference of the whole action is by consent of the parties; and then come in rules 6 and 6 (a) of Order XL., which apply the same rule to any reference to any officer of the court under an order of the court. It would be a strange result if, when an action is by consent of the parties referred by an order of a judge, under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act 1889, to a referee, there should be a right of appeal, and yet that there should be no right of appeal when an action is by consent of the parties and by order of a judge referred to a master under Order XIV.,

K.B. Div.]

FRASER v. FRASER.

[K.B. Div.]

r. 7. The reference is in either case made by consent of the parties and by order of a judge, and there is no more reason why there should be an appeal in the one case than in the other. What Order XIV., r. 7, contemplates is that the action should be sent to a master under the same conditions as to an official referee under the Arbitration Act; and the moment you refer an action and take an order of the court for that purpose, then the case is under the Arbitration Act. If that rule were to deprive a person of his right to appeal to this court, it would take away the usefulness of the rule. An examination of the rule itself shows that it was not intended to take away the right of appeal. The first clause of the rule says that with the consent of the parties an order may be made referring the action to a master; the second part of the rule says, "or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner." In the latter part of the rule it was intended that there should be no appeal, and the words "without appeal" are expressly inserted. If it had been intended that in the reference to a master in the first part of the rule there should be no appeal, we should also have expected to find the words "without appeal," but those words are confined to the second part of the rule; thereby showing that there is no such limitation in the case of a reference to a master. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—My present view is that if the parties consent to refer to a master under Order XIV., r. 7, then it is the same as in the former practice before the Judicature Act—namely, that there is no appeal, as the master would be acting as an arbitrator.] In Darlington Waggon and Engineering Company v. Harding and Trouville Pier and Steamboat Company (64 L. T. Rep. 409; (1891) 1 Q. B. 245) an order was made by consent to refer all matters in difference to arbitration, and it was held that the award of the arbitrator was final and could not be reviewed by the court; but the reason there given was that the order of reference, as it included matters other than the action, was not one that could be made under sect. 57 of the Judicature Act 1873, or the Arbitration Act 1889, but owed its validity to the consent of the parties only, and that therefore the award was final. The judgment of Lord Esher, M.R. would seem to show that if the reference had been of the action simply, the result would have been different; and there is a difference between that case and the present, where the order was that "the action" should be referred. If in the Chancery Division the whole action is referred to an official referee for trial, and judgment has been entered by his direction, that judgment is not final, and an application to set it aside may be made to a judge of that division:

Wynne-Finch v. Chaytor, 89 L. T. Rep. 123; (1903) 2 Ch. 475.

There can be no possible distinction between the two cases of the parties consenting to the matter going to an arbitrator under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, and the parties consenting to the action being referred to a master under Order XIV., r. 7. [He also referred to Order LVII., rr. 7 and 11, as to judgments in interpleader proceedings.]

Trevor F. Lloyd in reply.—Here the parties deliberately by consent referred the action to a master. If the parties want to preserve their right of appeal, they need not consent to the reference. There can be no hardship and no difficulty at all, as all the parties have to do is to refuse to give their consent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case undoubtedly raises a point of very great importance, and, if I had any real doubt in the matter, I should have taken time to consider it. That, however, is not necessary, more especially as the case is one in which our decision can be reviewed. The point is whether under Order XIV., r. 7, where an action has been referred to a master by consent of the parties, the master is a referee or special referee for the purposes of the trial, under sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act 1889, or is a person selected by the parties to whom the action is referred. What presses on my mind is that there had been for years a well-known practice of referring actions to the master. In old days, for many years, it was a common thing to refer a case to the Queen's Bench masters, and, when cases were so referred to the master on questions of fact, he was an arbitrator, and there was no review. A master would have the power of stating special cases and doing certain things; but the point we are considering to-day is whether or not, when a motion has been brought to set aside his finding on the questions referred to him, there is an appeal of any kind. I cannot believe that under such words as are in the rule it was intended to destroy the old practice. I think the rule, when it says "Upon the hearing of the application with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master," means that the master becomes an arbitrator. Counsel for the defendant pressed us with reference to the words "may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner," but I think there is a fallacy in his argument, if I may say so. It is not that there is no appeal at all from the reference to the master. A question might arise if the master had exceeded his jurisdiction and dealt with something outside the action; but, with reference to the questions referred to him, I see no express or implied intention that the master should be put, for the purposes of that reference, into the position of an official referee. I think the subsequent orders somewhat strengthen the view I am taking. I need not refer in detail to the code of rules, or do more perhaps than refer to sect. 14 of the Arbitration Act, which provided for a different state of things, and provided for a compulsory reference. It says: "The court or a judge may at any time order the whole cause or matter, or any question or issue of fact arising therein, to be tried before a special referee or arbitrator respectively agreed on by the parties, or before an official referee or officer of the court." Those cases we know well. The referee makes a report. On that report you may move for judgment. Sometimes the judgment may be entered automatically, or may be entered upon the report where the parties are left to move for judgment. The official referee or the special referee is the person who is created by the rules for the purpose of determining certain questions, and certain rights are given to the parties. The only rules to which I need refer, beyond those to which I have referred in general terms, are those relied upon by the defendant's counsel. If we look at Order XL.,

K.B. Div.]

FRASER v. FRASER.

[K.B. Div.]

r. 6 (a), which applies, as the defendant's counsel rightly says, to rules of the same order, it says rules 2 and 6 of Order XL shall apply to a reference to any officer of the court, or special referee, or arbitrator under an order of the court. Rule 2 is: "Every referee to whom a cause or matter shall be referred for trial shall direct how judgment shall be entered, and such judgment shall be entered accordingly by a master or registrar, as the case may be," and rule 6 is, to put it shortly, that the judgment, if not entered in accordance with the finding, may be set aside. Neither of those rules directly imply, if I am right in the view that the master is intended to be an arbitrator, that there would be any appeal from his decision on a question of fact. Then turning to Order XXXVI., r. 55 (c), to which reference was also made, that states that "The provisions of rules 48 to 55 of Order XXXVI. and of rule 55 (b) shall apply, where any cause or matter . . . is referred to an officer of the court, or to a special referee or arbitrator." If we look through the rules we find that they are really rules of procedure, and have nothing to do with the question of appeal, or the question of setting aside the decision of a master in a case referred to him. If any argument is to be founded on those rules, it would go against the contention of the defendant's counsel, because it shows that it was thought necessary to apply these special provisions, and that the trial was not intended to be subject to all the provisions which apply in the case of a trial by a special referee. Then the defendant's counsel says that it is a strange thing that an appeal should be taken away. It is for that reason that I venture to refer to the old and still existing practice. I think the master was intended to be an arbitrator. Without saying that the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case of Fraser v. Fraser (ubi sup.) is an authority upon this point, because obviously they meant to leave this point open, I think the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls, and certainly the opinion of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., is applicable. Cozens-Hardy, L.J. says in terms that the words used clearly indicated a reference to a person who was to be an arbitrator, or in the nature of an arbitrator. While I do not agree with the view that the words "without appeal" in the second limb of the rule really show that the language of the rule meant to exclude appeal, I think it did refer to another mode of trial in which there was no appeal. In my opinion the language of the rule intended the action to be referred by consent of the parties to the master, who was to hear the facts as an arbitrator, and that there was to be no appeal against his decision. I assume, of course, that that is the basis of the motion which is made before the court. In my opinion there is no appeal.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Order XIV., r. 7, upon which the question turns, is not, as has been remarked in the Court of Appeal, very happily worded. Inasmuch as no order can be made under that rule except by consent, there is really no a priori argument that can be urged why there should or should not be an appeal, because whatever is done has to be done with the consent of the parties. It seems to me that to say there is some reason to suppose that the parties consented to forego some appeal is quite beside the mark. That is unreasonable when people agree to things with their eyes open. It may be that a person who did not understand the rules may have agreed to something which he did not intend to agree to; but that is a case which is common where there is an obscurity of expression in the rules. Then, again, an argument may be founded on what the position or contrast may be between the two parts of the sentence in rule 7, which are joined by the word "or," as between appeal and no appeal, or between a reference to the master and a case where the master hears the case himself and decides in a summary way. There is nothing in the rule which would make the one construction more easy than the other. Under these circumstances the only thing to do, as it seems to me, is to look at the words of the rule and see what is the natural meaning to be put upon them. The phrase "that the action be referred" is a very old one. I have, when at the Bar, decided very many actions upon phraseology identical with that. Cases are referred to an arbitrator constantly, and it means, generally speaking, unless there is something special in the words which accompany it, a referring of the case in the ordinary sense to an arbitrator. Why that should not be the case here I really do not know. The fact that that is merely recurring to an old practice which existed many years ago, long before the Judicature Act was passed, to which my Lord has referred, is an argument for saying that reference means an ordinary reference constituting the referee an arbitrator. It seems to me that the words are more consistent with that view than with any other. If that be so, the rules of the Arbitration Act, which apply to an ordinary arbitration, apply here, and not those which apply to special references which are made to official or special referees, whose jurisdiction is confined to reporting, as to whom special rights of appeal or for reviewing their decisions, have given rise to rules which relate to them. This, in my opinion, must be an ordinary reference. Certainly the view of Cozens-Hardy, L.J. in Fraser v. Fraser (ubi sup.) was in the same direction, and so, apparently, was the view of the Master of the Rolls. I quite agree with my Lord in thinking that the words "without appeal" do not govern the whole of the rule. For the reasons which I have given, it seems to me that these words were wanted in the second limb, because the words of the first member of the rule do not apply to the case in which the master takes the reference then and there himself. If he does take the reference then and there then he has to dispose of it without appeal. In the other case, if that is not convenient, and he makes an order sending it to another master, because the case would take a long time or for some such reason, then it must be on the footing of an ordinary reference. In either case, as far as an appeal on the facts is concerned, there is none.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. The phrase "An order may be made referring the action to a master" had a well understood meaning at the time of the passing of the enactment and the framing of the rules under the Judicature Act. I cannot, for my own part, see any difficulty or inconsistency in holding that "referring the action to a master" means other than referring the action to a master as the understood meaning of the phrase had been for a long time, and existing at the time of the rule itself. Referring the action to the master treats the master as an ordinary arbitrator, with the consequence that in the strict sense of the term there would be no appeal from his decision, subject to this—that during the course of the arbitration points may be raised and submitted to the court above for his guidance or his correction. It is strongly argued by the defendant's counsel that that ought not to be the meaning which we are to put on the rule, on the ground that the words "without appeal" in the following limb of the sentence "or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner," would apply to that part of the sentence and not apply to the earlier part of the sentence. To my mind there are two sufficient answers to that. In the first place, the words "without appeal" are needed in the second limb of the rule if there had been no limb preceding that. For instance, supposing the rule had run: "Upon the hearing of the application with the consent of the parties the action may be finally disposed of in a summary manner," to reject the words "without appeal," otherwise than with regard to the summary jurisdiction of the master on the hearing of the summons, clearly would involve a right of appeal on the reference as from the master to the judge. I do not think there can be any argument on the question of the words "without appeal" in the second limb, or that the absence of the words in the first limb of the rule means that the action shall be referred to the master subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, sects. 14 and 15. Then I think there was this further reason that I do not suppose, if our view is right, that anybody would consider it was necessary to put the words "without appeal" in the first limb, because referring the action to a master was in itself an understood and complete expression, and to add to that the words "without appeal" would have been, to my mind, to have indicated a kind of reference such as nobody had heard of before—the reference of an action to an arbitrator without appeal. It would have been an unknown and difficult phrase, and people would have had to find some justification for it, because it would be inserting the words "without appeal" when it was only a reference to a master of an arbitration which did not carry any appeal strictly so called. Further, in my opinion, it is a strong thing to read the special provisions of the Arbitration Act into this enactment of Order XIV., r. 7, because one would have expected, if it was so intended—the rule being dated 1902—that the words would have been the same as they are in the Arbitration Act: "That an order may be made referring the trial of the action to the master." If it is to be said that it cannot have been intended to keep alive the old practice of reference to masters, a well-understood term, and that we ought to read in the provisions of the Arbitration Act, which is earlier in date—namely, 1889—then one would have expected that a special provision would have been inserted in Order XIV., r. 7, so as to make it clear that the reference which was to take place was a reference of the whole cause and matter to be tried before the special referee as arbitrator. Further than that, I think myself, although it is quite clear that the Court of Appeal reserved this point, as every member of the court who gave judgment said, and did not decide it, yet the language of Mathew, L.J. implies that that was the view with which he, at any rate, was impressed, because (at p. 60 of (1904) 1 K. B.) he is reported as giving judgment in these terms: "It was urged for the plaintiff that, under this rule, the master is merely in the position of an arbitrator at common law, and his decision is therefore final, except in cases where the decision of such an arbitrator could be questioned. I hesitate to decide that, because it is not, I think, really necessary in this case; but I have been impressed by the argument in favour of that construction of the rule." The phraseology of Cozens-Hardy, L.J. has been already referred to. Then Collins, M.R. leaves the point open. He says at the conclusion of his judgment: "As I have already said, I think the words of the rule plainly import that the action is to be 'referred,' and by that, in my opinion, must be meant either a reference at common law or a reference within the statutory provisions which I have mentioned." I therefore, as far as we can, prefer to take the view which seems, at any rate, as regards two members of the Court of Appeal, to have impressed them favourably, although it was not necessary for them to decide the point. I think, both on reason and on convenience, and on the true construction of the rule, that the view we have taken is right.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal.

RAILWAY AND CANAL COMMISSION COURT.

July 22, 23, Dec. 9 and 10, 1903.

(Before WRIGHT, J., Sir FREDERICK PEEL, and Viscount COBHAM.)

SPILLERS AND BAKERS LIMITED v. TAFF VALE RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Railway—Rates—Undue preference—Shipment rate and works rate—Works rate for same services higher than shipment rate—Right of trader to apply for reduction of works rate—Right to make application where trader does not directly pay rate—Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 2—Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1883 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), s. 27.

The mere fact that a railway company charge a higher rate for carriage of coal over the same length of line to traders' works—all traders being charged an equal rate—than they do for coal for shipment, is not of itself sufficient to give a trader a right to apply to the court for reduction of the works rate, and such difference between the works rate and the shipment rate does not necessarily show an undue preference or an undue prejudice within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts.

A railway company carried from certain collieries to C. large quantities of coal, the greater proportion of which was for shipment from that port to places abroad and to ports in England, and the remaining part was for works in C., including the works of the applicants, who were large flour millers in C., and for home consumption. They carried the shipment coal at a low shipment rate, but all other coal, whether for works (including the applicants' works) or for home consumption, was charged a higher or works rate, the works rate being some 50 per cent. higher than the shipment rate, and being the same for all traders in C. It was proved that the low shipment rate was justified by necessity, and that owing to competition with other ports and to other causes it was practically impossible in the interests of the public for the company to raise the shipment rate; and further, that the works rate was a reasonable rate, and was in fact so low that it could not reasonably be made lower without reducing it to a non-paying rate, and though there was some slight competition, no real or substantial competition was proved between the two classes of coal.

Upon a complaint by the applicants that the higher works rate charged for the carriage of their coal as compared with the low shipment rate was an undue preference and an undue prejudice within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts:

Held, that the mere difference in the two rates was not in itself sufficient to prove an undue preference or an undue prejudice, or to give the applicants a right to come to the court for relief; that, under the circumstances, within the meaning of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 27 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888, not only was the lower charge for the shipment traffic "necessary for securing in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made," but also "the inequality could not be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant," and that therefore the applicants were not entitled to a reduction in the works rate charged to them.

Seemle, in such case, the fact that the rates are charged by the railway company to and paid by the colliery company, and not directly charged to or paid by a trader himself in the first instance, does not prevent the trader from applying to the court under the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, if in substance the charge is made so as to affect the traders' interest.

APPLICATION to the Railway and Canal Commission Court.

1. The applicants, Messrs. Spillers and Bakers Limited, were millers and corn merchants carrying on business at (amongst other places) Cardiff.

2. They purchased large quantities of coal from collieries situated on the defendants' railway, and such coal was conveyed from the collieries by the defendants in owners' waggons to one or other of the following points—namely, either: (a) to a junction of the defendants' railway with the Cardiff Railway called the East Dock Junction, Cardiff; or (b) to a point of exchange with the Cardiff Railway in the vicinity of the East Dock Junction known as Maloney's Sidings; or (c) to the Roath Dock Junction; or (d) to a point of exchange with the Cardiff Railway Company in the vicinity of the Roath Dock Junction, being the sidings situate on the south side of Roath Dock Coal Tips; or (e) to the defendants' Cardiff terminus. From the said point or points the coal was conveyed by the Cardiff Railway Company to the applicants' mills at a uniform charge of 2s. per waggon.

3. The defendants also conveyed coal from the same collieries via the East Dock Junction and the Roath Dock Junction respectively to the coal tips in the vicinity of the points of exchange (b and d), referred to in clause 2, with a view to its shipment from the Bute Docks, Cardiff.

4. Notwithstanding that the coal for the applicants was conveyed in the same manner and passed only over the same portion of the defendants' railway as the coal for shipment, the defendants charged higher rates for the conveyance of the applicants' coal than for coal for shipment as set forth in the next paragraph, and thereby they subjected the applicants and traffic in coal for consumption in Cardiff to an undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage.

5. Rates for coal to the points above referred to:

6. By reason of the undue preference and inequality of charge the applicants had suffered damage and paid overcharges to the defendants since the 1st Jan. 1896; and they applied to the Court of the Railway and Canal Commission under the Railway and Canal Traffic Acts 1854 to 1888 and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, for the following relief, that is to say: (1) An order enjoining the defendants to desist from subjecting the coal traffic of the applicants to the undue prejudice above referred to. (2) (Alternatively) An order enjoining the defendants at all times to charge to the applicants the same rates for the carriage of their coal as the defendants charged for coal for shipment from the said collieries respectively. (3) 1852l. 15s. 8d. as damages in respect of the overcharges.

The answer of the defendants was as follows:—

The defendants did not admit that coal destined for the applicants' premises was conveyed by the defendants from the collieries referred to in par. 2 of the application to the points mentioned in that paragraph, nor that coal for shipment was conveyed by them in the manner alleged in par. 3 of the application.

The coal for the applicants was not conveyed in the same manner and did not pass only over the same portion of the defendants' railway as the coal for shipment, nor did the defendants subject the applicants and traffic in coal for consumption in Cardiff to an undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage.

There was no competition in interest between the applicants and the persons for whom the shipment coal was carried. The cost of conveyance of the applicants' coal was greater than that of shipment coal, and lower rates for shipment coal were necessary for the purpose of securing in the interest of the public the shipment traffic.

The applicants had not suffered damage or paid overcharges. The defendants did not carry the coal destined for the applicants' mills, nor had the charges made by the defendants for the carriage thereof been paid by the applicants.

No complaint was made to the commissioners within one year from the discovery by the applicants of the matter complained of.

The charges made by the defendants had been paid voluntarily and with a full knowledge of the facts. The rates complained of had, for the period during which such rates had been in operation, been duly published in the rate-books of the defendants at their stations in accordance with sect. 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1873, as amended by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888.

So much of the applicants' claim as related to damages alleged to have been sustained before the 23rd Dec. 1896 was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

It was assented to by both parties that the charges and the difference in the charges set out in par. 5 of the case were correct; and, further, that the charges were not paid by the applicants to the railway company, but were paid, at all events in the first instance, by the colliery-owners to the railway company.

It was also admitted in the evidence and was common ground that the rates charged by the defendant railway company for carrying the coal from the respective collieries to the sidings at Cardiff were, in the case of coal carried for the applicants' works in Cardiff and other works in Cardiff 75d. per ton per mile, which was the statutory maximum the railway company were entitled to charge, and in the case of coal for shipment from Cardiff 575d. per ton per mile; so that the two rates of which complaint was made by the applicants as founding an undue preference or an undue prejudice against them were the shipment rate of 575d. per ton per mile and the works rate of 75d. per ton per mile. The difference between the two rates (the shipment rate and the works rate) came to about 6d. per ton—that is, that the shipment rate was less than the works rate by some 30 per cent., or the works or home rate charged to the applicants and others in Cardiff for the home coal consumed at the works around the Cardiff Docks was some 50 or 52 per cent. more than the rate charged for shipment coal. There was a very large export of coal from the port of Cardiff (including Barry), estimated at some 20,000,000 tons yearly, of which some 12,000,000 tons were shipped from Cardiff (including Penarth). Of this quantity the Taff Vale Railway Company conveyed 9,000,000 tons for shipment (5,000,000 tons to Cardiff and 4,000,000 tons to Penarth), 1,000,000 tons for works over their whole system, and 400,000 tons to works at Cardiff; so that the proportion carried by the defendants for shipment and for home consumption at Cardiff was about 9,000,000 tons to 400,000 tons. The shipment rate was the same whether the coal was shipped to foreign ports or coastwise, and the same works rate was charged for all coal to be used in Cardiff.

Evidence was given on behalf of the applicants to the effect that they used about 12,000 tons of coal yearly for their mills at Cardiff, and that they purchased their coal from the colliery companies set out in the application, but that the greater part of it (being more than one-half of the whole) they purchased from the Ocean Colliery Company, who were very large colliery proprietors and shippers of coal. The applicants generally paid to the colliery company the same rate as for shipment coal on the f.o.b. basis, in accordance with their contract, and then afterwards they paid the extra charge for the home or works coal over and above the shipment rate. The coal coming from the Ocean Company (whether intended for the applicants or for shipment) was brought down from the collieries intermixed together, and whatever their destination might be—whether for shipment or for home consumption—they were brought down together by the colliery company to the sidings at Cardiff in the same train loads and under the same conditions; and it was not until the coal got to these sidings that the colliery company said whether the coal was for shipment or for the works, and they then gave orders that some of the waggons should be sent to the applicants' mills, and the coal was then separated, and the applicants' coal went partly over the sidings and partly over the Cardiff Company's line to the applicants' works, for which the Cardiff Company were paid 2s. per waggon. The whole of the coal from the Ocean Colliery came down ostensibly for shipment; if it was intended for shipment it went over the staiths to the Roath Dock and the Roath Basin; but if it was intended for the applicants' works it was handed over at the sidings and then taken to the applicants' works. The coal in each case was precisely the same kind of coal—namely, steam coal that would be used for industrial purposes—and the applicants alleged that so far as they were concerned for precisely the same services in carrying coal of the same kind and quality, and carrying it under precisely the same conditions, they were charged by the railway company some 50 per cent. more when the coal was coming to their mills than when it was going for export, although there were no extra services of any kind performed by the company. As regards the payment of the rate, the usual course according to the contract was for the applicants to pay the colliery company the f.o.b. price, and then when the railway company made the further charge on the colliery company for the extra 6d. per ton, the colliery company paid it to the railway company, and then sent in another invoice to the applicants for that 6d. per ton, so that the applicants themselves did not pay the rate to the railway company directly, but the rate having been paid in the first instance by the colliery company, the applicants repaid the colliery company. Sometimes the coal was conveyed from the other collieries direct to the applicants' works, but in such cases it was carried under the same conditions as the shipment coal, and sometimes it was conveyed in pick-up trains.

For the purpose of showing competition in interest, evidence was given to the effect that coal was brought from the same collieries and districts at the shipment rate to Cardiff, and was thence carried by sea to Gloucester, London, Portsmouth, and to Ireland, and was supplied to flour millers in those places (four firms in and around London, one firm in Newport, and one in Cork), and that this coal would be used for milling purposes by the firms to whom it was supplied, and that these firms were more or less competitors with the applicants in their business in certain markets and particularly in London, so creating an unfair competition with the applicants, which considerably affected their business in London, Southampton, Portsmouth, Newport, and elsewhere.

Evidence was given on behalf of the railway company that originally there was no distinction on their line between the shipment rate and the works rate; that that identity of rate lasted from the opening of the railway in or about 1840 down to about the year 1860; that the first difference between the two rates was made about 1860 by reducing the terminal on shipment coal, and in 1867 that terminal was abolished. Then that having lasted for some years, the rate, which up to that time had been 875d. per ton per mile was, by successive steps from 1876 to 1889, reduced for shipment to 74d. per ton per mile. Then in 1889 the Barry Docks were opened and a new competition sprang up, and the Barry Company announced publicly that their shipment rate would not exceed 1d. per ton per mile, and in order to meet that the defendants brought down their shipment rate to the present figure of 575d., which was practically equivalent to the 1d. of the Barry Company, making allowance for the difference in distance, and that even before the opening of the Barry Docks great pressure was put upon the defendants by persons engaged in the shipping trade to lower their shipment rate, and that it was probably owing to that pressure that the very low Barry rate was fixed on, as the Barry Dock was built at the instance of coal traders. If coal were going from any given colliery to Cardiff by the Taff Vale Railway, or to Barry by that railway and the Barry Railway combined, the shipment rate and the works rate would be the same whether it were going to Cardiff or to Barry. If coal were going to Barry from these collieries it would pass over a part of the Taff Vale Railway, and thence by the Barry Railway to Barry, and in such case, if it were consigned for shipment, it would, when passing over the defendants' line, be charged the same low or shipment rate as if it were going to Cardiff; but if consigned for works in Barry it would be charged the high or works rate (875d.).

For the purpose of showing that the rate charged to the applicants was a fair rate, evidence was given to show that the rates actually charged for works at Cardiff (including the applicants' works) were the rates allowed under the defendants' Rates and Charges Order 1892, which was simply a re-enactment of their previous powers, and that this rate (875d. per ton per mile for coal), although a maximum, was a very low maximum—in fact, the lowest in the kingdom, although the distance was not great—and that in most of the other railway companies the maximum charge was 1½d. or over, as in the case of the Great Western, where the maximum went as high as 2d. per ton; and that therefore the applicants, in being charged that rate, were enjoying a low rate, which could not be lowered without reducing it to a non-paying rate.

Evidence was also given to show that the shipment rate could not be raised; that the low shipment rate had been brought about chiefly by the commercial pressure of Cardiff, and had very largely increased the home and export trade of Cardiff, and that if there were a raising of the shipment rate the trade would leave Cardiff and go to other ports, such as Barry, Newport, and other places; that, in fact, it could not be raised, owing to the considerable and increasing competition with other foreign sources of coal supply, and that there was one special reason why it was impossible to raise it—namely, that the Barry Railway Company had bound themselves by agreement with their freighters, as one of the conditions on which they constructed their dock, that they would not charge more than 1d. per ton per mile for the conveyance of shipment coal over their railway, and that if the Taff Vale Railway charged a higher shipment rate than was charged by the Barry Railway, the coal would leave the defendants' railway and go to the Barry Railway, and that bargain between the Barry Company and the freighters ruled the defendants' shipment rate, and prevented them from raising it. The existence of the low shipment rate had been of great benefit to the public, and the fact that the defendants treated coastwise traffic exactly the same (as to shipment rate) as foreign traffic had developed considerable competition by sea to the advantage of the public; that by the low shipment rate the coal which formerly went by rail was attracted to Cardiff and was conveyed by sea to Southampton, London, and other places, and that if the shipment rate were raised this competition by sea would be materially affected, to the prejudice of the public.

For the purpose of showing the extra cost of carriage of works coal as compared with shipment coal, evidence was given that the shipment coal was brought down from the collieries to Cardiff in full train loads (of about 450 tons as an average), but that coal for the works, including the applicants' coal, was generally brought down in pick-up or mixed trains (of about 100 tons), which stopped several times on the journey for the purpose of picking up other goods, and that the extra cost of working these pick-up trains and delivering the coal by them at the various works was estimated by the defendant company from about 3½d. as a minimum to about 5½d. or 6d. per ton as a maximum, according to circumstances. The pick-up train consisted very largely of empty waggons returning to Cardiff after taking up goods traffic, a few trucks of light goods, chiefly empties—such as crates, boxes, and so forth—returning home, and a few trucks of coal; they were mixed trains, dealing with other goods as well as coal, and making stoppages all along the journey to pick up goods, thereby increasing the cost of carriage.

Sect. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31) provides:

Every railway company, canal company, and railway and canal company, shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways and canals belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, boats, and other vehicles; and no such company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favour of any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any such company subject any particular person or company, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; and every railway company and canal company, and railway and canal company having or working railways or canals which form part of a continuous line of railway or canal or railway and canal communication, or which have the terminus, station or wharf of the one near the terminus, station, or wharf of the other, shall afford all due and reasonable facilities for receiving and forwarding all the traffic arriving by one of such railways or canals by the other, without any unreasonable delay, and without any such preference or advantage, or prejudice or disadvantage, as aforesaid, and so that no obstruction may be offered to the public desirous of using such railways or canals or railways and canals as a continuous line of communication, and so that all reasonable accommodation may, by means of the railways and canals of the several companies, be at all times afforded to the public in that behalf.

The Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25) provides:

Sect. 27 (1). Whenever it is shown that any railway company charge one trader or class of traders, or the traders in any district, lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar merchandise, or lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar services, than they charge to other traders, or classes of traders, or to the traders in another district, or make any difference in treatment in respect of any such trader or traders, the burden of proving that such lower charge or difference in treatment does not amount to an undue preference shall lie on the railway company. (2) In deciding whether a lower charge or difference in treatment does or does not amount to an undue preference, the court having jurisdiction in the matter, or the commissioners, as the case may be, may, so far as they think reasonable, in addition to any other considerations affecting the case, take into consideration whether such lower charge or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made, and whether the inequality cannot be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant: Provided that no railway company shall make, nor shall the court, or the commissioners, sanction, any difference in the tolls, rates, or charges made for, or any difference in the treatment of, home and foreign merchandise, in respect of the same or similar services. (3) The court or the commissioners shall have power to direct that no higher charge shall be made to any person for services in respect of merchandise carried over a less distance than is made to any other person for similar services in respect of the like description and quantity of merchandise carried over a greater distance on the same line of railway.

Balfour Browne, K.C. (C. A. Russell, K.C. and W. J. Noble with him) for the railway company.—The two rates which are complained of as founding an undue preference are the shipment rate of 575d., and the works rate of 875d. It is important to point out that the applicants have really no contract at all with the railway company, and they do not pay the railway company for the carriage of their coal. They make their contracts with the colliery proprietors, and the colliery proprietors, and not the applicants, pay the railway company for the carriage. The charges complained of are charges to the colliery proprietors, so that the applicants are really not known to the railway company at all in this transaction. The applicants' complaint is based on the fact that the railway company do charge a different and a lower rate for coal for shipment than they do for coal for the [applicants'] works. That practice, whether right or wrong exists at almost all ports. First, as to sect. 90 of the Railways Clauses Act 1845, there is no preference at all, as all coal going to works in Cardiff or for consumption in Cardiff is carried at exactly the same rate, and every person there is treated in the same way if he is going to consume in Cardiff. [Cripps, K.C.—The applicants are not here upon sect. 90 of the Act of 1845, nor do I think it would apply, though the case is as near to it as possible. WRIGHT, J.—If you are both agreed as to that, we need not consider that section.] If the complaint is under the Traffic Acts, then under sect. 2 of the Traffic Act of 1854, there must not only be a preference, but that preference must be shown to be undue. There was here no undue preference and no preference at all, because there was no competition in interest between the two sets of coal—the coal for shipment and the coal for the works, and coal for works in Cardiff was all carried at the same rate. It is said that the difference in the rates is illegal, and the argument is based, not so much on the Act of 1888, as upon sect. 2 of the Act of 1854, the words relied on being “no company shall make or give any undue or unreasonable preference . . . to or in favour of any particular person, or any particular description of traffic.” It is said that the company are preferring a traffic, and that therefore there is an undue preference. But there can be no preference of an article unless that results in the preference of an individual; it does not matter that an article is preferred. It is the trader that the Legislature want to protect as against the action of the railway company in relation to other traders; and when we refer to sect. 27 of the Act of 1888 it is seen that the word “traffic” is left out altogether. The words there are: “Whenever it is shown that any railway company charge one trader or class of traders” lower tolls, then the court has jurisdiction; so that the idea that you can have a preference unless there is a preference or prejudice to some individual is new and cannot be made out from the true construction either of sect. 2 of the Act of 1854 or sect. 27 of the Act of 1888. In various cases the question of traffic without a preference or a prejudice to an individual has been considered. It was considered with regard to passenger traffic by the Court of Session in Hoxier v. Caledonian Railway Company (17 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2nd series, 302, 1 N. & Mac. 27), and the distinction is founded on sect. 2 of the Act of 1854. That case shows that you cannot look at the traffic as such, but that there must be an individual who is aggrieved by the particular thing. That was followed in 1887 by this court in Skinningrove Iron Company v. North-Eastern Railway Company (5 Ry. & Can. Tr. Cas. 244). That position has not been altered by sect. 27 of the Act of 1888. Under that section if lower charges are made to one class of traders than to another, then the onus of showing that that is not an undue preference is put on the railway company, and in sub-sect. 2 the court, in dealing with the question of undue preference, are, in addition to other circumstances, to take into account two things—whether the lower charge is necessary for the purpose of securing the traffic in the interests of the public, and whether the inequality could not be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant. Those are the tests to apply to this case in ascertaining whether there has been an undue preference or not. First, with regard to the lower shipment rate, that lower rate is necessary for securing the traffic in the interests of the public. The home rate from the collieries to Cardiff and to Barry is practically the same. If the railway company raised the shipment rate to anything like the rate charged to the traders, then the company would get none of that traffic at all, and no coal for shipment would come over their railway at all; it would all go to Barry, Newport, and elsewhere, and into other hands; and in addition to the competition by sea there is also the competition by other railways and routes, and the competition is an element which this court ought to consider, according to Lord Herschell in Pickering-Phipps v. London and North-Western Railway Company (66 L. T. Rep. 721; (1892) 2 Q. B. 229). The whole district would suffer by raising the shipment rate. Then, with regard to lowering the traders' rate, the evidence shows that that rate is already very low, and that, if it were reduced at all, it would be to a non-paying rate. There is also another reason for the difference in the rates. The coal for shipment comes down in full train loads, whereas the applicants' coal is brought down in pick-up trains and in loads which are picked up at various places, and the cost to the company is thereby increased. That might not justify the whole difference, though it would account for a part of it; but the company do not rely upon the extra cost of carriage, as they wish to establish their right to make this difference, as comparing these two articles and their destination. Lastly, there is no competition in interest between the people complaining and the people who get this supposed undue preference, and all the cases show that there must be such competition of interest.

Cripps, K.C. (Rowland Whitehead with him) for the applicants.—The case raises a most important question of principle under the Traffic Acts, and the applicants are not here to seek to diminish by a penny or so the difference between the two charges, though, as traders, they would be glad to get any reduction. Our contention goes far beyond that to the general principle that the same stuff carried under the same conditions, so far as the traders are concerned, whether for export or for the applicants' works, ought to be charged at the same rate. The applicants' coal comes from the same collieries; it is the same kind of coal (steam coal) as the shipment coal, and it is extremely important in this case that as regards the conditions of carriage there is absolutely no distinction between whether the coal is going for shipment or for home consumption, and the applicants want to have their coal treated in the same way as to charges as the shipment coal. Traffic connected with the home industries should have the same advantage as the shipment rate. There is no question here of putting up the shipment rate; the railway company say that it is impossible; but the rate to the traders ought to be lowered to the shipment rate, as there is no reason why the home industries should not have the benefit of the competition which they ought naturally to get from the great shipping traffic at Cardiff. Then it is said that there is no element of competition, which is necessary in cases of undue preference. We have the very same products, the same steam coal in both cases—and steam coal is about the most competitive raw material possible under modern conditions of business—therefore we have both competition with, and disadvantage to, the applicants. Industries abroad competing with industries at home get the commodity of raw coal with an undue advantage. Coal going from Cardiff docks to be used in industries abroad must come into competition with home industries, and further, in the case of Messrs. Spillers, a large quantity of the shipment coal goes round to the Thames, where there are millers competing with them in their own trade. It has never been suggested in this court that where you have the same raw material, and are giving better terms for shipment than for home traffic, there is no competition. The home industries should not be put to this disadvantage of 6d. per ton. There is, therefore, competition. Then, apart from special injury to a particular trader, the Traffic Act of 1854, as explained in this respect by the Act of 1888, did provide against what is called undue preference as regards traffic quâ traffic, quite apart from trader. If there are traffics which in themselves are different—as, for instance, if it were a case of coal for gas purposes and coal for manufacturing purposes, then there is not the same traffic and there is not the traffic competition; but where the traffics are exactly the same or similar, then there is no case in which it has been held that a preference of this kind does not come within the undue preference clause. It is an extremely important principle that traffic for traffic, traffics are to be treated equally, as well as traders. The distinction is clearly brought out between the two things in sect. 2 of the Act of 1854. It says that the company are not to give any undue preference “to or in favour of any particular person.” That is one point, and that refers to the trader qui trader. Then the section goes on: “or any particular description of traffic.” That refers to traffic quâ traffic, and means (as was interpreted by the House of Lords under sect. 90 of the Act of 1845) that if you have traffic which, so far as the railway company are concerned, is similar in all respects and have the same stuff carried and carried under the same conditions, then the case comes within the very terms of sect. 2, and the company cannot charge more to one trader than to the other. There is the same idea in sect. 27 of the Act of 1888, which is merely in addition to the general principle of sect. 2 of the Act of 1854. We have the whole traders (as this is admitted to be the general system) who use this class of coal for their works at Cardiff, placed at an undue disadvantage in reference to rates and unduly prejudiced as compared with all other traders who use the same coal either in other parts of this country or abroad, and who get the lower price by means of export coal, some of which is exported to places in this country and thereby comes into competition with the applicants. So that there is not only an undue preference given to the one class of traders, but there is an undue prejudice or disadvantage to the other class, and traffic quâ traffic, quite apart from trader, comes within sect. 2. The only case that tends in favour of the company's contention is Skinningrove Iron Company v. North-Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.). That case was decided in the year 1897, and therefore before the Act of 1888 was passed, and it is submitted that the law, as stated by Sir F. Peel (at p. 249), can hardly be considered the law now. There there was not a case of direct competition, one of the parties not being able to show that their trade was immediately affected. That is not the principle which is now adopted in this court. No one would suggest that an applicant would now have to show that he had lost orders in the market and that test would not now be applied in the sense of non-suiting anyone who brought an application for undue preference, merely because he could not show actual loss of market or actual injury, so long as there is competitive interest, as there was there and as there is here. But even taking that case as it is, we can show that we are aggrieved in having a higher rate charged, and in the sense that our actual competitors in trade get the advantage of the lower shipment rate. [WRIGHT, J.—I am not at all sure that sect. 27 of the Act of 1888 was not passed for the purpose of dealing with the Skinningrove case.] It certainly would deal with that: at all events, it is now sufficient for an applicant to prove a higher rate in respect of a similar transit to entitle him to launch his case. [He also referred to the judgment of Lord Herschell in Pickering-Phipps v. London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) and to Great Western Railway Company v. Sutton (22 L. T. Rep. 43; L. Rep. 4 H. L. 226.)]

C. A. Russell, K.C., for the railway company in reply, referred to sect. 41 of the Bute Docks Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. cxxii.), and to clause 7 of the Agreement in the schedule to the Taff Vale Railway Act 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. cxi.), as showing an important statutory distinction between coal which was destined for shipment and coal which was destined for other purposes, and as showing that Parliament imposed upon the company an obligation in respect of coal which was destined for shipment which they did not impose in respect of coal destined for other purposes, in that it obliged the company, when the coal was for shipment, to perform certain services, such as the removing and conveying of empty waggons free of any charge, which they would not have been bound to perform without payment, and that therefore, although there was not the statutory recognition of the difference between the shipment coal and land sale coal taking the form of a difference of maximum, there was the statutory recognition of the difference taking the form of obligations placed on the company in respect of shipment coal which were not put upon them in respect of land sale or works coal. In the first place, the applicants have failed to establish that there is any competitive interest; they have entirely failed to show that any person has been unduly preferred. Secondly, even if there was the least evidence as to that calling on the company for a justification, there is ample evidence of justification—namely, there is the statutory recognition of difference between shipment and land sales coal; the two trades are entirely different and distinct, and the one has necessities which do not exist in the other; in the case of shipment coal the company are subjected to the competition of other docks and railways, and there is nothing of the kind with regard to land sales coal; and there is also justification, because the cost of dealing with the two classes of tariff is not the same, being higher in the case of land sales coal. On all these grounds the application fails.

WRIGHT, J.—We should not have thought of disposing of this case without further consideration if we had not already had a considerable opportunity of discussing it, and if we had not had the advantage of the very full arguments which we have heard. There is one point I wish to deal with before going to the merits of the case, and that is with regard to the construction of sect. 27 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1888. I confess I have felt some difficulty throughout the case as regards the question whether these applicants have at present any locus standi to make this application, inasmuch as the rates for the railway carriage are, in the first instance at any rate, charged to, and paid by, the colliery company, and it is a matter of some difficulty to determine whether the payment by the colliery company is or is not a payment by them as colliery owners, or in some way as agents for persons to whom the coal is going. I do not think it is very material to discuss that question in the present case, for this one reason, amongst others, that in my opinion sect. 27 is rather framed with a view to giving the go-by, as far as possible, to technicalities of that kind. Sect. 27, sub-sect. 1, provides: "Whenever it is shown that any railway company charge one trader or class of traders, or the traders in any district, lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar merchandise, or lower tolls, rates, or charges for the same or similar services, than they charge to other traders, or classes of traders, or to the traders in another district, or make any difference in treatment in respect of any such trader, or traders," and so on. It is not necessary, in our judgment, to decide it in this case; but I desire simply to point out that, to my mind, if in substance the charge is made so as to affect the interest of the trader, it may be that it is not essential legally that there should be any direct charge made to the trader. I say no more than that at present, and I say it only to pass it by. I now come to the case itself, which is one of very great importance. Messrs. Spillers and Bakers, the applicants, have mills and biscuit works at Cardiff, with an out-turn of something like 530,000L. per annum. For the purpose of those works they consume about 12,000 tons of coal per annum. For the carriage of that coal they pay, or there is paid in respect of the carriage of that coal—I will not say which it is at present—2s. per truck to the Dock Company, and 1s. 6d. per ton in respect of the transit over the Taff Vale Railway Company's (the defendants') line. The Taff Vale Railway Company's charge for similar coals carried by them over the same portion of line for shipment may be taken at 1s. The applicants, Messrs. Spillers and Bakers, complain that to the extent of this difference, which may be taken as 6d. per ton, there is an undue preference in favour of the shipment traffic and an undue prejudice or disadvantage to the applicants' traffic within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854; and inasmuch as for the transit over the same portion of the Taff Vale Railway Company's line of the same traffic there is a difference in the charge of 50 per cent., the applicants being charged some 50 per cent. more than the shipment rate, I suppose no one can deny that, prima facie, there is a case for investigation. It is possible, and I should myself say probable, that the difference of 6d. per ton in the 1s. 6d. might have to be reduced by something in respect of an actually greater running cost of the pick-up trains, in which the applicants' traffic is conveyed, as compared with the cost of the working of the trains with full train loads, in which the shipment coal is conveyed. That difference is put by the defendants at somewhere between 3d. and 6d., but I do not think it is possible to suppose that the real difference is as great as that. Most of it is due to the trucks carrying other goods, and, speaking for myself, I should say that the very outside allowance to make to the railway company for any difference in running cost in respect of the coal trucks would be 2d. per ton. But even that would leave a difference of some 33 per cent., and it is clear that the railway company, under sect. 27 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888, have to justify that. Now, the Taff Vale Railway Company say that they cannot possibly raise their shipment rates. The shipment coal is about nine million tons, or nine-tenths of their entire coal traffic in the district, and, in my judgment, they have proved that they cannot practically raise the shipment rates, partly by reason of the agreements by which they are bound, partly by reason of the competition with Barry, and partly by reason of the circumstances of the traffic itself in the coal, which will not stand increased rates. Further, the Taff Vale Railway Company say that the 1s. 6d. is a reasonable charge to make for the works coal which the applicants consume; and I think that there is an entire absence of any evidence to show that that charge is, taken by itself, anything but a very low charge; at any rate, it is a reasonable charge. Are those two answers sufficient? Another answer is suggested—namely, that sect. 27 of the Traffic Act of 1888 does not apply at all, and that the old Traffic Act of 1854 does not apply at all, except where the applicants' traffic is shown to suffer in competition with other traffic. I do not say how far there may not be something in that argument. The existence of competition is, I think, proved in this case, but I think there is no sufficient proof that the competition is at all substantial at the present time, or is affected in any way by the rate which is charged to the applicants for their coal. I doubt myself very much whether, under sect. 27 of the Act of 1888, the element of prejudice in competition is in any way an essential part of the cause of action. I think that question may some day have to be argued carefully. But here in substance, there being no real case of competition, the applicants' case is really founded on the mere difference of the rates charged for the transit of the same thing over the same line. The ground upon which we have come to the conclusion that the applicants' case fails is extremely short and simple. We think that the rates charged for the works coal are not shown to be too high, but are, upon the face of them, and upon the evidence before us, quite reasonable rates, except so far as they are more than the shipment rates; and they are rates which are charged, not to the applicants alone, but to all the traders within the district—traders who consume between them in the more restricted district of Cardiff alone 400,000 tons of coal for works and domestic consumption, and in the larger district which this railway supplies 1,000,000 tons of coal. That is a large area, and a large class of traders are affected, and when the whole of those traders are charged the same rate we cannot consider that the applicants have any special claims different from the other traders, and if the rate which is charged to all those traders is satisfactory to them, which, so far as the evidence goes, it appears to be, that is an additional argument for saying that the rate as charged to the applicants is one which ought not to be reduced unless by reason of the mere fact of the lower shipment rate. Therefore this case really comes down to a question whether the reduction of the shipment rate is of itself enough to give the applicants a right to relief. Upon that, it seems to me, the evidence is plain that the low shipment rate is justified here by necessity, and that practically it is impossible for the defendants to raise that rate. It is necessary to maintain the low shipment rates in order to secure the enormous traffic of 2,000,000 tons, in their own interest and in the public interest; and they are hindered by agreements, some of them statutory, and by the competition of Barry, from raising that rate at all. Then the case comes back to this, and this is the whole point of it; in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 27 of the Act of 1888 it is directed that we shall take into consideration, so far as we think reasonable, "in addition to any other considerations affecting the case, whether such lower charge or difference in treatment is necessary for the purpose of securing in the interests of the public the traffic in respect of which it is made." We have already answered that question in the affirmative. Then, secondly, "whether the inequality cannot be removed without unduly reducing the rates charged to the complainant." In our view, inasmuch as the shipment rates cannot practically be raised, and the only alternative is to lower the works rate, we cannot grant the relief asked, because it appears to us that the works rate is already as low as it can reasonably be made. Apparently it is quite as low as any rate in the United Kingdom for similar distances; and we do not see our way to reducing those rates further, because we think it would not be fair to the railway company to oblige them to charge the applicants less. We should add, although this forms no part of the grounds of our decision, that the loss to the applicants by reason of their being charged the works rate instead of the shipment rate, is not of a serious kind. Assuming that 2d. ought to be taken off the 6d. in respect of the difference of running costs between the two kinds of traffic, 4d. on 12,000 tons would be an annual loss of 200l. That on an out-turn of 530,000l. is about 9d. in 100l. At any rate, it is something very small, and it can hardly appreciably affect the applicants' traffic. For these reasons we think that the application must be dismissed.

WINANS AND ANOTHER v. ATTORNEY-
GENERAL. (b)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Domicil—Renunciation of domicil of origin—Evidence—Burden of proof.

The onus of proving that a domicil has been chosen in substitution for the domicil of origin lies upon the party asserting that the domicil of origin has been lost.

W., whose domicil of origin was in America, left America in 1850 and resided in Russia, for business purposes, for twenty years, visiting England in the winter to avoid the Russian climate. In 1870 he came to reside in England, but up to 1883 visited Russia yearly for business purposes. From 1883 up to his death in 1897 he resided in England. He retained a large interest in property in America, and always described himself as an American citizen, and spoke frequently of his intention of returning to America to develop his property in that country. While in England he lived in various houses taken on short leases. His will was proved in England, and the Crown claimed legacy duty on his estate, which was very large.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), Lord Lindley dissenting, that the Crown had failed to discharge the onus, which was upon them, of proving that W. had a fixed and settled purpose of renouncing his domicil of origin, and that the claim for legacy duty failed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.), reported 85 L. T. Rep. 508, who had affirmed a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ.), reported 83 L. T.
Rep. 634, upon an information by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown to recover legacy duty payable in respect of the estate of William Louis Winans, who died on the 22nd June 1897. The question was whether or not he was domiciled in this country.

The action was commenced by information by the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, claiming legacy duty at 10 per cent. on an annuity of 2000*l.* bequeathed by the testator to his sister-in-law, Ellen de la Rue, or her assigns during her life for her separate use.

The courts below decided in favour of the Crown.

The main facts admitted or proved were as follows: W. L. Winans was born in 1823 in the State of New Jersey, in America, where his father, Ross Winans, was then domiciled. When he was about three years old his father left New Jersey with his family and settled at Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, carrying on business as a contractor; and he became a partner with his father, and lived in his father's house until he went to Russia in 1850. He went to Russia to carry out Government contracts for the making of railways there, and resided in Russia for about twenty years, during part of the time being United States Consul at St. Petersburg.

In 1851 he married, at St. Petersburg, the daughter of a native of Guernsey, by whom he had two sons, the appellants, both born at St.
Petersburg.

In 1859 a large property at Ferry Bar, Baltimore, consisting of about 141 acres, was bought by Thomas Winans, a brother of the testator, for the Winans family, two-fifths of the purchase money being contributed by W. L. Winans.

In 1859 W. L. Winans had suffered from inflammation of the lungs, and he was advised that he would die if he remained in Russia during the winter and that he had better winter at Brighton, in England. Accordingly he came to England; and, finding that the climate of Brighton suited him, he went there for the winter on account of his health, but, except during the winter, he continued to live in Russia until the year 1870. He brought his family with him in the winter because he wished to have them with him, and also that they might avoid the climate of Russia.

In 1860 he took a furnished house, No. 2, Chichester-terrace, Brighton, for five years, terminable at the end of any year of the term; and in or about the same year he took the adjoining house, No. 1, Chichester-terrace, for twenty-one years, determinable at the fifth, seventh, or fourteenth years of the term, as he was unable to get it for a shorter period. He used these houses for the winter.

On the 4th May 1860 two-fifths of the Ferry Bar property were conveyed to the testator by Thomas Winans.

In 1865 Mr. Winans renewed his agreement for No. 2, Chichester-terrace for ten years, determinable at the end of any year.

In or about 1870 many of the contracts with the Russian Government were completed; and after that year until the year 1883 the testator lived in Russia for about two months in the summer, at Kissingen for two or three months, and in Scotland, London, and Brighton for the rest of the year.

In 1870 he took the lease of a mixed shooting in Scotland for the purposes of sport for himself, the appellants (his sons), and his friends. He afterwards took leases of deer forests in Scotland for short terms, but did not himself shoot.

In or about 1886 the appellants gave up shooting in Scotland, and in 1893 Mr. W. L. Winans terminated the leases of the greater part of his shootings in Scotland, and in 1896 sublet and assigned the remainder of them.

In 1875 he continued to occupy No. 2, Chichester-terrace as tenant from year to year, and did so till his death.

In 1877 Ross Winans, his father, died; and thereupon the Baltimore business, in which he had retained an interest, was wound-up. In 1877 Mr.
Winans purchased the lease of No. 15, Kensington Palace-gardens, which had an unexpired term of sixty-five years.

Before buying the lease he made special inquiries whether he could dispose of it at any time without difficulty, and ascertained that he could do so.

In 1892 he ceased to reside there, and expressed a desire to get rid of it.

(a) Lord Shand was present during the argument, but died before their Lordships gave judgment.

H. OF L.]

WINANS AND ANOTHER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[H. OF L.]

In 1881 he took a renewed lease of No. 1, Chichester-terrace for twenty-one years, determinable at the fifth, seventh, or fourteenth years.

In 1883 he ceased to visit Russia; and until 1890 he spent two or three months at Kissingen, in Germany, and the remainder of the year in Scotland, Brighton, and London.

In 1885 he bought a further two-fifths of the Ferry Bar property at Baltimore, leaving one-fifth outstanding in other members of the family.

Up to the year 1888 he suffered from consumption, but in that year this disease was arrested, although the lung mischief remained.

In 1888 he suffered from an internal affection, which recurred at intervals, and gradually broke down his health.

In 1893 Mr. Winans ceased to visit Kissingen; and from that time until his death he lived in London, Brighton, or in the country in England. He had for many years been interested in improvements in spindle-shaped or cigar-shaped ocean steamers, the object being to invent a steamer of such a shape that she would be very much steadier in going through the water than steamers of the usual shape.

Patents in connection with these vessels were first taken out in America in 1858.

Experiments were carried out by the testator in conjunction with his father and his brother, Thomas Winans; and in about the year 1877 he was left the sole active person, his father having died and his brother having retired. He had an office in London, where he had a staff of draftsmen engaged in making plans and designs of cigar ships, and in 1893 he applied in America for a prolongation of these patents.

In the affidavit made on the application for the prolongation of these patents he described himself as a citizen of the United States and a native of the city of Baltimore, and he pointed out the advantages which would accrue to the Government and people of the United States at large in peace and war from the construction of a fleet of ocean-going vessels for Transatlantic passenger traffic to sail under the flag of the United States, and he prayed that, in the interests of justice to an American citizen, Congress would not refuse to pass the Act prayed for.

Mr. Winans expressed the intention of running a line of cigar ships from England to America, building wharves on his Ferry Bar property for them to come to, and of going to America by the first cigar ship which crossed the Atlantic, building a house on the property at Ferry Bar, and living there as his home and developing the property. His state of health would have made it dangerous for him to go back in an ordinary vessel.

Mr. W. L. Winans had from time to time acquired the greater part of the shares in the property at Ferry Bar, Baltimore. He always called Baltimore his home, and in 1878 or 1880 he had plans prepared of a large house to be built for himself to live in on the property. He also had plans prepared for developing the property, and informed his solicitor that the property, if developed, would be worth 1,000,000*l.* He often expressed his intention of living there and developing it as soon as he could cross the Atlantic.

In Feb. 1897 he made his will, which was effective as a testamentary disposition both in the United States of America and in England, and he described himself as a citizen of the United States of America, residing at Nos. 1 and 2, Chichester-terrace, Brighton, in the county of Sussex.

Shortly before his death he had entered into an agreement to buy the remaining one-tenth share in the property at Ferry Bar, Baltimore, which was the only outstanding share in it. His political sympathies were always strongly American, and in many documents he described himself as a citizen of the United States or a native of Baltimore, but now sojourning in the City of London or in England, as the case might be.

Asquith, K.C., R. M. Bray, K.C., Willoughby Williams, and Kenrick appeared for the appellants.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.), and Vaughan Hawkins for the respondent.

In addition to the authorities cited in the judgments the following were also referred to in the course of the argument :

Hodgson v. De Beauchamps, 12 Moo. P. C. 285 ;

King v. Foxwell, 3 Ch. Div. 518 ;

Attorney-General v. Kent, 31 L. J. 391 Ex. ;

Hoskins v. Matthews, 8 De G. M. & G. 13.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 10.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: The short question here is whether Mr. Winans was at the time of his death domiciled in this country. So far as it is a question of law it is simple enough to state; but when the law has been stated a difficult and complex question of fact arises, which it is almost always very hard to solve. Now, the law is plain that where a domicile of origin is proved it lies upon the person who asserts a change of domicile to establish it, and it is necessary to prove that the person who is alleged to have changed his domicile has fixed and determined purpose to make the place of his new domicile his permanent home. Although many varieties of expression have been used, believe that the idea of domicile may be quite adequately expressed by the phrase, Was the place intended to be the permanent home? Now, Mr. Winans was an American citizen; he resided in Russia for some time; he had various residences in England and great sporting leases in Scotland. He married in St. Petersburg a Guernsey lady. He had property in the United States, and he originally came to England upon the recommendation of his medical man. He lived a very long time in England; and if I were satisfied that he intended to make England his permanent home, I do not think that it would make any difference that he had arrived at the determination to make it so by reason of the state of his health, as to which he was very solicitous. It would be enough that for obvious reasons he had determined to make England his permanent home; but was that his determination? I confess that I am not able very confidently to answer that question either way. I have been in considerable doubt when I view his whole career whether he ever intended finally to remain here. He had invented cigar-shaped boats, in which he took a deep interest as inventor, and also as one who meant to travel back to his own country when his boats succeeded. It may be that your Lordships do not think that he was likely to succeed; but it may be confidently asserted that the inventor thoroughly believed that he would succeed. It is true that great reliance might be placed upon his great acquisition of sporting areas in Scotland, but, on the other hand, they were acquired by him rather as profit-making investments than because he himself was devoted to sport; but even in this, as in some other parts of his conduct, it is difficult to say that a certain inference could be deduced from what he did. Being a man of enormous wealth, he never made a home for himself or his family such as one would have expected if he had really meant to remain permanently in England. Like all questions of fact dependent upon a variety of smaller facts, it is possible to treat this or that piece of evidence as conclusive, and different minds will attribute different degrees of importance to the same facts. I must admit that I have regarded the whole history of Mr. Winans' life differently at different stages of the argument, and the conclusion to which I have come is that I cannot say that I can come to a satisfactory conclusion either way; but then the law relieves me from the embarrassment which would otherwise condemn me to the solution of an insoluble problem, because it directs me in my present state of mind to consider upon whom is the burden of proof. Undoubtedly it is upon the Crown; and, as I have said that, I cannot bring myself to a conclusion either way whether Mr. Winans did or did not intend to change his domicile, his domicile of origin must remain, and I therefore am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: There is, I think, hardly any branch of law which has been more frequently or more fully discussed in this House in comparatively modern times than the law of domicile. Difficulties have arisen, and difficulties must arise now and then, in coming to a conclusion upon the facts of a particular case. But those difficulties, as Lord Cottenham said, are "much diminished by keeping steadily in view the principle which ought to guide the decision as to the application of the facts." Domicile of origin, or, as it is sometimes called, perhaps less accurately, domicile of birth, differs from domicile of choice mainly in this: that its character is more enduring, its hold stronger and less easily shaken off. In Munro v. Munro (1 Rob. H. of L. 492; 7 Cl. & F. 842) Lord Cottenham observed that it was one of the principles adopted not only by the laws of England, but generally by the laws of other countries, "that the domicile of origin must prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicile and acquiring another as his sole domicile. . . . Residence alone," he adds, "has no effect per se, though, it may be most important as a ground from which to infer intention." "The law," said Lord Cairns, L.C., in Bell v. Kennedy (L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 307), "is beyond all doubt clear with regard to the domicile of birth that the personal status indicated by that term clings and adheres to the subject of it until an actual change is made by which the personal status of another domicile is acquired." The onus of proving that a domicile has been chosen in substitution for the domicile of origin lies upon those who assert that the domicile of origin has been lost. "Residence and domicile," as Lord Westbury points out, "are two perfectly distinct things. . . . Although residence may be some small prima facie proof of domicile, it is by no means to be inferred from the fact of residence that domicile results, even although you do not find that the party had any other residence in existence or in contemplation." Lord Chelmsford's opinion was that "in a competition between a domicile of origin and an alleged subsequently-acquired domicile there may be circumstances to show that, however long a residence may have continued, no intention of acquiring a domicile may have existed at any one moment during the whole of the continuance of such residence. The question in such a case is not whether there is evidence of an intention to retain the domicile of origin, but whether it is proved that there was an intention to acquire another domicile." Such an intention, I think, is not to be inferred from an attitude of indifference or a disinclination to move increasing with increasing years, least of all from the absence of any manifestation of intention one way or the other. It must be, to quote Lord Westbury again, a "fixed and settled purpose." "And," says his Lordship, "unless you are able to show that with perfect clearness and satisfaction to yourselves, it follows that a domicile of origin continues." So heavy is the burden cast upon those who seek to show that the domicile of origin has been superseded by a domicile of choice. And rightly, I think. A change of domicile is a serious matter—serious enough when the competition is between two domiciles both within the ambit of one and the same kingdom or country, more serious still when one of the two is altogether foreign. The change may involve far-reaching consequences in regard to succession and distribution and other things which depend on domicile. To the same effect was the inquiry which Lord Cairns proposed for the consideration of the House in Bell v. Kennedy. It was this—whether the person whose domicile was in question had "determined" to make, and had in fact made, the alleged domicile of choice "his home with the intention of establishing himself and his family there and ending his days in that country." In a later case (Douglas v. Douglas, 25 L. T. Rep. 530; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 617) which came before Wickens, V.C., who was an excellent lawyer, and, owing to the official position which he long held, peculiarly conversant with cases of this sort, all the authorities were reviewed. The competition there was between a Scotch domicile of origin and an alleged English domicile of choice. The learned Vice-Chancellor thought the case "a peculiar and difficult one." He put the question in this way: "What . . . has to be here considered," he said, "is whether the testator . . . ever actually declared a final and deliberate intention of settling in England or whether his conduct and declarations lead to the belief that he would have declared such an intention if the necessity of making the election between the countries had arisen." If the authorities which

WINANS AND ANOTHER v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

[H. OF L.]

I have cited are still law, the question which your Lordships have to consider must, I think, be this—Has it been proved “with perfect clearness and satisfaction to yourselves” that Mr. Winans had at the time of his death formed a “fixed and settled purpose”—a “determination,” “a final and deliberate intention”—to abandon his American domicile and settle in England? Considering the amount of Mr. Winans’ fortune, which was between two and three millions in marketable securities, and the length of his residence in this country, it is somewhat singular that the evidence offered on the question before your Lordships should be so meagre. There is not a single letter written by or to him, or a memorandum or note of any sort made by him, which bears directly on the point. There is nothing but long-continued residence in England on the one hand and some oral declarations and some words in some legal documents on the other. There is nothing else except such inference as may be drawn from a consideration of Mr. Winans’ character and disposition, the life he led here, and the objects which he seems to have had most at heart. The principal events in Mr. Winans’ life may be stated briefly. He was born in the United States in 1823. He lived there till 1850, residing at Baltimore with his father, a railway contractor, and employed in his father’s business. Mr. Winans’ eldest son, Walter, who was examined in this case, says that when he spoke of Baltimore he always called it “home.” In 1850 Mr. Winans went to Russia. He was employed by the Russian Government, as his father had been, in equipping railways there on the American system. During the Crimean War he rendered assistance to the Russian Government in the construction and equipment of gunboats to be used against the enemy—England and England’s ally. In Russia he married a Guernsey lady, the daughter of a gentleman also employed by the Russian Government. He had two sons by her. In 1859 his health broke down. There were symptoms of consumption, and he was warned by his doctor that another winter in Russia would probably be fatal. He was advised to winter in Brighton in England. Very reluctantly, under medical orders, he left St. Petersburg and spent the winter in an hotel at Brighton, returning to Russia when the winter was over. In 1860 he took a furnished house in Brighton, No. 2, Chichester-terrace, for a term of five years, determinable at the end of any year. He also took the next house, No. 1, for a term of twenty-one years, determinable at the fifth, seventh, or fourteenth year. He connected the two houses structurally. He held both these houses at the time of his death—the furnished house, No. 2, as tenant from year to year, and No. 1 on a tenancy similar to that on which it was originally taken. From 1860 down to 1870 or 1871 he used to spend the winter at Brighton and about eight months of the year in Russia. In 1870 he gave up his house in St. Petersburg, and took a lease of some shooting in Scotland, apparently for the sake of his sons, for he shot very little himself. From 1871 to 1883 he spent about two months in Russia, two or three months in Kissingen, in Germany, and the rest of the year in Brighton, Scotland, or London. In 1883 he ceased to visit Russia, thenceforward dividing his time between Kissingen, Brighton, London, and Scotland. This mode of life continued until 1893. After that date he spent the whole year in England—in London, Brighton, and the country. He never bought an estate in England for himself or for either of his sons. As far as he was concerned “he preferred living in furnished houses or hotels,” so his son says. Two events in his life referred to in the argument have, I think, no bearing on the question before your Lordships. In 1877, to please his wife, he bought the Crown lease of a house in Palace-gardens. But he never lived there until after 1892. It was shut up, and he tried to dispose of it. When he bought the lease he seems to have made particular inquiries in order to ascertain whether there was anything in the conditions of the lease which might prevent his parting with it at any time he pleased. He never liked to “hamper” himself. Any prudent person would probably have done the same. Then there was his unfortunate experiment in the management and improvement of deer forests in Scotland. He took vast tracts of forest, not, perhaps, altogether for sporting purposes, as sport is understood in this country. After a time he inclosed the ground with miles of fencing to prevent the deer from straying. He had a notion that the value of the forest for letting purposes would be much increased by stopping shooting for some years and allowing the stage a longer term of undisturbed life. However, he got into trouble with the crofters and with his lessors, and he became rather unpopular, both with those by whom deer-stalking is highly esteemed and those to whom deer forests are an abomination. He thought, too, that he had rather wasted money on the shootings—so he gave up his experiment, and he seems to have got rid of all the Scotch shootings before his death. In the dearth of evidence by written or oral declaration as to Mr. Winans’ intentions, it seems to me to be important to consider what manner of man he was, what were the main objects of his existence and what sort of life he lived in this country. I think that there is a good deal of force in some observations that were made both by Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale in the case of Whicker v. Hume (7 H. L. C. 124) to the effect that in these days, when the tendency of the educated and leisured classes is to become cosmopolitan—if I may use the word—you must look very narrowly into the nature of a residence suggested as a domicile of choice before you deprive a man of his native domicile. Mr. Winans was a person of considerable ability and of singular tenacity of purpose, self-centred and strangely uncommunicative. He was not interested in many things, but whatever he did he did, as his son says, thoroughly. He became completely absorbed in a scheme when he took it up. At the same time he lived a very retired—almost a secluded—life. He took no part in general or municipal politics. He rarely went into society. He had no intimate friends, if, indeed, he had any friends at all, in this country. There is no evidence that he was interested in any charity or charitable or philanthropic institution in England. Although he was on affectionate terms with his two sons he never let them into his secrets. “He always worked his business himself,” his son says, “and never brought us into the business affairs in any way.” And although at odd times he mentioned his property in America, he never allowed even his eldest son “to understand much about it." Mr. Winans had three objects in life. His first object was his health. He nursed and tended it with wonderful devotion. He took his temperature several times a day. He had regular times for taking his temperature and regular times for taking his various waters and medicines. Besides the care of his health there were two other objects which engrossed his thoughts. The first was the construction of spindle-shaped vessels commonly called cigar ships. This form of vessel was, as Mr. Winans asserted, an invention of the Winans family. Many patents were taken out for it both in England and in America. It was asserted that vessels of this type would be able to cross the Atlantic without pitching or rolling. In an application to Congress in the year 1892 Mr. Winans represented himself as attached heart and soul to his country and asked for protection for a long term of years in consideration of the great expenditure which he and his family had incurred in perfecting the invention, and the vast benefits that would result from it to the people of the United States. Mr. Winans declared his confident expectation that a fleet of spindle-shaped vessels subsidised by Congress would restore to America the carrying trade which had fallen into the hands of England and other foreign nations, secure to America the command of the sea, and make it impossible for Great Britain to maintain war against the United States. Such a fleet as he described in his application could, he said, "meet war vessels in open sea near the European side and destroy one vessel after another, so that none of them would be able to reach our shores." In the development of his invention Mr. Winans stated that he had incurred an expense equal to nearly 4,000,000 dollars. Mr. Winans's confidence in this project remained unshaken to the end of his life, and he kept an office in Beaufort-gardens where a staff of engineers and draftsmen were engaged in working out the problem. There was another scheme which Mr. Winans hoped to develop and work in connection with his fleet of spindle-shaped vessels. In 1859 a property in Baltimore, about 200 acres in extent, called Ferry Bar, was purchased on behalf of the Winans family originally for the purpose of being used, as Mr. Winans states in a letter of the 31st Jan. 1882, "for the service of the sea-going steamers of the spindle-shaped form." The scheme was that the water frontage should be used for wharves and docks, while a portion of the property should be laid out for the building of first-class houses as a sort of Belgravia. There Mr. Winans intended to build a big house for himself and control the undertaking, which would make the property, he thought, when developed, worth one million sterling. Nothing practical came of this scheme because the family could not agree among themselves as to how the property was to be developed. So Mr. Winans determined to wait until he could get the whole into his own hands. Then he would develop the property himself in his own way and according to his own ideas. He did not succeed in acquiring the entire interest until just before his death. At the date of his death, his son says, "he was working night and day on it." I find that in the conveyances of the last portion of the Ferry Bar property, which were prepared just before his death, and are dated the 16th June 1897, Mr.

Winans is described as "of city of Baltimore, but now sojourning in the City of London, England." Of course, to us these schemes of Mr. Winans' appear wild, visionary, and chimerical. But I have no doubt that to a man like Mr. Winans, wholly wrapt up in himself, they were very real. They were the dream of his life. For forty years he kept them steadily in view. And one was anti-English and the other wholly American. It was in connection with these schemes that the latest and clearest declaration of intention was made by Mr. Winans. Mr. H. Montague Williams, who was his solicitor at Brighton, says that about two years before his death, a time which in cross-examination he fixed in the winter of 1895 or beginning of 1896, Mr. Winans entered into rather a lengthy disquisition about the Ferry Bar property. Mr. Winans told him that he was making arrangements for buying the remaining shares in it—that a good deal of it belonged to him, and that he intended when he had done that to go out to America and live in Baltimore and develop the estate there himself. Mr. Williams says he remembers Mr. Winans particularly saying, "If I do that it will be worth a million pounds," and he adds "the decided way in which he said 'I shall go out to Baltimore' (or words to that effect) struck me at the time." The only other circumstance to be mentioned is that in his will, dated the 4th Feb. 1897, Mr. Winans describes himself as a "citizen of the United States of America." It was argued on behalf of the Crown that although Mr. Winans may have been prevented by the state of his health from returning to America when he left Russia, and although he could not have safely attempted the voyage in the latter years of his life, yet there was a time in which he might have ventured to cross the Atlantic in an ordinary liner. The obvious answer is that at that time, when divided counsels and family disagreements prevented the development of the Ferry Bar property, he had no object in going to Baltimore. Then it was said that the length of time during which Mr. Winans resided in this country leads to the inference that he must have become content to make this country his home. Length of time, is, of course, a very important element in questions of domicile. An unconscious change may come over a man's mind. If the man goes about and mixes in society that is not an improbable result. But in the case of a person like Mr. Winans, who kept himself to himself and had little or no intercourse with his fellow men, it seems to me that at the end of any space of time, however long, his mind would probably be in the state in which it was at the beginning. When he came to this country he was a sojourner and a stranger, and he was, I think, a sojourner and a stranger in it when he died. On the whole, I am unable to come to the conclusion that Mr. Winans ever formed a fixed and settled purpose of abandoning his American domicile and settling finally in England. I think that up to the very last he had an expectation or hope of returning to America and seeing his grand schemes inaugurated. To take the test proposed by Wickens, V.C., "if the question had arisen in a form requiring a deliberate or solemn determination," I have no doubt that Mr. Winans, who was, as his son says, "entirely American in all his ideas and sympathies," would have answered it in favour of America. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Crown has not discharged the onus cast upon it, and I think that the order appealed from ought to be reversed.

LORD LINDLEY (after going through the facts as set out above, his Lordship continued as follows:—My Lords: I take it to be clearly settled, by the Lauderdale Peerage case (10 App. Cas. 692), Udny v. Udny (L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 441), and Bell v. Kennedy (Ib. 307) that the burden of proof in all inquiries of this nature lies upon those who assert that a domicile of origin has been lost, and that some other domicile has been acquired. Further, I take it to be clearly settled that no person who is sui juris can change his domicile without a physical change of place coupled with an intention to adopt the place to which he goes as his home or fixed abode or permanent residence, whichever expression may be preferred. If a change of residence is proved, the intention necessary to establish a change of domicile is an intention to adopt the second residence as home, or, in other words, an intention to remain without any intention of further change except possibly for some temporary purpose: (see Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 43, and Re Craignish, 67 L. T. Rep. 689; (1892) 3 Ch. 180; Attorney-General v. Pottinger, 4 L. T. Rep. 368; 6 H. & N. 733; and Douglas v. Douglas (25 L. T. Rep. 530; L. Rep. 12 Eq. 617). The change of residence here is plain enough, and need not be enlarged upon. The difficulty is about the intention of Mr. Winans with reference to the change. The exact time when he made up his mind to settle here cannot be ascertained. There is no document or conversation which enables any one to fix the date. But it by no means follows that when he died it cannot be inferred that he must have abandoned all thoughts of going back to America and settling there, and have gradually become content to make his home in this country without contemplating any further change. If this can be established, a change of domicile will be the legal result: (Haldane v. Eckford, 21 L. T. Rep. 87; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 631; Douglas v. Douglas, ubi sup.). An intention to change nationality, to cease to be an American and to become an Englishman, was said to be necessary in Moorhouse v. Lord (8 L. T. Rep. 212; 10 H. L. C. 272); but that view was decided to be incorrect in Udny v. Udny (L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 441). Intention may be inferred from conduct, and there are cases in which domicile has been changed, notwithstanding a clear statement that no change of domicile was intended: (see Re Steer, 3 H. & N. 594; and per Wickens, V.C. in Douglas v. Douglas, ubi sup.). An expressed intention to return for a temporary purpose, or in some possible event which never happens, will not prevail over a clear inference from other circumstances of an intention to remain: (see Attorney-General v. Pottinger, ubi sup., per Bramwell, B.; Doucet v. Geoghegan, 9 Ch. Div. 441). I do not propose to refer at length to the details of Mr. Winans' life. They were elaborately brought to your Lordships' attention by counsel. There is no real controversy about the facts. The question is what inference ought to be drawn from them. Here I have the misfortune to differ from my noble and learned friends who have just addressed the House. I have arrived at the same conclusion as that arrived at by Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ. and by the Court of Appeal. I cannot myself draw any other inference. Where was his home, his settled permanent home? He had one and only one, and that one was in this country; and long before he died I am satisfied that he had given up all serious idea of returning to his native country. He was an American citizen permanently settled in this country. But although so settled he was proud of his nationality and had no intention of changing it. He may at one time have looked back on Baltimore as his possible ultimate home, but he had ceased to do so long before he died. In 1880 he proposed to build a house for himself in Baltimore, but this came to nothing; and none of his later schemes for developing his property there were carried out in his lifetime, nor did they involve any change of residence on his part. A dim hope and expectation of being at some time able to return to America when he had succeeded in constructing a ship to his liking, which he never did, is spoken to by his son; but when last does not appear. I can find nothing to displace the only inference which I can draw from Mr. Winans' conduct for the last twenty or twenty-five years of his life. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Order appealed from reversed. Respondent to pay to the appellants their costs here and in the courts below.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LORD MONTAGU. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Revenue—Estate duty—Mortgage by tenant for life and remainderman—Indemnity to tenant for life—Property passing on death of tenant for life—Finance Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 2, 7.

The tenant for life of settled lands joined with the remainderman in creating a mortgage on the lands.

The loan secured by the mortgage was entirely for the benefit of the remainderman, and the tenant for life did not covenant to pay either the mortgage debt or the interest on it.

By an indenture of even date with the mortgage, and made between the remainderman and the tenant for life, the former covenanted to indemnify the latter against any loss of profits of the settled lands, and against any expenses or charges in respect of the mortgage, and assigned certain securities and charges on other lands as security for the performance of such covenants. The tenant for life was in fact kept wholly indemnified during her life.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that on the death of the tenant for life the estate duty should be assessed upon the whole value of the settled lands, and not upon the value after deducting the amount of the mortgage debt.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LORD MONTAGU.

[H. OF L.]

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.), reported 88 L. T. Rep. 120; (1903) 1 K. B. 483, who had reversed a judgment of Phillimore, J., reported 86 L. T. Rep. 57; (1902) 1 K. B. 429, by which it was declared that on the death of Charlotte Anne Dowager Duchess of Buccleuch (which happened on the 28th March 1895) estate duty became payable under the provisions of the Finance Act 1894 upon the principal value of the Ditton estate devised by the will of Walter Francis, Duke of Buccleuch, without deduction of a certain mortgage debt of 27,000*l.*

By the will, dated the 8th Aug. 1883, of the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry (who died on the 16th April 1884) the testator's Ditton estate in the counties of Bucks and Middlesex was settled to the use of the testator's wife for life without impeachment of waste (as a residence for her and in addition to all other provisions), and from and after her decease to the use of the testator's second son, the respondent, then Lord Henry John Montagu Douglas Scott, for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail male, with divers remainders over.

By an indenture dated the 28th May 1888 the Ditton estate was disentailed, with the consent of the duchess as protector of the settlement, and a joint power of appointment over it given to Lord Montagu and his eldest son, John Walter Edward Douglas Scott Montagu.

By an indenture dated the 29th May 1888 and made between the duchess dowager of the first part, the respondent Lord Montagu of the second part, the said J. W. E. Douglas Scott Montagu of the third part, and Gerald Henry Brabazon Ponsonby, John Poyntz, Earl Spencer, and Frederick William John, Marquis of Bristol (thereinafter called the mortgagees), of the fourth part, Lord Montagu and his son, in consideration of 27,000*l.* lent to them by the mortgagees, jointly and severally covenanted with the mortgagees to pay to them on the 29th Nov. then next the sum of 27,000*l.* with interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum; and the duchess dowager, as tenant for life in possession under the will of the late duke, granted, and the respondent Lord Montagu and the said J. W. E. Douglas Scott Montagu, in exercise of the joint power of appointment given to them over the fee simple in remainder expectant on the decease of the duchess dowager by the indenture of the 28th May 1888 appointed, the Ditton estate to the use of the mortgagees in fee simple, subject to a proviso for redemption by the respondent Lord Montagu and his son, on payment of the moneys due thereunder, and Lord Montagu and his son covenanted for the keeping in repair and due insurance of buildings during the continuance of the security.

By another indenture, also dated the 29th May 1888, and made between Lord Montagu of the first part, J. W. E. Douglas Scott Montagu of the second part, the duchess dowager of the third part, and William Henry Walter, Duke of Buccleuch, and Charles Alexander, Earl of Home (trustees), of the fourth part, an estate called the Clitheroe estate, in the county of Lancaster, was charged with a yearly rentcharge of 1500*l.* in favour of the duchess dowager to keep down the interest on the mortgage debt of 27,000*l.*, or on so much thereof as should from time to time be owing on the mortgage, to the intent that the life interest of the duchess dowager in the Ditton estate might be wholly exonerated therefrom.

The mortgage for 27,000*l.* was created wholly for the benefit of the respondent Lord Montagu and his son, and the dowager duchess, who joined in the mortgage only as a surety, was, and the Ditton estate during her life was, exonerated and kept wholly indemnified by them against the mortgage and all claims in respect thereof.

The interest on the mortgage debt was throughout paid by the respondent Lord Montagu.

The dowager duchess died on the 28th March 1895.

The Crown claimed duty on the whole value of the Ditton estate free from the mortgage debt, but the respondent contended that duty could only be claimed on the equity of redemption after deduction of the moneys due on the mortgage.

Phillimore, J. decided in favour of the Crown, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.), and Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the appellant, and argued that in estimating the duty payable the mortgage should not be deducted from the value of the estate, for, as between the tenant for life and the remainderman the estate must be considered as unincumbered as she enjoyed the whole of the life estate in consequence of the indemnity. The court below decided the case of the authority of Lord Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (80 L. T. Rep. 361; (1899) A. C. 198), but they misapprehended the effect of that decision. There is a distinction between a sale of a portion of the property and the creation of a charge. This is a cesser of interest within sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b) of the Act, and the value is to be ascertained under sect. 7, sub-sect. 7 (b). The point did not arise in Lord Cowley's case. If the tenant for life had parted with her life interest the purchaser would have been entitled to the benefit of the indemnity.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Austen-Cartmell, for the respondent, contended that nothing passed on the death of the tenant for life but the equity of redemption. The object of the indemnity was to provide against the case of the mortgagees enforcing their security by foreclosure. The tenant for life was mortgagor in possession, and the remainderman got nothing but the property subject to the mortgage.

The Attorney-General in reply.—This arrangement for an indemnity was not intended as compensation for the loss of any part of the life interest, but to prevent it from being in any way affected.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case, with the greatest respect for the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, I think that they have allowed validity to be given to what is mere form and not substance, and with that I cannot concur. If one looks at the whole arrangement, it seems to me that the substance of the matter was this; not that there should be a mere contractual relation between the remainderman and the lady who was entitled to this proerty, but that the property should remain hers as between those two persons, and that she should never have one farthing less than she was entitled to, being secured by the property to which she was entitled, and all the analogies which Mr. Danckwerts has endeavoured to put before your Lordships seem to me to beside the question. It may be that the same deed may have a legal operation as between one set of persons, and yet, as between other parties to it, the real substance of the transaction may be such that it cannot be treated as if it had its full legal operation. That, I think, is the case here. As between the duchess and Lord Montagu there never was the relation which is insisted upon by Mr. Danckwerts. It seems to me that Lord Montagu, wanting to borrow money, gets the security of this lady's estate which enabled him to borrow the money; but the parties to the instrument which they executed point out very distinctly that the effect of it, as between those two persons, is to be that the duchess is to be entitled for the rest of her life to retain and keep that which she then had—namely, a right to the property and to the results of the property. And she did so; she paid nothing in the way of interest on the mortgage, and she received the rents and profits. As between those two persons, looking at that instrument, I think that it effected nothing, although it afforded security to the persons who lent the money. But the notion that there was no liability to estate duty when that transaction came to an end, and when the whole of what she had goes to Lord Montagu, seems to me to be a very forced construction of these legal instruments, which were effective for the object which they were designed to effect, but were never intended to pass the estate itself out of the dowager duchess. Under those circumstances, with great respect for the Court of Appeal, I am of opinion that the true question was that which was put by Phillimore, J. He said that what she gave up, what she relinquished by her death, was the thing that she enjoyed during her lifetime. That being so, it seems to me that the Crown is perfectly right in the contention which has been set up. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment be reversed.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I adhere to everything which I am reported to have said in the case of Lord Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (ubi sup.), and in particular to the passage from my judgment on which the Court of Appeal founded the decision which they have given. If this were a simple case of mortgage by a tenant for life and a remainderman, or by successive tenants for life and the ultimate remaindermen, I think that the property would be taken out of the settlement as from the date of the mortgage, and, on the death of the first tenant for life, the estate duty could only be claimed on the equity of redemption. But there appear to be circumstances in the present case which take it out of that rule. I am not prepared to say, and it is not necessary to express an opinion, whether, if there had been a mere indemnity, such, indeed, as the law would imply from the fact of the mortgage being for the benefit of the remainderman, if there were a mere personal covenant of indemnity to the duchess (to take this concrete case), by Lord Montagu and his son, I am not prepared to say whether that would be sufficient or not; I do not say that it would not be, and I do not say that it would be. But in this case it appears to me that we have far more than that. We have what in my opinion amounts to an express contract by Lord Montagu and Mr. Montagu with the duchess that under no circumstances, although she had at their request joined in the mortgage in order to effect a mortgage of the fee, should she be called upon to pay anything out of the income of her Ditton property; and provision was made that, in case any such claim were made upon her, she might have recourse to another fund. Another fund was provided out of which the interest should be obtained. The arrangement between the parties was, in fact and in truth, that the duchess should continue to enjoy the whole income of the Ditton estate discharged, as between them, from any liability by reason of her having joined in the mortgage. What, then, was the property which passed on the death of the duchess? First, I will take it under sect. 1. It is admitted that the equity of redemption at any rate passed—that is to say, the property subject to the mortgage. But did the residue of the property pass on the death of the duchess? Now, if the true transaction between the parties was that as between themselves the mortgage should not effectually attach to the estate until the death of the duchess, then I think it may fairly be said that the whole property passed under sect. 1. But supposing that not to be so, and I quite admit that there is a little technical difficulty about it, I am quite satisfied that the property passed under the combined operation of sect. 1 and sect. 2. As regards sect. 1, the equity of redemption—that is, the property subject to the incumbrance—passed undoubtedly under sect. 1; but as regards sect. 2 it appears to me that so much of the income of the Ditton estate as represented or was equal to the interest on the mortgage comes exactly within sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b). If I am right in the view which I have expressed as to the effect of the arrangement between the parties, the duchess had a beneficial interest, notwithstanding the mortgage, in the whole of the income, including the 1080*l.* a year, which was equivalent to the interest on the mortgage. She had, as between her and Lord Montagu, an undoubted beneficial interest to receive and to retain, without incumbrance or charge upon it, that portion of the income. Sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b), is this: "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." Now, I think that the portion of the rents which was equal to 1080*l.* a year was property in which the duchess had an undoubted beneficial interest ceasing on her death. Then the sub-section says that the property is to be deemed to pass, to what extent? "to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." Lord Montagu thereupon acquired the benefit of receiving that sum of 1080*l.* a year for the purpose of discharging his mortgage interest. He was under liability for the interest on the mortgage during the duchess's lifetime but he had no fund out of which to pay it. He now receives a fund out of which he will be enabled to discharge the interest of the mortgage. In my opinion that is "a benefit which accrues or arises" to him. The property represented by that 1080*l.* a year, if it did not pass under sect. 1, is to be deemed to pass under sect. 2. To complete the case I may as well point out that to determine the value which is to be deemed to pass sect. 7, sub-sect. 7 (b), provides that "if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property," the value of the benefit accruing shall be "the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." So that quacunque via I am of opinion that, whatever technical difficulties there may be, and whatever was the form of the conveyance which the parties employed for the purpose of carrying out the transaction, the Crown is entitled to say that the whole value of the Ditton estate either passed under sect. 1, or should be deemed to have passed under sect. 2. I confess that if there were any difficulty in this view, which I do not think there is, I should have thought it quite open to your Lordships to say that if the 1080*l.* a year is to be a charge upon the Clitheroe annuity, then the case is as broad as it is long, because if Lord Montagu is relieved from the payment of estate duty on the ground that the estate, to the extent of the mortgage, did not pass by the duchess's death, he would still remain liable to pay an equivalent amount of duty in respect of the cesser of the annuity created out of the Clitheroe money for the duchess's indemnity. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should succeed, and that the judgment below should be reversed.

STEEL, YOUNG, & CO. v. GRAND CANARY COALING COMPANY.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: I concur in the result which has been arrived at by my noble and learned friends. No doubt there was in form a mortgage—a mortgage that was good as between the mortgagor and mortgagee—and I accept the submission of the respondent's counsel that beside that mortgage there was only a contractual obligation; but I differ from his submission that this contractual obligation cannot affect the estate passing on the death of the tenant for life. It seems to me that the contractual obligation did affect the estate, because it relieved the tenant for life from bearing any of the burden of the mortgage. The result is that in substance there was, as between the tenant for life and the remainderman, no mortgage, and that by the death of the Dowager Duchess of Buccleuch, the tenant for life, Lord Montagu, obtained the estate without the mortgage affecting him, or at all events obtained the benefit of it to a greater degree than during her life. He had then to bear the burden of the mortgage. By the death of the tenant for life he has become seised of the estate, and receives the benefit of it which he did not receive before. Therefore I concur in thinking that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

STEEL, YOUNG, AND CO. v. GRAND CANARY COALING COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Charter-party—Construction—Time for loading—Stoppage by strike—"Stoppage for six days from time of vessel being ready to coal"—Right to cancel charter.

By a charter-party it was agreed that a ship of the appellants should load a cargo of coal for the charterers "to be loaded in 140 running hours, commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds, and ready to load." The charter-party also provided that in the event of a stoppage caused by a strike "continuing for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage."

Due notice was given that the ship was ready to load, and, after the expiration of the time allowed for loading, a stoppage caused by a strike commenced, and continued for six days. No cargo had been shipped, and the charterers gave notice that the charter-party was cancelled. Held, that the charter-party contemplated a stoppage in existence at the beginning of the loading time, and that the charterers were not entitled to cancel the charter on the occurrence of a stoppage at a later period.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Mathew and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), reported 87 L. T. Rep. 321; 7 Com. Cas. 213, who had reversed a judgment of Phillimore, J., reported 6 Com. Cas. 240, in favour of the appellants, the plaintiffs below.

The action was brought by the appellants, as owners of the steamship Nith, against the respondents for breach of a charter-party. The facts of the case and the material clauses of the charter-party appear from the headnote above, and from the judgments of their Lordships.

The ship was ready to load on the 8th Aug. 1900, and due notice was given to the respondents. The loading time expired on the 15th Aug., but no cargo had been loaded.

On the 20th Aug. a colliery strike caused a stoppage of the coal intended for the ship, and this stoppage continued for more than six days.

On the 28th Aug. the respondents gave notice that the charter was cancelled.

The ship could not obtain another charter till the 3rd Sept., and then at a lower rate of freight. The plaintiffs claimed damages for the delay from the 8th Aug. to the 3rd Sept. and also for the difference in freight. The defendants paid into court a sum for demurrage at the rate fixed by the charter-party from the 8th Aug. to the 26th Aug.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 17.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case the whole question seems to turn upon a very narrow point—namely, the true construction of the charter-party. I have tried to see whether the language literally construed according to the ordinary plain meaning of words and sentences is susceptible of any other meaning than that which the plaintiffs attribute to it. I am unable to come to the conclusion that it is. Although I am not insensible to some of the inconvenience which may result from a literal interpretation of the words, I cannot say that any alternative interpretation that I can suggest is fit for your Lordship's adoption. No other construction can be placed upon the words than that contended for by the plaintiffs; to my mind they are not susceptible of any other meaning. The parties have placed their own interpretation upon them, and it appears to me impossible to contend under those circumstances that there is any other construction to be given to the charter-party than that for which the plaintiffs contend. If that is the true view of the charter-party, the facts raise no question which can be debated, when once you give that interpretation to the charter-party. I can give no other construction to it than the literal meaning which the words convey, and, therefore, I move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed.

Lord MACNAUGHTEN.—My Lords: The question in this case depends on the true construction of one clause in a charter-party, under which a screw steamer called the Nith was engaged to carry a cargo of coal from Newport in Monmouthshire to Santa Cruz or Las Palmas. The charter makes provision for the avoidance of the contract in the event of a stoppage occasioned by a strike or any cause beyond the control of the charterers continuing for six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, subject, however, to this proviso—that no cargo had been shipped on board. The point to be decided is whether the stoppage to be effective for the purpose of avoiding the contract must be in existence at the beginning of the loading time or whether it may commence at any time within a reasonable limit after notice given of the vessel being ready to load. The former construction was adopted by Phillimore, J. The Court of Appeal has taken the other view. The clause in question, so far as material, is in the following words: "3. The cargo to be loaded in 140 running hours . . . commencing when written notice is given of steamer being completely discharged of inward cargo and ballast in all her holds and ready to load. . . . Any time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs . . . or by reason of . . . any cause beyond the control of the charterers not to be computed as part of the loading time unless any cargo be actually loaded during such time." I pause for a moment to point out that here the charter itself contemplates the possibility of cargo being loaded during a stoppage—a thing which might very well occur, even though it were intended that the cargo should consist of nothing but coal. The clause proceeds as follows: "In the event of any stoppage or stoppages arising from any of these causes continuing for six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall become null and void, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the steamer previous to such stoppage or stoppages." Of course, if a charter were to be annulled after cargo had been shipped on board difficulties must arise, and it would be by no means easy to provide for the rights of the parties. It is, therefore, only reasonable and, indeed, necessary, that any provision annulling a charter should not apply when once cargo is shipped. It can make no difference whether cargo actually on board has been shipped before the commencement of the stoppage or during the stoppage. The expression "such stoppage" must mean a stoppage continued for the full period of six running days. These considerations seem to make it plain that the words "previous to such stoppage or stoppages" mean previous to the completion, not previous to the commencement, of the period which may give occasion for the avoidance of the charter. It cannot, I think, be disputed that if the language of clause 3 is to be taken in its natural and ordinary signification a stoppage to be effective must be one reckoned from the commencement of the loading time. On any other view the words "from the time of the vessel being ready to load" would be wholly idle and superfluous. So much out of place would they be that I cannot imagine any draftsman, however careless, inserting them or allowing them if inserted to remain uncanceled. The argument on the other side is that the literal construction is to be rejected and a less accurate meaning given to the word "from," because the proviso at the end of the clause shows as it is contended, that the parties must have contemplated that there would occur between the commencement of the loading time and the six days' stoppage an interval of time during which cargo might or might not be put on board. It seems to me, however, that there is not much force in this argument, if you bear in mind that the parties contemplated the possibility of cargo being put on board during a stoppage. And the force of the argument is, I think, altogether destroyed when you find that by a note in the margin of the charter, which seems to be part of the printed form—for it also occurs in the substituted charter of the 3rd Sept.—the charterers are at liberty to put on board twenty tons of general cargo. The loading of general cargo would not necessarily, or even probably, be prevented by a strike, lock-out, or accident which might interfere with loading coal. It appears to me, therefore, that, even without resorting to a suggestion which is rejected by the Court of Appeal as a vain imagination of counsel, ingenious, but wholly unfounded, there is nothing to justify a departure from the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed to define the commencement of a stoppage which may operate to put an end to the contract. The result is not unreasonable. There are two provisions relating to stoppages occasioned by a cause beyond the control of the charterers—a general provision and a special provision. In all cases of stoppages, partial or otherwise, the charterer may exclude from the loading time the time during which no loading takes place. In the special case of the charterer being met by a stoppage in existence at the commencement of the loading time, which is just as likely to happen as the occurrence of a stoppage afterwards during the loading time, the contract may be annulled. Looking at the matter from a charterer's point of view, that, I think, is all that can be required. From a shipowner's point of view the other construction would seem, occasionally at any rate, to offer a premium on dilatory tactics. As regards the measure of damages, it seems to me that Phillimore, J. was right. There was, in my opinion, a repudiation of the contract on the one side and an acceptance of that repudiation on the other. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed with the usual consequences.

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: The expression "loading time," which occurs in this charter, means the 140 running hours within which the ship is to be loaded; and these 140 hours begin to run after written notice that the ship is ready to load. Any time lost in loading through strikes, &c., is not to be computed as part of the loading time, unless some cargo is actually loaded during such time. So far the charter-party seems clear enough. Then if any strike, &c., continues for six days "from the time of the vessel being ready to load" the charter is to become null and void, unless any cargo shall have been shipped prior to the stoppage. The expression "six days from the time of the vessel being ready to load" points to the earliest time when she is ready, and not to any time after she is ready. I quite see the inconveniences which may arise in other cases from adhering closely to the words of the clause on which the controversy between the parties turns. But I see no absurdity or injustice in construing the clause in its most obvious and natural sense in this particular case. The case is peculiar and unusual. The ship was ready to load and her time for loading had expired before there was any strike, and the strike had lasted six days before the charterer began to load, and he then insisted that the charter had become null and void. That is the case with which your Lordships have to deal. This case does fall within the clause if construed according to its most obvious meaning. I leave other cases to be dealt with when they arise. The appellants have the advantage of being able to rely on the words as they stand, and I see no sufficient reason for extending them. As regards the damages, the correspondence shows a refusal by the charterer to load on the 28th Aug., persisted in from that time onwards, and I see no reason for holding that the damages have been improperly assessed. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below, and the judgment of Phillimore, J. should be restored.

SAMUEL v. JARRAH TIMBER AND WOOD PAVING CORPORATION LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Mortgage—Debenture stock of company—Collateral agreement for purchase—Clog on equity of redemption.

The appellant agreed to make an advance to the respondent company upon the security of first mortgage debenture stock of the company with an option of purchasing the whole or any part of the stock so pledged at an agreed price at any time within twelve months. The company were desirous of paying off the loan before the expiration of the twelve months, and the respondent gave notice that he intended to exercise his option of purchasing. The company thereupon brought an action claiming a declaration that the agreement was not binding on them, and for consequential relief, and the appellant counter-claimed for specific performance or damages.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the case came within the rule that a mortgage is not allowed at the time of making the loan to enter into a contract for the purchase of the mortgaged property, and that the option of purchasing could not be enforced.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.J.J.) reported 88 L. T. Rep. 106; (1903) 2 Ch. 1 who had affirmed a judgment of Kekewich, J. reported 87 L. T. Rep. 44; (1902) 2 Ch. 479 in favour of the respondents in an action brought by them against the appellant under circumstances which appear from the headnote above, and from the judgments of their Lordships.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C. and Manning appeared for the appellants.

T. R. Warrington, K.C. and Martelli for the respondents.

In addition to the cases cited in the judgments South African Territories Limited v. Wallington (78 L. T. Rep. 426; (1898) A. C. 309) was referred to.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 16.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords: I regret that in this case the state of the authorities leaves me no alternative than to affirm the judgments of Kekewich, J. and of the Court of Appeal. A perfectly fair bargain made between two parties to it, each of whom was quite sensible of what they were doing, is not to be performed because at the same time a mortgage arrangement was made between them. If a day had intervened between the two parts of the arrangement the bargain which the appellant claims a right to have performed would have been perfectly good and capable of being enforced; but a line of authorities going back for more than a century has decided that such an arrangement as that which was here arrived at is contrary to a principle of equity, the sense or reason of which

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. OF L.] SAMUEL v. JARRAH TIMBER & WOOD PAVING CORPORATION LIM. [H. OF L.]

I am not able to appreciate, and very reluctantly I am compelled to acquiesce in the judgments appealed from.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: By letter dated the 11th June 1901 the appellant, Henry Samuel, offered to advance to the respondent company 5000*l.* at 6 per cent., upon the security of 30,000*l.* first mortgage debenture stock of the company, subject to his having "the option of purchasing the whole or any part of such stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months." Other conditions were attached to the offer, but they are not material for the purpose of the present question. Then followed this provision: "The advance to become due and payable with interest at thirty days' notice on either side." The offer was accepted by the company. The stock was duly created and registered in Mr. Samuel's name. Within the period of twelve months, and before the company gave notice of their intention to repay the advance, Mr. Samuel claimed a right to purchase the whole of the mortgaged stock at the agreed price. Thereupon the company brought this action, asking for a redemption and a declaration that the option was illegal and void. Both Kekewich, J. and the Court of Appeal decided in favour of the company. Having regard to the state of the authorities binding on the Court of Appeal if not on this House, it seems to me that they could not have come to any other conclusion, although the transaction was a fair bargain between men of business without any trace or suspicion of oppression, surprise, or circumvention. It is, I think, unnecessary to consider what the true construction of the agreement between Mr. Samuel and the company may be. The result would have been precisely the same if the agreement had in terms declared that the option was not to continue after repayment. The law undoubtedly is that a condition such as that in question, if legal and binding at all, must come to an end on repayment of the loan. In the Court of Appeal the question was treated as governed by the principle, of which Noakes v. Rice (86 L. T. Rep. 62; (1902) A. C. 24) is a recent example, that on redemption the mortgagor is entitled to have the thing mortgaged restored to him unaffected by any condition or stipulation which formed part of the mortgage transaction. That principle, I think, is perfectly sound. But in my opinion the question here depends rather upon the rule that a mortgagee is not allowed at the time of the loan to enter into a contract for the purchase of the mortgaged property. This latter rule, I think, is founded on sentiment rather than on principle. It seems to have had its origin in the desire of the Court of Chancery to protect embarrassed landowners from imposition and oppression. And it was invented, I should suppose, in order to obviate the necessity of inquiry and investigation in cases where suspicion may be probable and proof difficult. I gather from some general observations made by Lord Hardwicke in Mellor v. Lees (2 Atk. 494), that he would have been disposed to confine the rule to cases in which the court finds or suspects "a design to wrest the estate fraudulently out of the hands of the mortgagor," and to cases of "common mortgage" that is, as I understand it, mortgage of land by deed. It will be observed that in the latter case of Toomes v. Conset (3 Atk. 261), which is often referred to for a statement of the rule, his Lordship speaks only of "a deed of mortgage"—an instrument which perhaps rather lends itself to imposition; for no one, I am sure, by the light of nature ever understood an English mortgage of real estate. In Vernon v. Bethell, however (2 Eden, 113), Northampton, L.C., then Lord Henley, laid down the law broadly in the following terms: "This court, as a court of conscience, is very jealous of persons taking securities for a loan and converting such securities into purchases. And, therefore, I take it to be an established rule that a mortgagee can never provide at the time of making the loan for any event or condition on which the equity of redemption shall be discharged and the conveyance absolute. And there is great reason and justice in this rule, for necessitous men are not truly speaking free men, but to answer a present exigency will submit to any terms that the crafty may impose upon them." This doctrine, described by Lord Henley as an established rule nearly 150 years ago, has never, so far as I can discover, been departed from since or questioned in any reported case. It is, I believe, universally accepted by text writers of authority. Speaking for myself, I should not be sorry if your Lordships could see your way to modify it so as to prevent its being used as a means of evading a fair bargain come to between persons dealing at arm's length and negotiating on equal terms. The directors of a trading company in search of financial assistance are certainly in a different position from that of an impecunious landowner in the toils of a crafty moneylender. At the same time, I quite feel the difficulty of interfering with any rule that has prevailed so long, and I am not prepared to differ from the conclusion at which the Court of Appeal has arrived. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD LINDLEY.—My Lords: The letter of the 11th June 1901, written by the defendant to the plaintiff company, contained an offer of a loan of 5000*l.* to the company upon certain terms, and this offer and the terms proposed were accepted by the company by their letter in answer, dated the 14th June 1901. These two letters constituted an agreement between the parties. The main provisions are as follows—viz.: (1) That the defendant should forthwith lend the company 5000*l.* at 6 per cent., redeemable on thirty days' notice by either party; (2) that the defendant should have as security 30,000*l.* of the company's first mortgage debenture stock transferred to him; (3) that the directors of the company should elect a nominee of his on their board; (4) that the defendant should have the option of purchasing the whole or any part of such stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months; (5) that he should have a further option—viz., in the event of the company at any time raising further capital or selling its undertaking for shares or stock of another company, the defendant should have the option of underwriting the taking up of such new capital, or shares, or stocks at a commission of 10 per cent. The first question is, What is the true nature of the agreement? Is it a mortgage with an option of purchase, or is it a conditional sale? Or is it an agreement giving Samuel an option of holding the debenture stock as a mortgage or a purchase? It appears to me to be clearly a mortgage with a option of purchase. A loan of 5000*l.* on security was what the company wanted, and what Samuel agreed to let the company have on terms. They were not bargaining for anything else. As soon as the 5000*l.* was advanced and the debenture stock was placed at Samuel's disposal he was in the position of mortgagee of that stock. He had the rights of a mortgagee and the company had the rights of a mortgagor. There was that reciprocity and mutuality of remedies which distinguishes a mortgage transaction from a conditional sale, and from other transactions more or less resembling a mortgage, but not really constituting a mortgage. The transaction was, in my opinion, a mortgage plus, amongst other things, an option of purchase, which, if exercised by the mortgagee, would put an end to the mortgagor's right to redeem—i.e., would prevent him from getting back his mortgaged property. This was the view taken by Kekewich, J. and by all the members of the Court of Appeal, and I am unable myself to view the transaction differently. In Lisle v. Reeve (83 L. T. Rep. 731; (1902) 1 Ch. 53), Buckley, J. suggested some instances in which he considered that a mortgagee might validly stipulate for an option to buy the equity of redemption; but although his decision was affirmed first by the Court of Appeal (85 L. T. Rep. 464; (1902) 1 Ch. 53) and afterwards by this House (Reeve v. Lisle, 87 L. T. Rep. 308; (1902) A. C. 461), the affirmation proceeded entirely on the fact that the agreement to buy the equity of redemption was no part of the original mortgage transaction, but was entered into subsequently, and was an entirely separate transaction to which no objection could be taken. It is plain that the decision would not have been affirmed if the agreement to buy the equity of redemption had been one of the terms of the original mortgage. The Irish case Re Edward's Estate (11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367) is to the same effect. I cannot help thinking that both parties intended that the two options of purchasing the 30,000*l.* debenture stock and of underwriting further capital or debenture stock, if issued, were to be exercisable, even after payment off of the 5000*l.* But the decisions of this House in Noakes v. Rice (ubi sup.) and Bradley v. Carritt (88 L. T. Rep. 633; (1903) A. C. 253) conclusively show that, whatever might have been intended, Samuel could not have been entitled to exercise either option after repayment of his loan. But these decisions and the previous decision of Salt v. Northampton (65 L. T. Rep. 765; (1892) A. C. 1) emphatically recognise the old doctrine once a mortgage always a mortgage, which is too well settled to be open to controversy. Lord Harkwicke said in Toomes v. Consett (3 Atk. 261): "This court will not suffer in a deed of mortgage any agreement in it to prevail that the estate become an absolute purchase in the mortgagee upon any event whatsoever." But the doctrine is not confined to deeds creating legal mortgages. It applies to all mortgage transactions. The doctrine once a mortgage always a mortgage means that no contract between a mortgagor and a mortgagee made at the time of the mortgage and as part of the mortgage transaction, or, in other words, as one of the terms of the loan, can be valid if it prevents the mortgagor from getting back his property on paying off what is due on his security. Any bargain which has that effect is invalid, and is inconsistent with the transaction being a mortgage. This principle is fatal to the appellant's contention if the transaction under consideration is a mortgage transaction, as I am of opinion it clearly is. Then it was contended that, as the property mortgaged was debenture stock issued by a limited company, the case did not fall within the principle to which I have been referring. I confess my inability to follow the argument on this point. Debenture stock is usually a sum of money charged on the assets of the company issuing it. It may be redeemable or irredeemable, in which case it is not a mortgage at all. But whether redeemable or irredeemable it is capable of being made a security for money lent upon it. It can be mortgaged as well by the company which issues it as by an ordinary holder. I can discover no reason for treating a mortgage of debenture stock as something so different from other mortgages as to render the principle once a mortgage always a mortgage inapplicable to it. In my opinion the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

CHEMISCHE FABRIK VORMALS SANDOZ v.
BADISCHE ANILIN UND SODA FABRIKS. (a)
ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Practice—Service of writ out of the jurisdiction—Order XI., rr. 1, 4—Prima facie evidence of breach within jurisdiction.

Where application is made for leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction, or to discharge an order for such service, the court is not called upon to try the merits of the action, but the affidavits should show a prima facie cause of action within the jurisdiction, and disclose a substantial question which the plaintiff bona fide desires to try. Sufficient information should be given to make clear the ground on which the court is asked to proceed.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), reported 88 L. T. Rep. 490; 20 Pat. Cas. 413, who had affirmed an order of Joyce, J. refusing a motion on behalf of the appellants to discharge an order giving the respondents leave to issue a writ in the action, and to serve the appellants with notice of it out of the jurisdiction.

The respondents were the owners of letters patent in this country for an invention for "the manufacture and production of new basic dye-stuffs."

The appellants carried on business at Basle, in Switzerland, as manufacturers of various chemical substances, including, as the respondents alleged, among others, dyes made according to the patented invention of the respondents.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondents commenced the present action to restrain the appellants from infringing their letters patent, and an affidavit was filed by the solicitor for the respondents setting out the grounds on which it was alleged and believed that the appellants were infringing the letters patent.

On reading this affidavit Joyce, J. gave leave to the respondents to serve notice of the writ on the appellants outside the jurisdiction, and service was accordingly made on the appellants at their place of business in Basle.

On the 3rd Feb. 1903 the appellants caused a conditional appearance to be entered for them, but subsequently moved to set aside the writ and service.

It was from the dismissal of this motion that the present appeal was brought.

Order XI., r. 4, is in the following terms:

Every application for leave to serve such writ or notice on a defendant out of the jurisdiction shall be supported by affidavit or other evidence stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action, and showing in what place or country such defendant is or probably may be found, and whether such defendant is a British subject or not, and the grounds upon which the application is made, and no such leave shall be granted unless it shall be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order.

It was alleged by the respondents that the appellants had, by their travellers and agents, obtained orders in this country for a dye which infringed the respondents' patent.

The appellants contended that they had not done any act which constituted an infringement of the letters patent of the respondents or brought them within the jurisdiction of the court.

Asquith, K.C., Upjohn, K.C., and Colefax appeared for the appellants.

Moulton, K.C., Cripps, K.C., and J. C. Graham for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 19.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: As your Lordships, after a full discussion, have come to the conclusion that the appellants have not made out a case for disturbing the order under appeal, it seems to me that the less said about the matter the better. The learned counsel for the appellants admitted that the evidence on their side did not completely displace all the grounds upon which permission to serve the writ abroad was sought. Now, if the case be reduced to a consideration of the effect of the way in which the appellants' samples and pattern cards have been used in this country there would still remain a nice and difficult question of law, and one which it is conceded has never yet been brought forward for decision. Whether the appellants can do without the use of these samples and pattern cards—which hitherto they have used largely—whether the question is of as little importance to their trade as they represent it to be, or whether it is really of vital importance, as alleged on the other side—that is a matter which it is impossible to determine on the materials now before the House. It is at least conceivable that it may be of great importance. I think that the respondents are entitled to have this question tried, and tried in the usual manner. And on that ground, even if it stood alone, I think that they would be entitled to maintain the order of which they are in possession. Of course, the court is bound to be careful in allowing a step to be taken which will expose foreigners to the inconvenience and annoyance of litigation in this country. But, after all, the foreigners are not so much to be pitied in the present case. They have invaded this country, and it is on account of what they are alleged to have done in England that they are impleaded. Having said so much I should say no more, but that I think that the evidence adduced calls for some observation. Speaking for myself, I must say that I do not think the affidavits on either side altogether satisfactory. One cannot help being struck by the silence of the four agents who manage the appellants' business in England, on whose conduct the case will probably turn. Their silence is all the more remarkable since it appears that one of the appellants' travellers and their general manager abroad came over to London to make their affidavits. It is to be presumed that they must have had some consultation with the agents in this country. And it certainly would be more satisfactory to know what the agents themselves say about their mode of conducting the business than to have their action described second-hand by foreign witnesses. The evidence on the part of the respondents is, I think, open to still greater objection. Assuming that Mr. Johnson's affidavit was sufficient in the first instance (as I think it was), and assuming that he was a proper person to make the affidavit required by rule 4 (as I think he was) a more definite answer ought (as it seems to me) to have been given to the appellants' counter affidavits. The respondents' case, was that their letters patent had been infringed by the appellants in no fewer than six instances, and on a large scale, and that they had at last obtained definite proof of infringement, and yet they do not give the court a single instance in proof of their assertion. I think, that under the circumstances sufficient information ought to have been given to make it clear that the court was asked to proceed on sure ground. This unwillingness on the part of the respondents to show their hand has led to a great deal of unnecessary expense and delay. On the whole, however, I do not think that it would be right to interfere with the order of the Court of Appeal. It is a matter of discretion, and the court appears to have exercised its discretion with great care and consideration. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal made their order with some hesitation and reluctance, and, with some reluctance, I move your Lordships that the order appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: The jurisdiction which has been exercised by the High Court in the present case is always one of some delicacy and difficulty, and the conditions prescribed by the orders of the court do not diminish the difficulty. Rule 1 of Order XI. enumerates the cases in which the court may give leave to serve a writ out of the jurisdiction. The present case is alleged to come under the head lettered (f)

MCDONALD v. BELCHER AND OTHERS.

[PRIV. CO.]

An injunction is sought to restrain the defendants from doing some act within the jurisdiction. Rule 4 of the same order prescribes that the application is to be supported by evidence stating that in the belief of the deponent the plaintiff has a good cause of action, and no such leave is to be granted unless it be made sufficiently to appear to the court or judge that the case is a proper one for service out of the jurisdiction under this order. This does not, of course, mean that a mere statement by any deponent who is put forward to make the affidavit that he believes that there is a good cause of action is sufficient. On the other hand, the court is not, on an application for leave to serve out of the jurisdiction, or on a motion made to discharge an order for such service, called upon to try the action or express a premature opinion on its merits, and where there are conflicting statements as to material facts, any such opinion must necessarily be based on insufficient materials. But I think that the application should be supported by an affidavit stating facts which, if proved, would be a sufficient foundation for the alleged cause of action, and, as a rule, the affidavit should be by some person acquainted with the facts, or, at any rate, should specify the sources or persons from whom the deponent derives his information. A more difficult question is where it is in dispute whether the alleged or admitted facts will, as a matter of law, entitle the plaintiff to the relief which he seeks. If the court is judicially satisfied that the alleged facts, if proved, will not support the action, I think the court ought to say so, and dismiss the application or discharge the order. But where there is a substantial legal question arising on the facts disclosed by the affidavits which the plaintiff bona fide desires to try, I think that the court should, as a rule, allow the service of the writ. The words at the end of the order do not, I think, mean more than that the court is to be satisfied that the case comes within the class of cases in which service abroad may be made under the first rule of the order. In the present case, if I had been in Joyce, J.'s place, I am not sure that I should have granted the leave for service abroad on Mr. Johnson's affidavit alone, but on the affidavits filed by the present appellants I think that there was enough to justify the learned judge in refusing to discharge the order. I designedly say nothing as to either the facts or the law, lest I should be misunderstood or supposed to express a premature opinion on the merits. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—My Lords: It is impossible to lay down any general rule as to the measure of proof required by Order XI., r. 4, to justify the summoning of a person resident abroad to come within the jurisdiction and here answer to process. In my view that power ought not to be lightly exercised. To bring those who may be foreigners from far away—without knowledge of our language or procedure—without possible means of proof at hand, imposes a burden and difficulty which ought not to be lightly inflicted. But this power does exist, and the conditions under which it is to be exercised are to be found in Order XI., rr. 1 and 4, as mentioned at the Bar. I quite agree that the court to which the application is made for service abroad has not to try the question whether a suit can in the result be successfully maintained. Such a determination might involve a consideration of complicated facts, of credibility of witnesses, or of the application of legal principles. But, on the other hand, the court ought, I think, to be convinced by the proof brought before it that the applicant is in a position to present to the tribunals of the country a substantial case for their determination. I think, also, that before granting the application the court should afford the proposed defendant an opportunity of denying categorically the statements relied upon by the applicant. [His Lordship discussed the evidence, and continued as follows:] Without expressing any opinion as to what my judgment would have been if I had had to determine this case in the court of first instance, I have, after great doubt, come to the conclusion that the appellant has not sufficiently established that the discretion of that court, and of the Court of Appeal, has in either instance been so erroneously exercised as to justify your Lordships in reversing those judgments. I, therefore, concur in the view that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: The question before your Lordships is whether the decision of the Court of Appeal should stand. That decision was pronounced on different materials from those which were before Joyce, J., and I think that the decision can be supported. My view is that the net result of the affidavits on both sides is to disclose, prima facie, a question or questions to be tried about the samples and the specimen cards. This conclusion is derived from the special circumstances of the case. From the tone of the Lords Justices' judgments, I infer that there is no danger of the courts encouraging vagueness and laxity in the statements upon which they will proceed to exercise this exceptional jurisdiction against foreigners. The reserve which is appropriate enough in the early stages of a suit brought by right must be abandoned when the plaintiff is asking the court for leave to serve a foreigner. And I agree in the view indicated in the Court of Appeal that mere generalities given from second-hand knowledge ought not to be considered adequate to satisfy the court.

MCDONALD v. BELCHER AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF CANADA.

Law of Yukon Territory—Practice—Right of appeal—Judgment whether final or interlocutory—Jurisdiction—Promissory note—Yukon Territory Act 1899.

In an action upon a document alleged by the plaintiffs to be a promissory note the judge at the trial ordered that, "as to the alleged note or paper writing mentioned in par. 2 of the plaintiffs' statement of claim," the plaintiffs' action be dismissed.

Held, that this was a final judgment that the sum of money represented by the alleged note was not due, and, notice of appeal not having been given within the time limited by the Yukon Territory Act 1899, no appeal lay to the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and consequently a further appeal from that court to the Supreme Court of Canada was incompetent.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

APPEAL by special leave from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada (Taschereau, C.J., Sedgewick, Davies, Mills, and Armour, JJ.), who had reversed a judgment of the Supreme Court of British Columbia (Hunter, C.J., Drake and Martin, JJ.), who had affirmed a judgment of Dugas, J. at the trial in favour of the appellant, the defendant below.

The action was brought in the Territorial Court of the Yukon District by the respondents as executors of the late Alexander Calder against the appellant, Alexander McDonald, for an account in connection with various mining transactions in the Yukon District in which Calder and McDonald had been jointly interested, and for payment of (1) a sum of 50,000 dollars with interest due on a note or document of the appellant, and (2) a sum of 8798 dollars, being an unpaid balance of an amount alleged to be due by him to Calder in respect of the "clean-up" for 1899 of a mining claim known as "No. 27 Eldorado." The appellant contended that the document had been given under special circumstances, and with regard to the contingency of his death, on the occasion of his departure for England, and with a view to effecting a sale of mining properties, including those in which he and Calder were interested, some of which had remained and others had been placed in the appellant's name. He alleged that the promise in the paper was in lieu of Calder's interest in such properties and of any money balance, if any, which might exist against him on their transactions. He contended further that after his return to the district (the properties remaining unsold, but in process of being worked out) the paper stood as a security for his return of Calder's subsisting interest in respect of the properties, and that Calder, having realised a large part of that interest, had acknowledged satisfaction of 50,000 dollars in respect thereof; and that the appellant had subsequently made good to Calder, and after his death to the plaintiffs, all the remaining interest, and had satisfied and discharged all his obligations. The claim for the 50,000 dollars was disposed of by Dugas, J. adversely to the respondents, and the appellant contended that that decision had become absolutely final and conclusive and had ceased to be subject to appeal. As to the remaining items of claim, an official inquiry showed that there was, after ascertaining the payments and sets off, nothing due to the respondents from the appellant, but, on the contrary, a balance due to the latter. The Supreme Court of British Columbia, sitting in appeal, affirmed the decision of Dugas, J.; but the Supreme Court of Canada, on further appeal, reversed both judgments and ordered a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings as they might be advised. From this last-mentioned judgment special leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee was granted.

The relevant legislation upon appeals from the Territorial Court is to be found in sects. 7, 8, and 13 of cap. 11 of the Statutes of Canada for 1899, and is as follows:

7. The Supreme Court of British Columbia is hereby constituted a Court of Appeal for the territory. (2) An appeal shall lie from any final judgment of the Territorial Court to the judges of the said Supreme Court sitting together as a full court where the matter in controversy amounts to the sum or value of five hundred dollars or upwards, or where the title to real estate or some interest therein is in question, or the validity of a patent is affected, or the matter in question relates to the taking of an annual or other rent, customary or other duty or fee, or a like demand of a public or general nature affecting future rights, or in cases of proceedings for or upon mandamus, prohibition, or injunction. (3) The said Supreme Court and the judges thereof shall have the same powers, jurisdiction, and authority with reference to any such appeal and the proceedings thereon as if it were an appeal duly authorised from a like judgment, order, or decree made by the said Supreme Court or a judge thereof in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction.

8. Notice of any such appeal shall be given within twenty days from the day upon which the judgment appealed from is pronounced or given, or within such further time as the Territorial Court or a judge thereof may allow.

13. An appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment upon any appeal authorised by this Act of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, wherever such an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada would have been authorised had the judgment appealed from been delivered by the Supreme Court of British Columbia in a like case in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction upon appeal in respect of cases originating in the courts of the said province. (2) An appeal shall also lie to the Supreme Court of Canada direct from any final judgment of the Territorial Court from which it is herein provided that an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of British Columbia, and the provisions of sects. 8, 9, and 11 of this Act shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to such appeal.

Blake, K.C. and Auguste Noël (both of the Canadian Bar) appeared for the appellant.

Sir C. Tupper, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar) and the Hon. Frank Russell, for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that no leave to appeal should have been given, as there was no question of general interest involved, the statute in question having been repealed before the application for leave to appeal was made. They cited

Lyall v. Jardine, 22 L. T. Rep. 882; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 318;

Wilson v. Callender, 9 Moo. P. C. 100;

Sibnarain Ghose v. Hulodhur Doss, 9 Moo. P. C. 354.

Blake, K.C. was heard contra on this point.

Their Lordships pointed out that the proper course for the respondents to have taken would have been to apply to rescind the leave to appeal, and decided to hear the appeal on the merits.

Blake, K.C. and Auguste Noël, for the appellant, argued that there was no appeal in this case. It was a final judgment, and, notice of appeal not having been given within the time prescribed by statute, there was no appeal, and neither the Supreme Court of British Columbia nor the Supreme Court of Canada had jurisdiction to entertain it. If it was an interlocutory judgment, no appeal lay at all. They cited Bozson v. Altrincham Urban District Council, (1903) 1 K. B. 547.

If your Lordships are with the appellant on this point, it is not necessary to go into the merits, and the dealings between the parties.

Sir C. Tupper, K.C. and the Hon. F. Russell, for the respondents, contended that the appeal to the Supreme Court of British Columbia was brought within the prescribed time, and in any case the ruling of the judge at the trial was not a final judgment on the point, but only an expression of opinion that the document in question was not a promissory note, and could not be sued on in that character. Leave to amend should have been given. They cited Blake, K.C. was heard in reply.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships' judgment was delivered by

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—Notwithstanding the time occupied by this case in argument, the questions for decision are very narrow indeed. The action, which was commenced in the Territorial Court of the Yukon Territory, was brought under circumstances similar to those which would arise in this country if a plaintiff were to bring a number of actions comprehended in one writ. During the argument a great many observations were made which some half-century ago would have been very appropriate, and probably conclusive, but they are wholly inapplicable to the system of jurisprudence which has been established since that period. Formerly there were forms of action outside which the plaintiff could not go. One record was one history of a particular litigation. Indeed, in earlier times, only one plea was admitted; and until the Statute of Anne (the Law Amendment Act 1705) a person was compelled to base his whole defence on one plea, and could not raise more than one. In like manner he had either to plead or to demur, and the judgment upon the plea, if issue was taken upon it, was conclusive against the person who was found to be in the wrong; and the judgment upon demurrer was conclusive, and would, in the strictest and most appropriate sense, be described as a final judgment. The so-called declaration, to which a person was confined, had to set out the cause of action, appropriately describe it, and, within very narrow limits indeed, bring it under a particular head of right. All that is changed. It is clear that all those rules are now inappropriate, and that the learning and phraseology applicable to them have passed away. Rightly or wrongly, the Legislature has enacted—and the law in force in the Yukon Territory follows in terms the procedure of this country—that the statement of claim shall be a simple narrative of the facts upon which the plaintiff relies, and it is for the judge to direct the jury, if there be a jury, or to decide himself, if there be none, as to the nature of the legal liability which is disclosed, not upon appropriate legal averment, but upon the facts described in the statement of claim. It is necessary to bear these matters in mind in deciding the present case, because many of the observations made and some of the authorities quoted by counsel appear to rest upon the idea that, notwithstanding the fundamental changes made by the Legislature, the old legal procedure is still preserved. In this case the respondents, the executors of one Calder, brought an action against the appellant claiming certain sums of money as due from him to Calder's estate. There were several matters in dispute, and the statement of claim describes the mode in which they arose. The particular matter, however, upon which the case now before their Lordships depends (and it has been frankly admitted that, if that one particular matter is decided against the respondents, the appeal must succeed and that the other matters may be disregarded) is whether the question of an indebtedness by the defendant (the appellant) to the extent of 50,000 dollars was, or was not, finally disposed of by the trial which took place before the Territorial judge; that is to say, whether the language used by the learned judge in disposing of the matter constituted a final judgment of the court. If the judgment was interlocutory, no appeal lay. If it was final, an appeal could only be brought within twenty days, whereas, in fact, no appeal was entered, or notice given, until a period of twenty-one days. The question, therefore, is reduced to this: Was there, or was there not, a final judgment? The learned judge ordered, on the 23rd May 1901, that, "as to the alleged note or paper writing mentioned in par. 2 of plaintiffs' statement of claim," the plaintiffs' action be dismissed. On the language used by the learned judge some criticism might be passed as to whether, in giving a decision on one item of an account, it is appropriate to say that "the action thereupon is dismissed." The respondents contend that the language used might have misled them as to the amount of time in which they could appeal, because they did not understand that language to constitute a final judgment. The point in dispute is whether the judgment of the learned judge, who, by the request of the respondents themselves, took out one of the items of account and adjudicated upon that item, was a mere adjudication that an action on a promissory note would not lie, or was really a decision that the sum of money represented by that note was one which, according to his view of the evidence, was not due. Their Lordships desire, in the first place, to observe that, if the decision were simply that the instrument relied on was sued on in its character as a promissory note, no other evidence than the document itself was required to enable the learned judge to give such a decision. But so far from confining himself to the document itself, the learned judge heard the evidence. Apart altogether from what he said afterwards, in Sept. 1901, it is impossible, if one looks at what was done and said at the time of the trial, to suppose but that the learned judge entered into the merits, and came to the conclusion that the 50,000 dollars were not due. If confirmation of that view were wanted, it is only necessary to look at what occurred when the rest of the items in the account were referred to the clerk of the court, to determine, whether or not, any money was due from the defendant to the plaintiffs. In making his report, dated the 10th Sept. 1901, the referee says: "The claim for 50,000 dollars having been dismissed, I take this as a starting point, and the only starting point that I can take from the evidence." The referee, therefore, understood what the learned judge had said; and if it was intended to contest his construction of the judgment of the 23rd May 1901, one would have expected the plaintiffs to make an application to the court, and to urge that the referee had not understood the judgment, and that the learned judge only intended to say that an action would not lie on a promissory note, whereas the referee to whom the rest of the account had been remitted had actually refused to enter into the question of the 50,000 dollars, on the ground that this money had been adjudicated upon, and that he had no right to enter into that part of the account. If that is what the plaintiffs thought at the time, and if they did not themselves understand the meaning of the learned judge, what would have been simpler than for them to apply to the court, and to have the matter put right? They could have urged that all the learned judge meant was that an action would not lie upon this as a promissory note, because it was for gold dust, and not for money. But instead of doing this, they allowed the account to be taken, to the exclusion of the claim for 50,000 dollars. The referee does not use the phrase "promissory note." He speaks of "the claim for 50,000 dollars." He says in effect: "The claim for 50,000 dollars having been decided against you, it is hardly necessary to proceed further to show what everybody understood at the time to be that which the learned judge subsequently explained"; and their Lordships cannot admit that there was anything to prevent the learned judge from explaining what he had intended to decide, if there was any ambiguity in his language. However, the question whether there should be an appeal was, as Mr. Blake has pointed out on behalf of the appellant, decided by the parties themselves, and the notion of their having been misled, and having delayed this notice of appeal through a misunderstanding of the learned judge's judgment, is illusory, because they had actually decided to appeal and an interlocutory order would have been unappealable. The account given of why they did not appeal in time—viz., that they could not give notice of appeal in twenty days—is a somewhat singular one, which is treated with great propriety by the Supreme Court of British Columbia. In the result, their Lordships are of opinion that there was a final judgment in the Territorial Court as to the claim for 50,000 dollars, whether the costs were given at the time, or followed in due course of law. If there was a final judgment the present appeal does not lie; for it is impossible to get out of the express language of the Canadian statute (the Yukon Territory Act 1899, s. 8). This is a most important matter for one of the litigants, at any rate. For the moment the time for appealing has passed, the litigation is at an end, and it would be very disastrous if, under such circumstances, it could be extended contrary to statute. As pointed out in a case cited before their Lordships (International Financial Society v. City of Moscow Gas Company, 37 L. T. Rep. 736; 7 Ch. Div. 241), the law in such cases confers a most important right on one of the litigants by ordering that there shall be an end, finally, of the litigation between the parties. The result is, that an appeal did not lie to the British Columbian Court from the judgment of the Territorial Court of the 23rd May 1901, as regarded the claim for 50,000 dollars, and the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was incompetent. In these circumstances it is not necessary, and, indeed, it would not be proper, to discuss the merits of the question which have been decided by the only tribunal competent to decide them from whose decision there is now no appeal. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal, to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada with costs, and to restore the judgment of the Supreme Court of British Columbia of the 19th Nov. 1902, with a declaration that the judgment of the Territorial Court of the 23rd May 1901 was final so far as it "ordered and adjudged as to the alleged note or paper writing mentioned in par. 2 of plaintiffs' statement of claim that the plaintiffs' action thereupon be and the same is hereby dismissed." A preliminary objection was taken by the respondents that the particular statute in question, the construction of which was stated to be a matter of general public importance justifying an application to His Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal, had, at the time of such application, been repealed, and that the appellant ought to have brought that fact before their Lordships at the time when his application was made. It has not been suggested, and very properly not suggested, that there was any lack of bona fides on the part of the appellant. At the same time, the fact ought to have been mentioned. Their Lordships do not, however, consider the point to be such as to affect the question of costs in this case, inasmuch as the real question raised on this appeal—viz., whether or not an order made under the circumstances stated was a final judgment within the meaning of the statute—is as important now as it was then. Their Lordships have already expressed their opinion that it was a final judgment; and it is only necessary to add that some of the confusion and difficulties that have been raised are due to the acts of the respondents themselves. If the causes of action had been allowed to take their ordinary course, and the whole matter had been disposed of by the learned judge in the Territorial Court, no question could possibly have been raised, and the learned judge would probably have disposed of the costs, and have used language not open to ambiguity in disposing of the whole litigation. But at the express desire of the respondents themselves he took out of the account the particular item of the claim for 50,000 dollars, and gave judgment upon that particular item. The compliance with this request of the respondents has probably given rise to all this trouble. But the question whether the order under consideration was, or was not, a final judgment, is as important to-day as it was before the statute referred to was repealed. The result is that their Lordships find no sufficient reason to deprive the appellant of his ordinary right to the costs of the appeal.

CITIZENS' LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED
v. BROWN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Libel—Libel by officer of corporation—Liability of corporation—Scope of duty of agent—Malice.

A limited company is liable for a libel published by one of its officers acting within the scope and in the course of his employment, on the ordinary principles of agency; and, if there is evidence that it was within the scope of the agent's authority and employment to write the letter which contained the libel complained of, the fact that he went further than the facts warranted, and made charges which he knew to be false, will not relieve the company from liability.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Stephen, Acting C.J., G. B. Simpson and Pring, JJ.) refusing a rule nisi to set aside the verdict found for the respondent, the plaintiff below, and to enter a nonsuit, or a verdict for the defendants, or for a new trial.

The action was brought by the respondent against the appellants to recover damages for a libel published by one Fitzpatrick, an agent of the appellant company, under circumstances which appear in the judgment of their Lordships.

The case was first tried in April 1901 before Owen, J. and a jury, when the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with damages.

This verdict was set aside and the case was tried again in Oct. 1901 before Cohen, J. and a jury, when the plaintiff again obtained a verdict with damages.

This verdict was also set aside, and in Oct. 1902 the case was tried for the third time before Simpson, J. and a jury, when the plaintiff again obtained a verdict with 650*l.* damages.

Asquith, K.C. and the Hon. F. Russell appeared for the appellants, and contended that the verdict was wrong in finding that Fitzpatrick was acting within the scope of his employment in publishing the libel. A communication to a policy-holder in answer to an inquiry was privileged so long as he was acting in the interests of the company; and if he used his position to gratify personal malice, he was acting outside the scope of his duty. In any case the malice with which he acted cannot be imputed to the corporation. They cited H. Drysdale Woodcock, who appeared for the respondent, was not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 6.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether a limited company is responsible for a libel published by one of its officers. The action has been tried three times. The plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment every time, with damages which have been every time increased. Counsel for the company feel that it would be useless to send the case back for another trial, and they therefore ask that the last verdict and judgment should be set aside and judgment entered for the company. The facts are shortly as follows: The appellants are an assurance company incorporated with limited liability and carrying on business in New South Wales. From Jan. 1900 until June 1900 the respondent Brown (the plaintiff in the action) was in the service of the company as an insurance agent at Tamworth. Brown was introduced to the company by Fitzpatrick, who was employed by the company as a superintendent of agencies under the terms of an agreement dated the 12th June 1899. His duties will be referred to presently. Shortly after leaving the employment of the company—namely, in the month of July—Brown entered the service of a rival company called the Standard Life Association, and while in the service of such company Brown visited divers of the policy-holders in the appellant company and endeavoured to induce such policy-holders to leave the appellant company and to insure in the Standard Life Association, and for the purpose of bringing about such a result made statements derogatory to the appellant company. Fitzpatrick learned that such statements had been and were being made, and he published the libel complained of. It was a circular letter sent to several persons insured in the appellant company in answer to inquiries made by them. It was plainly defamatory. Some statements contained in it were not true, and Fitzpatrick knew that they were not true. There was evidence of express malice on the part of Fitzpatrick. There is no note of the learned judge's summing up, but the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, gave him 650*l.* damages, and found that "Fitzpatrick was acting in publishing the libel within the scope of his employment and in the course of his employment." Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for this sum and costs; and the Supreme Court refused to set aside the verdict and enter judgment for the defendants and refused to grant a new trial. Hence the present appeal. Counsel for the appellants contended, first, that the verdict was wrong in finding that Fitzpatrick acted in publishing the libel within the scope and in the course of his employment; and, secondly, that even if he did, yet the malice with which he wrote it cannot be imputed to the company. In support of this proposition reliance was placed on the well-known judgment of the late Lord Bramwell in Abrath v. North-Eastern Railway Company (55 L. T. Rep. 63; 11 App. Cas. 247). It will be convenient to dispose of the second question first. There is no doubt that Lord Bramwell held strongly to his opinion that a corporation was incapable of malice or motive, and that an action for malicious prosecution could not be maintained against a company. Lord Cranworth in Western Bank of Scotland v. Macleod (L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 145) had expressed a similar opinion as to the liability of corporations for frauds. But these opinions have not prevailed, and their Lordships are not prepared to give effect to them. If it is once granted that corporations are for civil purposes to be regarded as persons—i.e., as principals acting by agents and servants—it is difficult to see why the ordinary doctrines of agency, and of master and servant, are not to be applied to corporations as well as to ordinary individuals. These doctrines have been so applied in a great variety of cases, in questions arising out of contract, and in questions arising out of torts and frauds; and to apply them to one class of libels and to deny their application to another class of libels on the ground that malice cannot be imputed to a body corporate appears to their Lordships to be contrary to sound legal principles. To talk about imputing malice to corporations appears to their Lordships to introduce metaphysical subtleties which are needless and fallacious. Their Lordships concur with the view of the Acting Chief Justice in this case that if Fitzpatrick published the libel complained of in the course of his employment, the company are liable for it on ordinary principles of agency. Fitzpatrick's letter, although published on a privileged occasion, was not itself privileged; and not being privileged the letter must be treated as any other libel written and published by an officer of the company. There remains, however, the important question whether there was evidence on which the jury could properly find that the publication of the letter was within the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority or, what is the same thing, within the scope of his employment. He was engaged by a written agreement; he was a superintendent; he was to act under instructions given to him by properly authorised officers and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the company. He was to devote his whole time to furthering the company's business. He was to receive and pay money, keep proper accounts, and to supervise various agencies under him.

He was to be paid a salary of 5*l.* a week and a commission on policies procured by him. The written agreement did not state more precisely what his duties were. Witnesses were called to throw further light upon the subject. Mr. Eedy, the general secretary of the company, said that if policy-holders wanted to know why the company did not prosecute Brown for his statements about the company, Fitzpatrick should have communicated that matter to the head office before taking action. "It would have been his duty." Another witness said his duty was to appoint and look after agents, and "to stand as an intermediate between the assured and the office. His authority is to secure business and save business and to visit policy-holders whose policies have lapsed or are likely to lapse. In the district itself there is no one above him." It is clear that the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority and employment was wide and by no means clearly defined. In considering the scope of his authority and employment, their Lordships agree with the Acting Chief Justice in thinking that the jury were entitled to act on their own knowledge of colonial business and habits. They were entitled to consider the necessities of the case arising from the size and nature of the district placed under Fitzpatrick's supervision and what would naturally be done in the colony by a person in his position. He had no actual authority express or implied to write libels nor to do anything legally wrong; but it is not necessary that he should have had any such authority in order to render the company liable for his acts. The law upon this subject cannot be better expressed than it was by the Acting Chief Justice in this case. He said: "Although the particular act which gives the cause of action may not be authorised, still if the act is done in the course of employment which is authorised, then the master is liable for the act of his servant." This doctrine has been approved and acted upon by this board in Mackay v. Commercial Bank of New Brunswick (30 L. T. Rep. 180; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 394) and Swire v. Francis (37 L. T. Rep. 554; 3 App. Cas. 106), and the doctrine is as applicable to incorporated companies as to individuals. All doubt on this question was removed by the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (16 L. T. Rep. 461; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 259), which is the leading case on the subject. It was distinctly approved by Lord Selborne in the House of Lords in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank (42 L. T. Rep. 194; 5 App. Cas. 317, 326), and has been followed in numerous other cases. Such being the evidence, their Lordships cannot judicially hold that there was no evidence to warrant the jury in finding that it was within the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority and employment to write to policy-holders in order to counteract the mischief which Brown was doing to the business of the company; and although Fitzpatrick went too far and made charges against Brown which he knew were not true, their Lordships are of opinion that the company are legally responsible for what he wrote. As regards the verdict being against the weight of evidence, it must be borne in mind that Simpson, J., who tried the last action, was satisfied with the verdict, and he reports that the judges who tried the two previous actions were also satisfied with the verdicts given in them.

GLENWOOD LUMBER COMPANY v.
PHILLIPS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND.

Occupation of land—Right of occupier as against wrongdoer—License to cut timber—Effect of—Consolidated Statutes of Newfoundland (second series), c. 13, s. 51.

The effect of a licence to cut timber on Crown land under c. 13, sect. 51, of the Consolidated Statutes of Newfoundland (second series) is to confer a title to the land and an exclusive right of occupation in the licensee, subject to the reservations contained in the Act; and therefore such licensee has lawful possession of timber lying on the land which was cut by a trespasser before the date of the licence, and is entitled to damages for its removal.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668; (1902) P. 42) approved.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland affirming a judgment of Morison, J. in favour of the respondent, the plaintiff below.

The action was brought to recover a quantity of timber, or its value, and for damages, under circumstances which appear fully in the judgment of their Lordships.

Sir J. S. Winter, K.C. (of the Colonial Bar) and W. H. Cozens-Hardy appeared for the appellants.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C. and Dumas for the respondent.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 14.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD DAVEY. — In 1898 the appellants and the respondent Phillips respectively applied to the Governor in Council of the Colony of Newfoundland for licences to cut timber on certain blocks of timber land near the Main River flowing into Gander Lake in that colony. The respondent Phillips is hereafter referred to as the respondent. The practice appears to be for such applications to be first considered in the Colonial Secretary's office, and if they are approved a notification is sent to the Minister of Agriculture and Mines, from whose office the licences are then issued. On the 16th Nov. 1898 the Deputy Colonial Secretary wrote a letter of that date to the Minister of Agriculture and Mines inclosing four licences to cut timber which (he stated) had been approved by his Excellency the Governor, and had been granted to the following persons—viz., to the respondent two blocks, one of which is the area in question in this litigation, and to the appellants two other blocks. The respondent's agent was informed by the Colonial Secretary on the 15th Nov. 1898 that the grants to him had been passed, but no licence was issued until the 20th Jan. 1899. On the 17th Oct. 1898 the appellants, without any title to do so but (as stated in their case) "expecting and believing" that their application would be granted by the Government, commenced cutting timber on land which was comprised in the licence afterwards granted to the respondent, and they continued such cutting, notwithstanding a formal notice from the respondent, until the 23rd Jan. 1899. At that date the timber which had been cut by the appellants either lay on the ground or was piled on the land near the river. None of it was removed until after the 23rd Jan. The respondents' licence, which was dated the 20th Jan. 1899, was granted under the Great Seal of the Colony, in pursuance of sect. 51 of cap. 13 of the Consolidated Statutes of Newfoundland (second series). The Crown thereby "licensed" to the respondent, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all that tract, piece, or parcel of land particularly described to hold for the purpose aforesaid (i.e., for cutting the timber thereon), for the term of twenty-one years from the date of the licence, at an annual rental of ninety-six dollars, and the payment of a bonus of forty dollars on execution. There was a proviso that persons might at all times make and use roads upon and travel over the ground licensed, and that nothing therein contained should prevent any person taking standing timber without compensation to be used for certain public works by the Government, the authority of the Surveyor-General being first obtained, and that persons settling by lawful authority within the ground licensed should not be interrupted in clearing and cultivation by the licensee. The appellants contended that this instrument conferred only a licence to cut timber and carry it away, and did not give the respondent any right of occupation or interest in the land itself. Having regard to the provisions of the Act under the powers of which it was executed and to the language of the document itself, their Lordships cannot adopt this view of the construction or effect of it. In the so-called licence itself it is called indifferently a licence and a demise, but in the Act it is spoken of as a lease, and the holder of it is described as the lessee. It is not, however, a question of words, but of substance. If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder an exclusive right of occupation of the land though subject to certain reservations or to a restriction of the purposes for which it may be used, it is in law a demise of the land itself. By sub-sect. (7) of sect. 51 of the Act it is enacted that the lease shall vest in the lessee the right to take and keep exclusive possession of the lands described therein subject to the conditions in the Act provided or referred to, and the lessee is empowered (amongst other things) to bring any actions or suits against any party unlawfully in possession of any land so leased and to prosecute all trespassers thereon. The operative part and habendum in the licence is framed in apt language to carry out the intention so expressed in the Act. And their Lordships have no doubt that the effect of the so-called licence was to confer a title to the land itself on the respondent. Subsequently to the 23rd Jan. 1899 the appellants proceeded to remove the logs which they had cut before that date. On the 20th June 1899 the respondent commenced an action against the appellants. In the statement of claim it is alleged (1) that the appellants on the 20th Jan. 1899 and divers other dates wrongfully entered on the respondent's land and cut down the respondent's trees; (2) that the appellants detained from the respondent the respondent's goods and chattels—that is to say, 15,500 logs—and the respondent claimed a return of the said goods and chattels or their value, and by the 3rd paragraph the respondent claimed an injunction. The defence was a traverse of the allegations in pars. 1 and 2. This defence was, after trial, amended by adding specific allegations that the land described was not the respondent's land, and the trees stated to have been cut down were not the respondent's trees, and the logs stated to have been detained were not the respondent's logs. The action was tried before Morison, J., and by his judgment, dated the 27th Aug. 1900, it was adjudged that the respondent should recover from the appellants 521,979ft. of lumber then piled in the appellants' mill, or 3132 dollars their value, and 468 dollars for other lumber, and 400 dollars damages and costs, and that a sum of 1174.50 dollars (which the respondent had agreed to pay to the appellants for sawing the logs after the date of an interlocutory injunction) be set off against the damages and costs. There was an appeal from this judgment, which, by an order dated the 2nd April 1901, was ordered to be dismissed with costs. The present appeal is from the latter order. The first and principal point taken for the appellants at their Lordships' Bar was that the logs having been cut before the date of the commencement of the respondent's title did not vest in, and were not the property of, the respondent. It was also contended that at any rate an alteration should be made in the details of the judgment. An endeavour was made by the learned counsel for the appellant to restrict the second paragraph of the statement of claim to logs cut after the 20th Jan. 1899. Their Lordships cannot accept this narrow construction of the statement of claim, and they think that the action was in substance for trespassing on the respondent's lands, and for detinue of the logs removed from his lands after the 20th Jan. 1899. The action was in fact so treated by the learned judge at the trial. It was then said that at any rate the logs were as between the respondent and the Crown, the property of the Crown. The answer to this argument is that the appellants were wrongdoers in every step of their proceedings. There is not a hint in either of the pleadings or the evidence of any title in the appellants to cut the trees. Indeed, any such title is negatived by their own statement in their case that they acted in expectation only that they would afterwards acquire a title, and by the evidence, and their Lordships cannot listen to the suggestion of counsel that the appellants may have had a licence from the Crown. The appellants were wrongdoers in entering on the lands of the respondent for the purpose of removing the logs, and also in removing the logs which were certainly not their property. The respondent on the other hand was, in their Lordships' opinion, lessee and occupier of the lands, and as such, had lawful possession of the logs which were on the land. It is a well-established principle in English law that possession is good against a wrongdoer and the latter cannot set up a jus tertii unless he claims under it. This question has been exhaustively discussed by Collins, M.R. in the recent case of The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668; (1902) P. 42.) In Jeffries v. Great Western Railway Company (26 L. T. Rep. O. S. 217; 5 E. & B. 802). Lord Campbell, C.J. is reported to have said: "I am of opinion that the law is that a person possessed of goods as his property has a good title as against every stranger, and that one who takes them from him having no title in himself is a wrongdoer, and cannot defend himself by showing that there was title in some third person, for against a wrongdoer possession is title." The Master of the Rolls, after quoting this passage, continues: "Therefore it is not open to the defendant, being a wrongdoer, to inquire into the nature or limitation of the possessor's right, and unless it is competent for him to do so the question of his relation to, or liability towards, the true owner cannot come into the discussion at all, and therefore, as between those two parties, full damages have to be paid without any further inquiry." Their Lordships do not consider it necessary to refer at any greater length to the reasoning and authorities by which the Master of the Rolls supports this conclusion and are content to express their entire concurrence in it. The learned counsel for the appellants recently moved before their Lordships for leave to make a further statement as to matters which he said had not been considered in the argument. The application was unusual, but their Lordships thought it better to hear the motion. Attention was then drawn to the statement in the judgment of the learned judge as to the agreement of the 7th Sept. 1899 entered into between the parties in the course of the litigation. The agreement itself is not in the record and is not referred to in the appellants' case, and it was obviously not intended to be relied on in support of their appeal. Nor does it appear to their Lordships to give them any assistance. These considerations dispose of the appellants' principal point, and it is unnecessary for their Lordships to discuss the opinion expressed by Morison, J. that the communication to the respondent that his application for a licence had been granted would give him as from that date a good title to the logs, although the licence was not completed until a later date. The appellants' point on the form of the judgment is that the learned judge should have allowed them as against the respondent the expenses of cutting the trees and floating the logs down the river, as well as the expenses of sawing and piling. The latter expenses were allowed by arrangement between the parties. There was no arrangement as to the former. Their Lordships think that the judgment is in the form usual in actions for detinue, and it would not be right to impose on the respondent the obligation of paying the appellants the expenses of their wrongful acts as a condition of recovering what must be considered in this action as his property, although such expenses might properly, but would not necessarily, be taken into account in estimating the alternative damages. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed, and the appellants will pay the costs of it, including the costs of the motion made by Sir James Winter subsequent to the hearing.

LUKEY AND ANOTHER v. SYDNEY HARBOUR TRUST COMMISSIONERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Law of New South Wales—Sydney Harbour Trust Act 1900, ss. 27, 68—Wharfage rates—Private wharf—"Interest in land existing at the time of the passing of the Act—Payment of rent.

By the Sydney Harbour Trust Act 1900, s. 68, the Harbour Commissioners constituted by the Act were directed to collect in respect of all vessels berthed "at any wharf vested in the commissioners" . . . "wharfage and tonnage rates according to the provisions of the Wharfage and Tonnage Act 1884." The Act of 1884 did not apply to private wharfs.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the rates granted by the later Act were to be levied on goods landed at a wharf vested in the commissioners though it was in the occupation of a private person.

Held, further, that the fact that the lessee of a wharf who remained in occupation of the wharf after the expiration of his lease, and had applied for a renewal of the lease, and had paid rent in advance pending such renewal, had not "an interest in such lands" within sect. 27 of the Act.

May 14.—Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir ARTHUR WILSON.—The Australian Gas Light Company held leases from the Crown of certain wharfs adjoining its own lands in Kent-street, Sydney, expiring on the 31st Dec. 1899, and a like lease of another wharf adjoining its own land at Mortlake, expiring on the 31st Dec. 1900. Those leases were granted under the Crown Lands Act of 1884, which by sects. 5 and 6 prohibits, amongst other things, the leasing of Crown lands except under and subject to the provisions of the Act, while sects. 89 and 145 with the regulations made under the last-mentioned section lay down stringent conditions which must be complied with in order to give validity to such leases as those held by the company. On the 28th Nov. 1899, while the Kent-street leases were still in force, the company applied for a renewal of them. And on the 31st Jan. 1900, while the Mortlake lease was still in force, the company applied for a renewal of that lease. Nothing is shown to have been done at the time upon either of those applications; but the company continued in occupation of the wharfs. On the 21st Jan. 1901 the Under Secretary for Lands wrote to the company regarding the Kent-street premises, referring to its "occupation" "of the sites of terminated special leases," and requesting the Company to pay into the Treasury Department a sum of money "being rent at the former rates for the years 1900 and 1901." Payment was made as requested, and a receipt was given headed "suspense account," describing the money as "rent" on the expired leases, and adding the words, "Awaiting reference to Lands Department. Leases expired." A like payment was made on the 31st Dec. 1900 in respect of the Mortlake wharf, and a like receipt given. On the 14th May 1901 the company's application of the 28th Nov. 1899 for renewed leases of the Kent-street premises was refused by Government on the ground that the power to grant such leases had become vested in the Harbour Trust Commissioners under the Sydney Harbour Trust Act 1900. The company's application of the 31st Jan. 1900 for a renewed lease of the Mortlake premises does not appear to have been specifically answered, but it is obvious that the legal disability was the same in both cases. The Sydney Harbour Trust Act 1900, just referred to and relied upon by the Government as having altered the legal position, was passed on the 11th Feb. 1901, and was declared to come into force on the previous 1st Nov. 1900, which day was made the commencement of the Act. That Act constituted a body of Harbour Commissioners. Sect. 27 vested in them all Crown lands within the boundaries of the port, "subject to the interest of any persons in such lands existing at the time of the passing of this Act." Sect. 29 enacts that: "No lease or licence in force at the commencement of this Act of or relating to any Crown land hereby vested in the commissioners shall be in any manner affected by this Act." Sect. 68 directs the commissioners to collect in respect of all vessels berthed "at any wharf . . . vested in the commissioners or in respect of all goods . . . shipped on or unshipped from any vessel so berthed wharfage and tonnage rates according to the provisions contained in the Wharfage and Tonnage Act of 1880 and Acts amending the same, which Acts are mutatis mutandis hereby incorporated . . . subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned; and all the powers therein contained are hereby conferred upon the commissioners." Other provisions followed. The Wharfage and Tonnage Act of 1880 so incorporated is an Act of general application in the colony. It authorised the levy of inward and outward wharfage rates, not exceeding those in the schedule, on goods shipped or unshipped upon wharfs of two kinds, public wharfs and private sufferance wharfs, both of which terms are defined; and the Act contains other provisions in connection with such wharfs and such wharfage rates. On the 29th May 1901 the commissioners claimed payment by the company of wharfage rates on coal unshipped at the Kent-street and Mortlake wharfs since the 11th Feb. 1901, the date of the passing of the Sydney Harbour Trust Act 1900. The correspondence which followed did not lead to an agreement. On the 27th Aug. the commissioners gave notice that unless the company paid the wharfages already due and agreed to pay them in the future vessels would not be allowed to berth at the wharfs after the 1st Sept. And in pursuance of this notice berths were refused to certain vessels. The present suit was thereupon brought on the 6th Sept. 1901 by the company and by Gainford (who was interested in the matter by reason of his being under contract to supply coal to the company) against the commissioners, claiming an injunction, a declaration against the right of the commissioners to wharfage, and damages. A temporary injunction was, in the first instance, granted ex parte. This was followed by a motion to continue the injunction, on the hearing of which the case between the parties was fully gone into; and Walker, J. made an order continuing the injunction, thus disposing of the whole suit on the merits. The Full Court, on appeal, unanimously reversed the decision of the learned judge, and dissolved the injunction. Against that decision the present appeal has been brought. The question for decision is whether, as the learned judges of the Full Court held, the commissioners had the right to levy wharfage dues upon goods landed at these wharfs, for if they had everything else follows and the appeal fails. In the arguments before their Lordships the case for the appellants was placed upon two grounds. It was contended, first, that the commissioners have power to levy wharfage rates only in the cases of public wharfs and private sufferance wharfs; and that, as the wharfs in question are mere private wharfs, not falling within either of those descriptions, sect. 68 of the Sydney Harbour Trust Act did not authorise the levy of wharfage upon them. It was argued that, as the wharfage rates granted by that section are to be levied according to the provisions of the earlier Wharfage and Tonnage Act which is incorporated, and as that Act granted wharfage only upon two classes of wharfs, the later Act must be similarly restricted. And in support of this, it was pointed out that in sect. 32, and perhaps in other places of the later Act, the distinction between private wharfs and others is recognised as still subsisting, and as material for some purposes at least. Their Lordships agree with the learned judges of the Full Court in thinking that the language of sect. 68 of the Sydney Harbour Trust Act is too clear to admit of such an interpretation. The wharfage rates granted by it are to be levied according to the provisions of the earlier Act, but they are granted in express terms upon any wharf vested in the commissioners. It was contended, secondly, that by reason of the payment and receipt of rent in respect of the wharfs for the year 1901, under the circumstances already stated, the company had at the date of the passing of the Sydney Harbour Trust Act, an interest in the wharfs within the meaning of sect. 27; that that interest was valid for the whole year 1901, or, in the alternative, for a part of it; that it was protected by the words of sect. 27; and that it was an interest of such a nature as to preclude the levy of wharfage rates by the commissioners. Their Lordships agree with the learned judges of the Full Court that this position is not tenable. The only interest in the wharfs which the company ever contemplated acquiring were the leases for which it applied. The money was paid in the hope of acquiring those leases, but with knowledge that the obtaining of them was quite uncertain, for they never could be granted unless all the conditions prescribed by the law should be complied with; and the facts were clearly shown upon the receipts accepted by the company. The leases never were granted, there never was any right to claim them which could have been enforced against Government, and with the passing of the Sydney Harbour Trust Act, the possibility of their being granted by Government came to an end. Whether the company is entitled to claim a return by the Government of any part of the money paid is a question which is not raised in this suit or between these parties. Whether, if the Crown had proceeded against the company for damages as a trespasser, the company could have pleaded leave and licence in answer is a question which also is not raised. But it would be difficult to hold that the company had acquired an interest in the wharfs without in effect holding that they obtained a demise in a manner rendered impossible by the Crown Lands Act. But supposing that it could be held that the company had an interest in the wharfs, what would the character of that interest be? It could only be some kind of right, complete or incomplete, in the company to the possession or occupation or use and enjoyment of the wharfs as its private wharfs. And it has been already shown that wharfage rates are to be levied on private wharfs as well as on others. The supposed interest, therefore, which has been contended for would have been ineffectual for securing the object for which it was invoked. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs.

SMITH v. MCARTHUR AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW ZEALAND.

Law of New Zealand—Licensing Act 1895, s. 3, 8, sub-s. 4—Licensing poll—Poll null and void—Renewal of existing licences.

By the New Zealand Licensing Act 1895, s. 3, "No licence of any description shall be granted or renewed until the electors of the district have previously determined in manner hereinafter provided (1) whether the number of licences existing in the district is to continue; (2) whether the number of licences existing in the district is to be reduced; (3) whether no licences are to be granted in the district."

By sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, if "none of the proposals respecting licences in the district is carried by the prescribed majority . . . the number of licences shall continue as they are until the next licensing poll."

A "licensing poll" was taken in the N. district, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, but was afterwards declared void on the ground of certain irregularities.

The appellant, who was the holder of a licence in the district, afterwards applied to the licensing committee for a renewal of his licence.

No objection was made to the renewal, but the committee held that, under the circumstances, they had no power to renew any licence.

Held, that the contingency of the poll taken being legally null and void was covered by sect. 8, sub-sect. 4, and that all existing licences continued in force until the next licensing poll.

Judgment of the court below reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand dismissing a motion for a writ of mandamus to the licensing committee of the Newtown district to grant the application of the appellant, an hotel-keeper, for the renewal of his licence under "the Licensing Acts," the committee having refused to do so on the ground that they had no longer any jurisdiction to issue licences in the district in consequence of a poll of the electors under the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act Amendment Act 1895, having been declared void on the ground of irregularities in the taking of the poll.

The appellant had for some time been the holder of a publican's licence in respect of his hotel, and the licence was on the 4th June 1902 renewed for the year ending the 30th June 1903.

At the date of the renewal the hotel was situated in the licensing district of Wellington Suburbs.

Under the Alcoholic Sale Control Act 1893 the licensing districts are the electoral districts for the time being of the colony. These districts are altered in accordance with the results of each quinquennial census, the new districts coming into force on the dissolution or expiration of the then existing Parliament. Licences are granted and renewed in each district by a licensing committee consisting of the stipendiary magistrate and persons elected by the electors of the district.

Under a proclamation by the Governor of the Colony, which came into effect in Nov. 1902, a new electoral district was constituted under the name of the Newtown Electoral District, composed of portions of the previous electoral districts of Wellington Suburbs and Wellington City, and including the hotel, and the new electoral district thereupon became a licensing district.

The last licensing poll for the Wellington Suburbs District, held under the Alcoholic Liquors Sale Control Act Amendment Act 1895, took place in 1899, and the result was that the proposal that the number of licences existing in that district should continue was carried.

On the 25th Nov. 1902 a licensing poll for the licensing district of Newtown took place, and it was declared that a proposal that no licences should be granted in that district had been carried.

Subsequently the last-mentioned poll was declared void on the ground of irregularities in the taking of it.

An application was made under the Licensing Act 1881 to the Governor to appoint a day for a new poll, but it was not acceded to.

The respondents were subsequently elected members of the licensing committee for the Newtown district, Mr. M'Arthur (the stipendiary magistrate) being appointed chairman.

At the annual meeting of the committee on the 5th June 1903 an application was made by the appellant for a renewal of his licence in respect of the hotel.

The committee refused the appellant's application and all other applications for licences, on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to grant licences or renewals of licences within the district.

Actions were then brought in the Supreme Court by the appellant and four other applicants against the licensing committee, in each case for a mandamus to the respondents to grant, or in the alternative to hear and determine, the applications.

The appellant's motion for a mandamus and similar motions in the other four actions came on for hearing in the Supreme Court in July 1903.

The court (Stout, C.J., Denniston and Cooper, JJ.) delivered judgment, dismissing the appellant's motion for a mandamus with costs, Conolly and Edwards, JJ. dissenting.

Danckwerts, K.C., Vaughan Hawkins, and Skerrett (of the Colonial Bar), appeared for the appellant.

Northcote for the respondent.

The arguments turned entirely upon the sections of the colonial statutes, which are set out in the judgment.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

May 14.—Their Lordship's judgment was delivered by LORD LINDLEY.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, dismissing a motion for a writ of mandamus to the licensing committee of the Newtown district, to grant or, in the alternative, to hear and determine, the appellant's application for the renewal of his licence under "the Licensing Acts." The court refused to do so on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to grant the application. The practical result of this decision is that, so far as the Newtown district is concerned, the Licensing Acts are brought to a deadlock. Existing licences in the district cannot be renewed, and no new licences in it can be granted. The facts are as follows: The appellant had for some time been the holder of a publican's licence in respect of a hotel called the Park Hotel, and such licence was on the 4th June 1902 renewed for the year ending the 30th June 1903. At the date of such renewal the hotel was situate in the licensing district of Wellington Suburbs. Under a proclamation by the Governor of New Zealand,

[PRIV. CO.]

SMITH v. MCARTHUR AND OTHERS.

[PRIV. CO.]

dated the 13th Aug. 1902, which came into effect on the 5th Nov. 1902, a new electoral district was duly constituted under the name of the Newtown electoral district, consisting of parts of the previous electoral districts of Wellington Suburbs and Wellington City and comprising the said hotel; and such new electoral district thereupon became, under the provisions of the Licensing Act 1881, and the Acts amending the same, a licensing district. On the 5th Dec. 1896, and again on the 6th Dec. 1899, licensing polls were duly taken under the Licensing Acts in each of the districts of Wellington Suburbs and Wellington City, the result in each case being that the proposal that the number of licences then existing should continue was carried. The licence for the Park Hotel was duly renewed from time to time by the licensing committee for Wellington Suburbs district. The last of such renewals was on the 4th June 1902, the licence then issued being in force to the 30th June 1903. On the 25th Nov. 1902, a licensing poll of the electors of Newtown district was taken, under sect. 4 of the Act of 1895, but subsequently on an inquiry, held pursuant to sect. 7 (c) of the said Act and the Regulation of Local Elections Act 1876 this poll was duly declared void on the ground of irregularities committed by the officers appointed by statute to take it. The respondents were afterwards duly elected members of the licensing committee for the Newtown District, and on the 7th May 1903, the appellant gave notice of his intention to apply, and on the 5th June 1903, at the annual licensing meeting for Newtown District, he applied to the respondents for a renewal of his licence. No objection was lodged or made affecting the appellant or his house, but the licensing committee refused his application and all other applications for licences, holding that they had no jurisdiction to grant licences or renewals of licences within the district. The appellant and four other applicants then commenced actions in the Supreme Court against the respondents, the licensing committee, for a mandamus (in each case) to the respondents to grant (or in the alternative to hear and determine) the applications respectively. The appellant's motion for a mandamus was heard (together with similar motions in the four other actions) before the Supreme Court (consisting of Stout, C.J., and Denniston, Conolly, Edwards, and Cooper, JJ.) on the 8th, 9th, 14th, 15th, and 16th July 1903. Judgment was reserved, and on the 31st July 1903 the court (by a majority of three judges against two) gave judgment dismissing the appellant's motion for a mandamus with costs. Hence this appeal. The Licensing Acts which have to be considered are those of 1881, 1882, 1889, 1893, 1895, and 1902. The difficulty which has arisen turns mainly on the true construction of sect. 3 of the Act of 1895, taken in conjunction with sect. 2 (3) of the same Act and of sect. 21 of the Act of 1893. Their Lordships will deal with these presently, but it must not be forgotten that there is in New Zealand a statutory Interpretation Act (1888, No. 15). By sect. 4 of that Act, "Words importing the singular number include the plural number." By sect. 5 (clause 2) Amending Acts are to be read as incorporated with the Acts amended, and by clause 7, "Every Act and every provision or enactment thereof shall be deemed remedial . . . and shall accordingly receive such fair, large, and liberal construction and interpretation as will best ensure the attainment of the object of the Act and of such provision or enactment according to its true intent, meaning, and spirit." Passing now to the sections of the Act of 1895 above referred to, sect. 3 is clear and free from all ambiguity. It runs thus: "No licence of any description shall be granted or renewed until the electors of the district have previously determined in manner hereinafter provided—(1) Whether the number of licences existing in the district is to continue. (2) Whether the number of licences existing in the district is to be reduced. (3) Whether no licences are to be granted in the district." The "manner hereinafter provided" is to be found in sects. 4 to 7, and is by a poll of the electors of the district; which poll (called the "licensing poll") is to be taken on the day appointed for the electoral poll and simultaneously with such poll. If this section stood alone there could be no renewal of the appellant's licence until a licensing poll for the Newtown District had determined the questions above mentioned, and so long as there is no licensing poll for that district there can be no renewal. But sect. 2 (3) says that "Sect. 3 of this Act shall not come into operation until the day next before the day appointed for the . . . licensing poll first taken after the commencement of this Act." This, it will be observed, is a postponing section only. But the effect of the two sections together seems plainly to be that sect. 3 is to come into operation on the day appointed for the licensing poll described in sect. 2 (3) as the licensing poll first taken after the commencement of the Act. The Act came into operation on the 31st Oct. 1895. It is evidently assumed, however, that the licensing poll referred to will be taken. The contingency that there will be no poll, or that the poll taken in fact will be legally null and void, seems, however, to be covered by sect. 8 (4) which is as follows: "If the returning officer finds that none of the proposals respecting licences in the district is carried by the prescribed majority, then he shall notify the licensing committee thereof, and the number of licences shall continue as they are until the taking of the next licensing poll, subject nevertheless to the power of refusing to renew licences objected to under sub-sects. 1-4 inclusive of sect. 81 of the principal Act" (the Act of 1881), "and subject also to the provisions of the Licensing Acts relating to forfeiture or increase of licences." In connection with these sections there is another specially applicable to new districts—viz., sect. 21 of the Act of 1893. This section is as follows: "Where a district constituted under this Act or the principal Act has been abolished or altered, and has been constituted or divided into new districts, the poll in force in such first-mentioned district at the time of such abolition or alteration shall continue or remain in force in such new districts until the period arrives for taking the next triennial poll, and shall have the same force and effect as if such poll had been taken in such new districts." Although this section speaks of a "district," the Interpretation Act already referred to justifies a construction which will make the section applicable to one or more new districts constituted out of two or more previously existing districts. The section is as much required in the last case as in the case of a subdivision of only one district, and although it may be true that the section was inserted to meet the inconvenience arising from the creation of new districts out of one old district, their Lordships see no reason for confining this section to that particular case. The object aimed at by the Legislature is plainly apparent from the enactments above referred to. Subject to any objections which might be made to any particular licensee or house, the object of the Legislature plainly was to continue in every district and new district formed out of it, all existing licences, until a licensing poll should have decided which of the three courses mentioned in sect. 3 of the Act of 1895 should be pursued in that district. The difficulty of giving effect to this intention in this particular case is due entirely to the fact that sect. 2 (3) is so expressed as to postpone the operation of sect. 3, not to the decision of the poll, but to the day before the day appointed for taking it. But sect. 8 (4) shows that existing licences may, in certain cases, continue in force beyond that day. The language of sect. 21 of the Act of 1893 is more elastic than the language of sect. 2 (3) of the Act of 1895. In both cases, however, the language points to a time rather than to the event which was to happen at that time, but the event, i.e., the result of the poll, is the governing factor. To ignore this, and to adhere to language so literally as to defeat the plain intention of the Legislature instead of so construing the words as to give effect to that intention, is to run counter to sect. 5 (7) of the Interpretation Act, which, after all, only expresses what is meant by the old legal maxim Qui hæret in littera hæret in cortice. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal, and to order a mandamus to issue to the licensing committee to hear and determine the appellant's application and to order the respondents other than Alexander McArthur, who was a nominal defendant only, to pay the costs of the action. The respondents, other than the first respondent (Alexander McArthur), must pay the costs of the appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

April 27 and May 4.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, STIRLING, and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.)

In the Goods of PRYSE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE DIVISION.

Probate—Practice—Sole beneficiary under will not named as executor—Executor according to the tenour of the will—Grant of letters of administration with will annexed.

A person constituted universal devisee and legatee by a will, but not named as executor, is entitled to administration with the will annexed, but not to probate.

In the Goods of Oliphant (1 Sw. & Tr. 525) considered.

Decision of the President of the Probate Division (Sir Francis Jeune) affirmed.

ELIZABETH PRYSE, who died on the 14th Jan. 1903, by her will dated the 16th Aug. 1901 gave all her property, "viz., freehold farm, stock and crop, and the household furniture," to her daughter Sophia Evans absolutely, subject to the payment of a mortgage debt of 60l. upon the farm.

There was no other beneficiary under the will, and no executor was appointed by the will.

The testatrix's daughter Sophia Evans applied for a grant of probate of the will as executrix according to the tenour thereof.

The registrar declined to allow probate to issue being of opinion that the daughter was not the executrix according to the tenour on the construction of the will.

The daughter applied to the President of the Probate Division (Sir Francis Jeune) to decree probate of the will to her as executrix according to the tenour thereof.

The President on the 7th March 1904 refused her application.

From that decision the daughter now appealed.

Griffith Jones for the appellant.—No person is nominated by the will to pay the testatrix's debts, and the daughter takes all the property of the testatrix subject to the payment of a mortgage debt. I submit that being so constituted the universal devisee and legatee of the testatrix, the daughter is to be regarded as executrix according to the tenour of the will, and is entitled to probate:

Androvin v. Poilblanc, 3 Atk. 526;

In the Goods of Oliphant, 1 Sw. & Tr. 525, at p. 527

The old practice of the registry was, no doubt, not to grant probate, but administration with the will annexed, to a person who was not named in a will as executor, but who, as being beneficially entitled as universal legatee, was to be regarded as executor according to the tenour of the will. But that practice was departed from in Androvin v. Poilblanc (ubi sup.), and probate should in such a case be granted. Moreover, having regard to sect. 1 of the Land Transfer Act 1897, which has modified the law in respect of the disposition of land, there is a reason why the old practice should not be followed. The practice which was adopted in Androvin v. Poilblanc (ubi sup.) should be either substituted for that practice or substituted for it at the discretion of the court. The old practice should not be followed in the present case for an additional reason—namely, that some trespasses might be committed on the land, and if so, there would substantially be no remedy. At any rate, there might be some difficulty, because the most appropriate remedy might be some remedy which would prevent a wrong being done at the moment when it was being committed. He referred on this point to

May 4. — The following judgments were delivered:

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case we postponed our decision in order that we might Re WRIGHTSON; BATTIE-WRIGHTSON v. THOMAS.

[CT. OF APP.]

consult the judges of the Probate Division and ascertain for certain what is the practice of that division of the court. Now, it is admitted, quite irrespective of those inquiries, that for a very large number of years—one hundred years, I think, or a great many years, anyhow—the practice of the Probate Court in cases where someone is not named as executor in a will, but who has such an interest and such duties in connection with it as that, in spite of not being named as executor, he might be executor according to the tenour, and looked to to act as such, has been not to grant probate, but to grant letters of administration with the will annexed. That being admitted to have been for a long time the practice, it was suggested that it had been recognised in the case of In the Goods of Oliphant (1 Sw. & Tr. 525, at p. 527), that that practice might be departed from in certain cases. And it was further suggested that by reason of the law having been modified by statute in respect of the disposition of land, there was a reason why the prevailing practice should not be followed, and that the practice which was suggested in Androvin v. Poilblanc (3 Atk. 526), and referred to in the case of In the Goods of Oliphant (ubi sup.) should be either substituted for it, or substituted for it at the discretion of the court. Now, in the first place, I have come to the conclusion that so far as the rights and interests of the applicant here are concerned it does not make the slightest difference whether that which is granted is probate or letters of administration with the will annexed. It was suggested that if all that was granted was letters of administration with the will annexed, it might be that some trespasses might be committed on the land, and that, if that was done, substantially there would be no remedy. I cannot agree there. So far as the remedy in the shape of an action of trespass is concerned, there can be no doubt that now, as indeed always has been the case, as is evidenced by the decision in the case of Rex v. Inhabitants of Horsley (8 East, 405), which was brought to our notice, a person getting letters of administration was entitled to bring an action for the trespasses committed in the interval, and was entitled to do that notwithstanding the fact that there is not the same relation in the case of letters of administration that there is in the case of title under probate. Then it was suggested that there might be some difficulty because the most appropriate remedy might be some remedy which would prevent a wrong being done at the moment when it was being committed. But there again the remedy is quite sufficient. If necessary, there could be no sort of difficulty in obtaining the appointment of a receiver. Under these circumstances, the first conclusion I come to is that there is no real interest of the applicant which is in the slightest degree taken from her by the fact that that which was granted was letters of administration with the will annexed as distinguished from probate. Then upon the question of what the present practice is, the President of the Probate Division has informed me that the practice is still that which has been in force for so very many years; and he has further informed me that to alter the practice would make considerable trouble and confusion in the office. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that this appeal fails altogether.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. It is clearly laid down in the case of Foster v. Bates (12 M. & W. 226, at p. 233) that "the title of an administrator, though it does not exist until the grant of administration, relates back to the time of the death of an intestate; and that he may recover against a wrongdoer who has seized or converted the goods of the intestate after his death, in an action of trespass or trover." All the authorities on this subject were considered by the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Tharpe v. Stallwood (12 L. J. 241, C. P.), where an action of trespass was held to be maintainable. The reason for this relation back given by Rolfe C.J. in Long v. Hebb (Styles, 341) is, that otherwise there would be no remedy for the wrong done. That law, as laid down by Parke, B., is stated with reference to an action of trespass or trover with regard to goods. But in the case of Rex v. Inhabitants of Horsley (8 East, 405, at p. 410), Lord Ellenborough treats the law which was applicable to that case—which was a case of goods—as being applicable to the case of leasehold property passing to the administrator. Now, that being so, and regard being had to the terms in which the Land Transfer Act of 1897, sect. 1, is expressed—namely, that "Where real estate is vested in any person without a right in any other person to take by survivorship it shall, on his death, notwithstanding any testamentary disposition, devolve to and become vested in his personal representatives or representative from time to time as if it were a chattel real"—that is to say, a leasehold—"vesting in them or him"—I think that the substantial ground on which this appeal is based fails, and that the practice of the Probate Court ought not, after having been so long established, to be altered now.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Will—Construction—Limitations in strict settlement—Contingent remainders or executory devises—Failure for remoteness.

A will, dated in 1854, contained a series of limitations in strict settlement under which, on the death of A. without issue in 1891, B. became tenant for life in possession, with remainder to the plaintiff, his eldest son, an infant, as tenant in tail, with divers remainders over, including a remainder to C., the plaintiff's uncle, who was born in 1860, for life, with remainders over.

By a codicil, dated in 1868, the testator directed and declared that no devise of any of his real estates devised under or by virtue of his will should have a vested interest therein or be entitled to the possession of the same until the attainment of the age of twenty-four years, anything contained in his will or any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

The testator died in 1879.

Held, that, regard being had to the terms of the codicil, the limitations of the will took effect by way of executory devise and not by way of contingent remainder; and had failed for remoteness.

Decision of Farwell, J. affirmed.

WILLIAM BATTIE-WRIGHTSON by his will, dated the 28th July 1854, devised certain freehold estates to the use of his brother Arthur Bland Wrightson for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainders over in the like form in favour of his brother Richard Heber Wrightson and his first and other sons successively, with remainders in favour of the first and other sons of his brother Henry Wrightson successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder in favour of the first and other sons of his brother Thomas Barnardiston Wrightson successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder in favour of the first and every other son of Charles Edward Thomas and Georgiana Mary his wife successively according to seniority in tail male, with remainder to the first and every other daughter of Charles Edward Thomas and Georgiana Mary his wife successively according to seniority in tail male, with an ultimate remainder to the use of Richard Heber Wrightson in fee. And the testator declared that if any person whom he had thereby made tenant in tail male should be born in his lifetime or in due time after his decease, then and in every such case the estate in tail male thereby limited to that person should cease and in lieu thereof the testator devised the estates to the use of the person respectively whose estate in tail male should have so determined for the term of his or her life, and after his or her decease to the use of his or her first and every other son successively according to seniority in tail male.

By a second codicil to his will, dated the 14th Dec. 1868, the testator directed and declared that no devisee of any of his real estates devised under or by virtue of his will should have a vested interest therein or in any part thereof or be entitled to the possession of the same or any part thereof until the attainment of the age of twenty-four years, anything contained in his will or any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

The testator died on the 10th Feb. 1879.

An originating summons was taken out on behalf of Robert Cecil Battie-Wrightson, an infant (who claimed to be entitled as devisee, appointee, and legatee under the will and codicils of the testator) by Lord John Pakenham Joicey-Cecil, his next friend, for the determination (inter alia) of the following questions:

Whether upon the true construction of the will and second codicil the estate and interest of the plaintiff in the property to which the second codicil applied was (a) absolute; (b) vested, subject to being divested upon death under the age of twenty-four years; or (c) contingent upon attaining the age of twenty-four years.

If it be held that the estate and interest of the plaintiff was contingent as aforesaid, then whether such estate or interest failed upon the death of William Henry Battie-Wrightson, the plaintiff's father, in respect of any and what part of the property to which the second codicil applied as being (a) a contingent remainder not vesting upon the determination of the particular estate; (b) an executory limitation void for remoteness; or (c) on any other and what ground.

The summons was adjourned into court and came on to be heard before Farwell, J. on the 17th Dec. 1903, when the following judgment was delivered:—

FARWELL, J.—It is unfortunate that this testator, who had an excellent real property will drawn for him, should have added a codicil in the way that he has done. I do not see how the plaintiff can succeed on any view, for I am unable to adopt Mr. Levett's ingenious suggestion of indefeasibly vested. But the question that really arises is between Mr. Jenkins' client and Mr. Warmington's and Mr. Upjohn's clients that the will and codicil are to be read together. Now, under the will there are a series of limitations which undoubtedly are remainders to A. for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail, and so on. The codicil is in these terms: "This is a codicil made by me"—and so on—"to be annexed to my will and to be taken as part thereof, and I do hereby direct, prescribe, and declare that no devisee or appointee of any of my real estates devised and appointed under or by virtue of my said will shall have a vested interest therein or in any part thereof or be entitled to the possession of the same or any part thereof until the attainment of the age of twenty-four years anything contained in my said will or any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. And I do ratify and confirm my said will in every respect except where the same is hereby altered or revoked as aforesaid." I premise by saying that the question of perpetuity of course is laid aside altogether until I have construed the will. It is immaterial for the purpose of construing the will. Now, there is, no doubt, no rule which is better settled than that if limitations can take effect as remainders they are so to take effect, and are not to be turned into executory devises. On the other hand, if the testator has used words which show that he was not contemplating a contingent remainder, but an executory devise, effect must be given to that intention. And the question is whether he has shown such an intention here. In my opinion he has. The codicil expressly excludes from possession any person who would take under the will unless he has attained twenty-four when the period arrives. Now, a remainder is a thing which by its very nature must be ready to take possession on the determination of the preceding particular estate. The testator has in effect said: "By a will and codicil I have given to A. for life a particular estate, and, when that particular estate determines, the next estate is not to take possession and therefore is not to take effect as a remainder, but the next estate is to be one that is to go to a man if he attains twenty-four." That cannot take effect as a remainder. The mere mention of the necessity of possession, to my mind, excludes the contemplation of the possibility of it being given as a remainder. I think that the case comes exactly within the expression of Chitty, J. in Dean v. Dean (65 L. T. Rep. 65; (1891) 3 Ch. 150): "The testator has used such a form of gift as on the face of it is inapplicable to a remainder; and consequently the court is precluded from applying the rule that every gift which can take effect as a remainder must not be construed as an executory devise. The court cannot construe the gift as a remainder." It is said that this construction will produce curious results. Leaving out the question of perpetuity, it appears to me that it is much more likely to have given effect to the testator's intention that the persons whom he names first should receive his bounty rather than the persons he names later. Although those he has named first might not have attained the given age at his death, they can only do that if the gift is construed as an executory devise. In my opinion this reference to possession is sufficient to show, and in fact does necessarily show, that the testator has in effect stated that the limitations in his will are not to be remainders because they are not to take effect in possession on the determination of a particular estate, but are to remain in medio unless and until the donee shall have attained twenty-four. Of course, as regards the real estate in which the legal estate is outstanding, no question arises, so that in any case there is the extraordinary result, if I were to accede to Mr. Warmington's argument, that the estate would go in different fashions according as to whether the legal estate is outstanding in the realty and copyholds. But it goes now, subject to Mr. Bramwell Davis' argument, to Mr. Jenkins' client, who is claiming under the heir-at-law of the testator and as customary heir.

From that decision the plaintiff's uncle, the defendant Charles Freeman Thomas, now appealed.

Warmington, K.C. and Upjohn, K.C. (with them Cozens-Hardy) for the appellant.

Levett, K.C. and P. F. S. Stokes; Jenkins, K.C. and George Lawrence; Maugham; and Butcher, K.C. and F. L. Wright for the several respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 17.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

STIRLING, L.J.—[His Lordship stated the facts of the case as above set forth, and continued:] One of the questions raised in this action is as to the effect of the codicil on the limitations contained in the will of the testator. It was held by Farwell J. that, regard being had to the terms of the codicil, the limitations of the will took effect by way of executory devise and had failed for remoteness. From this decision an appeal has been brought, on the hearing of which two contentions were raised: (1) that the limitations ought to take effect as vested remainders liable to be divested in the event of the death of the devisee under twenty-four years of age; (2) that the limitations ought to be held to take effect as contingent remainders. As to the first contention, the law is thus stated by Best, L.C.J. in Duffield v. Duffield (3 Bli. N. S. 260, 331; 1 Dow. & Cl. 268, 311): "It has long been an established rule for the guidance of the courts of Westminster in construing devises that all estates are to be holden to be vested except estates in the devise of which a condition precedent to the vesting is so clearly expressed that the courts cannot treat them as vested without deciding in direct opposition to the terms of the will. If there be the least doubt, advantage is to be taken of the circumstance occasioning that doubt, and what seems to make a condition is holden to have only to have the effect of postponing the right of possession." In the present case it seems to me that the codicil expresses so clearly that the attainment of the age of twenty-four years is a condition precedent to the vesting, that the court cannot treat the limitations in the will as creating vested remainders without deciding in direct opposition to the terms of the codicil, which directs, not merely that no devisee is to have a vested interest in the estates until the attainment of the age of twenty-four years, but also directs that until that event the devisee must not be entitled to possession, a right to which a vested remainder, even if liable to be divested, would confer on the devisee upon the determination of the prior estates. As to the second contention, it is, no doubt, well settled that if a limitation can take effect as a contingent remainder it cannot operate as an executory devise. It is, however, laid down by Mr. Fearn (Contingent Remainders, pp. 398-9): "That notwithstanding the will may give a preceding estate of freehold capable in its own nature of supporting a contingent remainder; yet, if an ulterior limitation wants that connection with or relation to it which is requisite to constitute it a remainder, it may take effect as an executory devise if confined to the limits prescribed by law for estates of that future description." It has accordingly been held that, where it appears that the ulterior limitation is not intended to commence in all circumstances immediately on the expiration of that particular estate, it is incapable of taking effect as a remainder and may operate as an executory devise: (see Re Lechmere and Lloyd, 45 L. T. Rep. 551; 18 Ch. Div. 524; Dean v. Dean, 65 L. T. Rep. 65; (1891) 3 Ch. 150; Symes v. Symes, 73 L. T. Rep. 684; (1896) 1 Ch. 272). The question therefore is reduced to this, whether on the fair construction of the codicil the testator intended that the devises referred to in the codicil should in all cases take effect on the determination of the prior limitations. I think not. The limitations in the will are legal vested remainders. The meaning of the codicil appears to me to be that on the determination of any prior limitation in the will the succeeding limitation should not come into operation by way of entitling the devisee to possession unless and until the devisee attained the age of twenty-four years, but that, if he should attain that age, then he should enter into actual enjoyment of the estate intended for him. If, for example, an elder brother of the testator died leaving a son under twenty-four, I do not think the meaning was that he and the younger sons of that brother should be deprived of the estates and that these should pass to a son, who had attained twenty-four, of a younger brother of the testator; but that the limitation in favour of a son under twenty-four should not take effect in interest or in possession unless and until he attained twenty-four. Effect can be given to such a disposition only by way of executory devise. The case of Russell v. Buchanan (2 Cr. & M. 561; 6 Sim. 628) does not conflict with this decision, the language of the testator in the will there dealt with differing materially from that which is found in the codicil which gives rise to the present litigation. In my opinion, therefore, the decision of Farwell J. was right, and the appeal fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Farwell, J., who has held that the limitations of the testator's real estates under which the plaintiff claims failed upon the death of William Henry Battie-Wrightson as being executory devises void for remoteness, and that the real estates accordingly passed to the testator's heir-at-law. Under the will dated in 1854 there are a series of limitations in strict settlement under which on the death without issue in 1891 of Richard Heber Wrightson the said William Henry Battie-Wrightson, who died in 1903, became tenant for life in possession, with remainder to the plaintiff, his eldest son, an infant, as tenant in tail male, with divers remainders over, including a remainder to Charles Freeman Thomas, the plaintiff's uncle, who was born in 1860, for life, with remainders over. There is no question of construction on the limitations of this skilfully-drawn will. But the testator made a second codicil in 1868 which creates all the trouble. [His Lordship read the codicil, and continued:] The question which arises for our consideration is what is the effect of the will and second codicil taken together, and for this purpose the rule against perpetuities or the doctrine of remoteness must be put aside. (1) On the part of the plaintiff it is urged that there is nothing in the codicil sufficiently explicit to cut down the clear vested estate tail created by the will, and that the words referring to "a vested interest" only mean that the plaintiff's interest is not to be absolute and indefeasible until he attains twenty-four, or, in other words, that his estate tail is liable to be defeated by a condition subsequent in the event of death under twenty-four. This view might, perhaps, have been taken had not there been the subsequent words which direct that the plaintiff is neither to have a vested interest nor to be "entitled to the possession." Under those circumstances I feel driven to give to the words "a vested interest" their proper technical meaning. It is further urged on the part of the plaintiff that the codicil is void for uncertainty, or at least is so difficult to construe and so inconsistent with the general scheme of the will that it ought to be disregarded. This argument has tempted me, but I cannot see my way to adopt it. I hold, therefore, that the plaintiff cannot succeed under the limitations of the will because he was not twenty-four at his father's death, or under the codicil, assuming it to operate by way of executory devise, because of remoteness. (2) On the part of the defendant Charles Freeman Thomas it is urged that the effect of the codicil was simply to make the remainders under the will contingent remainders, and that, as the plaintiff was not twenty-four when the particular estate of his father's determined, the plaintiff's contingent remainder failed, and that the estate of the defendant Charles Freeman Thomas was the first estate ready to arise and take effect in remainder at the moment of the determination of the particular estate. The general and well-established rule that where limitations can take effect as remainders they are not to be treated as executory devises is strongly relied upon. And, while admitting that recent authorities have held that this rule is not absolute and may yield to words clearly indicating an intention to the contrary, it is argued that no such words are to be found in the present case, and that mere negative words ought not to be regarded as equivalent to positive words of disposition. (3) But on the part of the heir-at-law it is urged that the codicil shows a plain intention to dispose of the property in a manner inconsistent with contingent remainders, and necessarily involving the creation of executory devises. The codicil deals with every kind of estate, with life estates as well as with estates tail, and with estates in possession as well as with estates in remainder. It says, in effect, that the plaintiff, whose father is dead, shall not be entitled to possession until he attains twenty-four—a provision which is inconsistent with the idea of a legal remainder which must take effect on the father's death. The codicil contemplates a possible gap between the death of the tenant for life and the attainment of twenty-four, and that involves a disposition taking effect by way of executory devise, and not by way of contingent remainder. In support of this contention, the decision of Sir George Jessel in Re Lechmere and Lloyd (45 L. T. Rep. 551; 18 Ch. Div. 524), of Kay, J. in Miles v. Jarvis (49 L. T. Rep. 162; 24 Ch. Div. 633), and of Chitty, J. in Dean v. Dean (65 L. T. Rep. 65; (1891) 3 Ch. 150) are relied upon as having relaxed the stringency of the old rule. Farwell, J. has adopted this view and decided in favour of the heir-at-law, and I do not see my way to differ.

WILSON v. TWAMLEY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Breach of covenant—Covenant not to "do or suffer to be done" an act—Act done by sublessee—Liability of lessee.

The lease of a licensed public-house contained a covenant by the lessee, for himself and his assigns, that he would not do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licence might be forfeited or indorsed, or the renewal withheld.

The defendant, who was the assignee of the lease, sublet the premises by a lease which contained covenants similar to those in the superior lease.

The sublessee was convicted of an offence against the licensing laws committed on the premises and the licence was indorsed, in consequence whereof the renewal of the licence was subsequently refused.

Held (affirming the judgment of Kennedy, J.), that the defendant had not, within the meaning of the covenant, done or suffered to be done the act whereby the licence was lost, and that he was not liable in damages for breach of the covenant in an action brought by the lessor.

APPEAL of the plaintiff from the judgment of Kennedy, J. at the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant damages for breach of a covenant contained in the lease of a public-house.

By a lease dated the 29th Aug. 1892, Henry Wilson, thereafter called the lessor, demised to Edward Earnie, thereafter called the lessee, a public-house for the term of thirty-five years at the yearly rent of 80*l*.

The lease contained a covenant by the lessee, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he would use the premises as a public-house or beer-shop only, and that he would carry on and suffer on the premises, or any part thereof, no other trade, business, or manufacture, during the term, without the previous consent in writing of the lessor, and particularly would not do or suffer to be done on the premises, or any part thereof, any acts whereby the licence necessary for using the premises as an inn, beer-house, or public-house with billiards, as then used, might be forfeited or indorsed, or the renewal withheld, and would at all times take proper legal steps and proceedings and endeavour to procure a renewal of the necessary licences for so using the premises.

On the 5th Dec. 1892 the lessee, with the consent of the lessor, assigned all his interest in the lease to the defendant, who thereafter duly paid the rent of the premises.

Henry Wilson died in 1894, and the reversion expectant upon the lease of the premises became absolutely vested in the plaintiff.

The defendant sublet the premises to Kingston by a lease which contained covenants to the same effect as those contained in the lease of the 29th Aug. 1892.

On the 7th Dec. 1901 Kingston was convicted of the offence, under sect. 13 of the Licensing Act 1872, of serving a drunken man upon the premises, and the licence was indorsed.

In consequence of that conviction the licensing justices, at the ensuing annual general licensing sessions, refused to grant a renewal of the licence, and the premises afterwards remained unlicensed.

Kingston continued to reside upon the premises for some time after the licence expired.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from the defendant for breach of the above covenant, whereby the licence was indorsed and the renewal thereof refused.

The action was tried before Kennedy, J. with a jury. The jury assessed the damages at 150*l*. The learned judge held that the defendant had not suffered to be done the act whereby the licence was lost, within the meaning of the covenant, and gave judgment in favour of the defendant (88 L. T. Rep. 803).

The plaintiff appealed.

English Harrison, K.C. and C. Herbert Smith for the appellant.—The decision of the learned judge was wrong. Upon the true construction of this lease there is an absolute covenant by the lessee that no act will be done upon the premises by any person whom he has permitted to occupy the premises whereby the licence may be lost. The assignee is responsible for the acts done by his tenant. The case of Bryant v. Hancock (78 L. T. Rep. 397; 81 L. T. Rep. 96; (1898) 1 Q. B. 716; (1899) A. C. 442), upon which the learned judge relied in the court below, is clearly distinguishable from the present case. In that case the covenant was that the lessee would not "wilfully do or suffer any act"; and the decision simply turned upon the use of the word "wilfully." The covenant in the present case is wider in its terms, and is not qualified by the word "wilfully." In this case the intention of the parties to be gathered from all the provisions of the lease clearly is that the licence is to be protected from danger through any act of the person who may be carrying on the business on the demised premises. The contention of the defendant amounts to this, that under this lease a sub-lessee may commit any acts which endanger the licence and the lessor has no remedy. The defendant is the assignee of the lease, and he cannot relieve himself from liability under this covenant by saying that the person whom he has put into possession of the premises has done the act which caused the loss of the licence.

R. M. Bray, K.C. and F. Russell for the respondent.—The judgment of the learned judge was right. The question is whether this covenant is an absolute or qualified covenant. It is clearly a qualified covenant, and is within the decision in Bryant v. Hancock (ubi sup.) It is true that in that case the covenant was more qualified than the covenant in the present case; but still this covenant is qualified, for it is not a covenant that no act shall be done, but only that the lessee will not permit or suffer an act to be done. The lessee covenants for himself and his assigns that he will not do any act by which the licence will be lost; then, that he will not suffer any such act to be done, and those words do not mean that he covenants that no act shall be done. The lessee does not permit or suffer an act to be done merely because his sublessee does the act. A lessee is not responsible for the acts of his sublessee unless he has expressly so covenanted. The Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94) contains, in sect. 17, provisions whereby any licensed person who "suffers" any gaming to be carried on upon the premises, or "suffers" his house to be opened or kept or used in contravention of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, is made liable to a penalty. Under that Act it has been held that where gaming is carried on with the knowledge of the servant of the licensee, but without the knowledge of the licensee himself, the licensee does "suffer" gaming to be carried on, because the prohibition is absolute, and the licensee is responsible for the acts of his servant:

Bosley v. Davies, 33 L. T. Rep. 528; 1 Q. B. Div. 84.

There is a great distinction between acts done by a servant and acts done by an underlessee. A man may well be said to permit or suffer to be done the acts which his servant does, but not the acts of his underlessee. By merely putting a tenant in possession of premises the landlord cannot properly be said to permit or suffer the acts which his tenant does:

Bryant v. Hancock (ubi sup.).

In Toleman v. Portbury (22 L. T. Rep. 33;

CT. OF APP.]

WILSON v. TWANLEY.

[CT. OF APP.]

L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 288) it was held that a lessee had not broken a covenant not to "permit" a sale by auction upon the premises because his sublessee had permitted an auction. There can be no distinction between the words "permit" and "suffer," and that decision is absolutely in point.

English Harrison, K.C. replied.

COLLINS, M R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J. upon the construction of a covenant contained in a lease, the action having been brought to recover damages for breach of covenant. The lease in question was a lease of a public-house. This action was brought by the lessor against the assignee of the lease for breach of a covenant in these terms: "And will use the said premises as a public-house or beer-house only, and will carry on or suffer on the said premises, or any part thereof, no other trade, business, or manufacture during the said term, without the previous consent in writing of the lessor, and will not do or permit to be done on the said premises, or any part thereof, any act or thing which may be a nuisance or annoyance to the lessor or adjoining occupiers, or use the said premises for any immoral purpose . . . and particularly will not do or suffer to be done on the said premises or any part thereof any act whereby the licences necessary for using the said messuage and premises as an inn, beerhouse, or public-house with billiards, as now used, may be forfeited or indorsed or the renewal withheld, and will at all times take proper legal steps and proceedings and endeavour to procure a renewal of the necessary licences for so using the same." The defendant, being the assignee of the term, sublet to another person and, during the tenure of the sublessee, an offence against the Licensing Acts was committed by the serving of intoxicating liquor to a person who was drunk, and thereupon the renewal of the licence was refused at the next annual general licensing meeting. Upon those facts the lessor has brought this action for damages for breach of the covenant. Kennedy, J. has held that, having regard to the terms of the covenant and the particular act which was alleged to be a breach of the covenant, there was not shown to have been a breach of the covenant. The learned judge held that, the assignee having let the premises to another person, there was not any connection of agency between him and the sublessee, but that the sublessee was an independent tenant, and was in no sense the agent of the assignee, and that therefore, even if the sublessee had suffered to be done an act which was a breach of the licensing laws and endangered the licence, that act was not the act of the assignee; and that unless it could be shown that, under the terms of this covenant, the assignee either did or suffered to be done on the premises the act in question, which caused the licence to be lost, he is not liable under the covenant. It is now contended that that decision was wrong. Both the appellant and the respondent rely upon a decision of this court in a case which went to the House of Lords—Bryant v. Hancock (78 L. T. Rep. 397; 81 L. T. Rep. 96; (1898) 1 Q. B. 716; (1899) A. C. 442). That case was to a large extent the basis of the decision of Kennedy, J., but the appellant relies upon it as an authority in his favour. It is always, in my opinion, dangerous to try to construe one covenant by reference to a decision upon another covenant. But when I come to consider the decision in Bryant v. Hancock (ubi sup.), I think that it does not touch this case at all. In that case there was a covenant, the first part of which was unquestionably absolute, and was held by the court to be absolute. Another part of the covenant was qualified by the introduction of the word "wilfully," and, prima facie, the matter which had to be done "wilfully" in order to constitute a breach of covenant might really cover the earlier part of the covenant, and, if there had not been the qualification of "wilfully" introduced, the act complained of might have come within either part of the covenant. The difficulty in the case was to determine whether the act complained of ought to be taken to come within the first part of the covenant, which was wide enough to include it, and was not in any way qualified; but the court held that, in view of the fact that the covenant was divided into two paragraphs, and that what apparently might be the same matter might be within the terms of both paragraphs, in order to give effect to the qualification the application of the qualified part must be limited to a special class of offences or breach of which the act complained of must be taken to be one. That is why great stress was laid in that case upon the word "wilfully," in order to see whether an act which might fall within the first or unqualified part of the covenant ought in that particular case to be held to come within the qualified part only so as to give a fair meaning to both parts of the covenant. Therefore stress was laid upon the fact that the covenant was intended to be in part qualified. That explanation of that case shows, I think, that it cannot have any special bearing upon the present case. It has been contended that, stress having been laid upon the word "wilfully" in Bryant v. Hancock (ubi sup.), the decision would have been different but for the use of that word, and that as that word does not occur in the present case, the lessee in this case must be held liable for breach of the covenant. I think, however, that the presence or absence of that word is really immaterial in the case of this particular covenant. If, in the present case, the assignee instead of letting the premises to a subtenant had put in a manager, then it seems to me that he would have come within the terms of the covenant. The assignee would then have substituted another person for himself, and he could not have avoided liability by saying that, although that other person had done or suffered to be done the act complained of, he was not responsible. He would then have placed his alter ego in the premises, and must have taken the risk of that person not conforming to the terms of the covenant. He has not, however, done that, but has sublet the premises. There was not, therefore, that connection between him and the delinquent, and the offence was not his offence; and he cannot be made liable under the terms of the covenant unless he has done or suffered to be done on the premises an act of the nature described in the covenant. In my opinion that is prima facie the meaning of the words "do or suffer to be done." The word "suffer" involves some action or abstention from action on the part of the particular person who is said to suffer a thing to be done although he does not do it himself. I think that the question also rests upon authority. In the case of Toleman v. Port- bury (22 L. T. Rep. 33; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 288), which has been cited as a decision upon the point, a lessee covenanted not to permit an auction to take place upon the premises; he sublet the premises to a person who held an auction upon the premises; thereupon proceedings to enforce a forfeiture were taken against the lessee upon the ground that he had permitted an auction to be held upon the premises. The defence, which was held to be good by a large majority of the judges, was that it was not the act of the lessee when the sublessee caused an auction to be held upon the premises, and that the act of the sublessee was not the act of the lessee; that the sublessee was not the agent of the lessee, and that therefore the auction held by the sublessee was not an auction permitted by the lessee. It seems to me that the same reasoning applies in the present case, and that the act of the sub-tenant in permitting the act to be done was not the act of the assignee. Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the decision of Kennedy, J. was right, and that this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I will first deal with the suggestion made on behalf of the appellant that he is entitled to succeed because there has been a breach of the covenant that the premises shall be used as a beerhouse or public-house only. Now, to my mind it is clear that that covenant is not an absolute covenant on the part of the lessee that the public-house shall always during the continuance of the term remain licensed, or a covenant by which the lessee takes upon himself the obligation that the licence shall not be forfeited and shall always be renewed. Take, for example, the case where, through no fault of the lessee and through no breach of the covenant, but for other reasons—as, for instance, because there are too many public-houses in the neighbourhood—the licence is not renewed, and thereby damage is caused to the lessor. Could it be said that under this covenant the lessee would be liable for that damage? To my mind it is clear that that could not be said. The covenant is clearly aimed at the use of the premises during the term as a public-house only, and not for the purpose of any other trade or business. In my opinion, there would not be any breach of the covenant by the lessee remaining in the premises without doing more after it turned out that the licence would not be renewed. That point, however, has not been raised or dealt with in the action. Even if it had been, and if there had been a breach of that covenant, it appears to me that there would not have been any damage resulting to the plaintiff, because the continuance to reside in the premises after the licence had been lost would not make the lessee liable for loss accruing through the non-renewal of the licence. Therefore it is clear that the appellant's case cannot succeed upon that ground. Now I will pass on to the main point in this appeal, which is whether there has been a breach by the assignee of the covenant not to do or suffer to be done on the premises any act whereby the licence may be forfeited or indorsed, or the renewal thereof withheld. It is to be observed with regard to this covenant that it certainly is not an absolute covenant that no such act shall be committed; it is a limited covenant which is limited in two ways.

In the first place, it is limited as a covenant on behalf of the lessee, his executors, administrators, or assigns. I will pause here to consider this first limitation. The word "assigns" has a clear, definite legal meaning, and it does not include underlessees. I do not know of any benevolent rule of construction to be applied to covenants in leases which will justify the court in giving to the word "assigns" a more extended meaning so as to include underlessees. Certainly that cannot be done unless there is something in the lease which renders it necessary to do so. In the present case it is clear that the meaning of the word "assigns" ought not to be extended, for this reason, among others, that the lease contemplates underletting. The only provision in the lease with reference to underletting is that it shall not be effected without the consent in writing of the lessor; but it is also provided that that consent shall not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a responsible tenant. Underletting is naturally contemplated in this lease, because otherwise a public-house like this cannot be carried on. It is not, as a rule, carried on by the lessee, but by an undertenant. Therefore in this case it is clear that it would be impossible to say that the word "assigns" in this covenant includes underlessees. It is also clear that this covenant is limited in another respect. The covenant is not, on behalf of the assigns, that such an act shall not be done; it is only a covenant that the executors, administrators, or assigns will not do or suffer to be done such an act upon the premises. A man may do an act himself or by his agent or servant; but he certainly cannot do it by an undertenant unless he has authorised the undertenant to do it. It cannot be suggested that in this case the undertenant was authorised to do the act complained of and that therefore there has been a breach of the covenant. The act which the defendant is said to have suffered to be done upon the premises was that the undertenant, by his servant, permitted a drunken man to be served. Did the defendant "suffer" that act to be done. It seems to me that, looking at the circumstances, he clearly did not "suffer" that act to be done. That being so, the plaintiff cannot succeed on that part of the covenant. It only remains for me to make a few observations with respect to the last point taken on behalf of the appellant. It was said that the undertenant was let into possession without the consent of the lessor, but that was really neither alleged nor proved. Even if it had been, the underlessee would still have been the underlessee. It could not be said that, even if there was a breach of covenant by not obtaining the consent of the lessor, that fact turned the underlessee into an agent or servant. Nor, as Kennedy, J. held, could it be said that there was any estoppel which prevented the defendant from saying that as a matter of fact this man was an undertenant and was not his manager, servant, or agent. This last point in no way assists the appellant. I agree that the judgment of Kennedy, J. was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the appellant cannot rely upon that part of the covenant which prohibits the use of the premises for any other purpose than that of a public-house. The covenant, when it is examined, goes on to point out what is the meaning of that

POLLEY v. FORDHAM.

[K.B. Div.]

prohibition, because the obligation is not to carry on any other trade on the premises. It cannot be said in this case that some other trade has been carried on upon the premises because the house, as a consequence of the loss of the licence, has lost any character except that of a dwelling-house. The next point raised was that there was something in the nature of an estoppel because the plaintiff had no knowledge of the underlease, and the undertenant was in truth only a manager, the house being a tied house. But it clearly appeared that there was a properly created undertenancy, and that the person who was let into possession was not put into the premises as a manager for the defendant. There is no ground, therefore, for saying that this case differed from a case in which the consent of the lessor to an underlease had been given. How can it be said, when an undertenancy was created, that the defendant suffered to be done the act of the undertenant? The effect of the underletting was that the complete control of the premises passed into the hands of the undertenant, and it must have been known, when the underletting of the premises was contemplated in the lease, that the underlessee would have no power to supervise what was done upon the premises by the undertenant. If the consent of the lessor was obtained, it seems to me that it might just as well be said that the lessor suffered the act to be done as that the lessee suffered it to be done. The judgment of the learned judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Friday, April 15.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ.)

POLLEY v. FORDHAM. (a)

Action against justice—Issue of distress warrant—Limitation of action—Time of conviction or distress—Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

In February the defendant, who was a magistrate, convicted the plaintiff of an alleged offence against the Vaccination Acts, and in April the plaintiff having failed to pay the fine inflicted the defendant issued a warrant of distress, which was executed against the plaintiff's goods.

In an action for illegal distress:

Held, that the limitation imposed by sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 ran from the date of the issue of the warrant of distress and not from the date of the conviction.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Smyly, sitting at the Shoreditch County Court.

The plaintiff was on the 11th Feb. 1903 convicted by Mr. Fordham, a metropolitan magistrate, for neglecting to have two of his children vaccinated, and was fined 1l. and 16s. costs in each case.

The plaintiff having failed to pay the fines,

Mr. Fordham, on the 11th April 1903, issued a warrant of distress against the plaintiff's goods.

On the 17th April 1903 a distress was put in on the plaintiff's premises, and was paid out by the plaintiff under protest on the 29th April.

On the 8th July 1903 a divisional court made an order absolute quashing the convictions against the plaintiff on the ground that, the children being eighteen months of age, the plaintiff had been improperly convicted.

On the 26th Aug. 1903 the plaintiff issued his summons in the County Court against Mr. Fordham, claiming damages for illegal distress.

It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the action was out of time, and that the defendant was protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893.

The learned County Court judge held that the plaintiff's action was barred by sect. 1, subsect. (a), of that Act, as the injury was suffered by the plaintiff from the conviction on the 11th Feb., more than six months before action brought, and he entered judgment for the defendant.

By the Justices Protection Act 1848 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xlv.), s. 3:

And be it enacted, that where a conviction or order shall be made by one or more justice or justices of the peace and a warrant of distress or of commitment shall be granted thereon by some other justice of the peace bona fide and without collusion no action shall be brought against the justice who so granted such warrant by reason of any defect in such conviction or order or for any want of jurisdiction in the justice or justices who made the same, but the action (if any) shall be brought against the justice or justices who made such conviction or order.

Kingsbury for the appellant.—The conviction and the distress were separate acts. The learned County Court judge held that they were absolutely connected, and that they were bound to date from the conviction. He referred to Justices Protection Act 1848 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xlv.), ss. 2 and 3.

The conviction stands by itself, and the distress is not a necessary consequence of that conviction. We could not proceed for the distress until the conviction was quashed, that is clear from sect. 2 of the Justices Protection Act 1848. The action is brought, and the time runs from the wrong done, which is the putting in of the distress. He also referred to

Sects. 6 and 8 of the Justices Protection Act 1848;

Carey v. Bermondsey Borough Council, 67 J. P. 447;

Brittain v. Kinnaird, 1 Brod. & Bing. 432; 21 E. R. 680.

Robertson for the respondent.—The whole point is simply whether these two things, the conviction and the distress warrant, were separate or the same; that is to say, whether the distress warrant dates back to the date of the conviction for the purpose of the limitation. In other words, whether the distress warrant can be regarded as a separate act or merely an aggravation of damages, and whether the magistrate, having issued his conviction, did anything else so as to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations. The conviction states "and in default of payment it is adjudged that the sums due under this adjudication be levied by distress and sale of the defendant's goods." That is to say, as far as the conviction goes it provides for distress, and, having convicted in that form, the magistrate, as far as an action against him is concerned, has done everything for which he is liable in an action. The mere fact that later on a distress warrant is ministerially issued by him makes no difference. Sect. 3 of the Justices Protection Act 1848 is in my favour, and it shows that, where there are two justices concerned, the one who convicts and the other who issues the distress warrant, the action is brought against the justice who convicts. Sect. 13 of that Act regards the levying of the distress as part of the damages and not as the substantive cause of action against the justice. Here, too, the levying of the distress ought to be treated as part of the damages which can be recovered by an action on the conviction, and not as a substantive or separate distress.

SMYTH (app.) v. STRETTON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I express no opinion as to whether this action can be maintained or as to whether there is a defence to it. The only point before us is whether the County Court judge was right in applying this Statute of Limitations to this alleged right of action, so as to bar the proceedings, and whether in fact he has rightly declined to entertain the action upon the ground of the lapse of six months. I think we have only got to construe for this purpose sub-sect. (a) of sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, which was a new enactment with a statutory limitation, and must be construed strictly. That says: "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect: (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of." The act complained of here was not the conviction. The act complained of here was the trespass to the plaintiff's premises by the levying of the distress. So far as it has any bearing on the case, sect. 3 of the Justices Protection Act 1848 does not seem to me to have anything to do with the question of time. Sect. 3 is for the purpose of protecting a justice who has issued a warrant upon a conviction which was apparently legal, and then subsequently it turns out that he ought not to have issued that warrant, and then an action is brought against the justice who made the original order. In this case I think where the action is for trespass and there is a plea of justification under a distress warrant, it requires the usual strict enactment with regard to a statutory limitation to say that that period is to run not from the date of the real cause of action, the entry, but from some time date anterior, which is supposed to give the authority for the proceeding under which the entry was made. It may be that there are enactments to which Mr. Robertson has referred, which enable you to claim as damages if you have got a cause of action matters of aggravation in respect of subsequent acts done.

That is quite possible, but I am unable myself to see any statute which enables us to say that the right of action for wrongful entry has been taken away because brought too late if the action is commenced within six months of the act which is alleged to be wrong. I think if it was intended to ante-date the period of limitation to an earlier date, there must be clear and distinct language to that effect. Whatever may be the result of this action when it comes to be heard, I think the case must go back to the County Court judge to entertain.

WILLS, J.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. It seems to me the act complained of is the distress, and nothing else. No such thing was ever heard of as an action for making an order against a person without jurisdiction. If the order is not followed by consequences against the individual it comes to nothing. One used to be in former days very familiar indeed with matters of this kind. I do not know how many declarations I have drawn in my old pleading days for levies of one sort and another—complaints that people had been distrained upon against whom there was no right of distress or to enforce consequences of a similar nature, but such actions were always actions of trespass, and nothing else. The complaint used to be that the defendant had wrongfully entered the house or premises of the plaintiff and had done so and so. Then any question which arose about the warrant, the conviction, or order on which the erroneous proceedings by way of distress and entry were founded was raised on a defence setting up that it was justified because of the warrant and the conviction or order on which the warrant was founded. But the action itself was not for erroneous exercise of jurisdiction, but was for making a distress and breaking and entering a man's premises where there was no right to do so.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Revenue—Income tax—Master at school—Provident fund scheme—Additional allowance—Allowance to go to fund—Income Tax Act 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, sched. E.

Under a provident fund scheme at D. College the following increases of salaries came into operation: (a) Assistant masters having not less than five, but less than fifteen years' service, an increase of 5 per cent.; (b) those having fifteen years' and over, 7½ per cent.; (c) a further addition equal to those sums subject to certain conditions.

The whole of these increases were not to be paid to the masters, but were to be accumulated at compound interest to form the fund.

The conditions above referred to were that masters of less than ten years' service who resigned or ceased to belong to the college from any other cause than ill-health were to be entitled to increase

(a) and the accumulations thereof, but not to increase (c); if the master retired from ill-health, the governors in addition to (a) might grant him (c); and in the event of death both (a) and (c) were to be paid to his legal representative. Masters of over ten years' service were to receive on retirement before the age of sixty the total sum due under (a) or (b) and (c) with accumulations, and in the case of death the same was to be paid to his legal representative. Masters removed for misconduct or, having been guilty of misconduct, allowed to resign were not entitled to (c).

Held, that these increases of salary were sums really added to the salary, and were assessable to income tax under sect. 146, sched. E, of the Income Tax Act 1842.

CASE stated by the Income Tax Commissioners for the division of East Brixton.

The respondent, one of the assistant masters of Dulwich College, appealed against an assessment made upon him under sched. E of the Income Tax Acts in the sum of 385*l.* in respect of his emoluments as assistant master received from the governors of Dulwich College for the year ended the 5th April 1901, on the ground that the assessment included 35*l.* not liable to taxation, being the amount placed to his credit by the governors under the provident fund scheme for the year 1900.

The material parts of the scheme in question were as follows:—

As to the present assistant masters:

1. That the following increase of salaries shall be granted from the date on which the scheme comes into operation, subject to the conditions hereinafter mentioned: (a) Assistant masters having not less than five years' but less than fifteen years' service, an increase of 5 per cent.; (b) assistant masters having not less than fifteen years' service and over, an increase of 7½ per cent.; (c) a further addition, equal in amount to the above sums, shall be granted from the same date to the assistant masters alluded to in (a) and (b), such addition being, however, subject to the conditions provided by par. 5; (d) assistant masters not having fifteen years' service shall, on reaching that period, be eligible for the increase sanctioned by (b) and (c); (e) in the case of the few present assistant masters of advanced age, it shall be open to the governors to grant the maximum increase alluded to in (b) and (c).

As to future assistant masters:

2. That future assistant masters shall in like manner, on attaining five years' service from the date of their appointment, be entitled to the increase of 5 per cent. as in clause 1 (a), and to the additional increase of 5 per cent. as in clause 1 (c), but shall not be entitled to any further increase.

As to all assistant masters:

3. That all assistant masters shall be required to become members of the fund at the expiration of five years from the date of their respective appointments.

4. That the whole of the above increases of salary shall not be paid to the masters, but shall be retained by the governors and accumulated at compound interest for the purpose of forming the said provident fund, but subject to the provisions hereinafter contained.

5. That assistant masters having less than ten years' service who may resign their appointments, or from any other cause than ill-health cease to belong to the college, shall be entitled to receive the total increase sanctioned by (a) and the accumulations thereof, but shall not receive the additional increase sanctioned by (c) or the accumulations thereof. In the event of any such assistant master retiring from ill-health, the governors, in addition to the increase sanctioned by (a), may grant him the further 5 per cent. sanctioned by (c), and the accumulations thereof. In the event of death of any such assistant master whilst in the service of the college, the 5 per cent. due by (c) as well as under (a), with the accumulations thereof, shall be paid to his legal representative.

6. That assistant masters who shall have served ten years or upwards, and who may retire before the age of sixty from any other cause than misconduct, shall receive the total sum due to them respectively under (a) or (b) and (c), and the accumulations thereof. In the event of death before the age of sixty whilst in the service of the college, the full amount credited the assistant master in the fund books shall be paid to his legal representative.

7. That assistant masters who shall at any time be removed for misconduct, or having been guilty of misconduct may be allowed to resign—such misconduct not being certified to by the master of the college—shall not receive the additional increase sanctioned by (c) or the accumulations thereof.

The appellant contended (1) that he had no actual enjoyment of the sum of 35*l.*, it being in the nature of a bonus at the end of his career as a master at the college, and that he could not raise any money on the sum; (2) that with respect to a moiety of the sum it was uncertain whether it would ever be received, as under paragraph (c) of the scheme power was reserved by the governors to refuse such part of the grant—in other words, that the moiety was contingent, not vested in character, and therefore could not be described as income in any way.

It was also argued that the sums credited under the scheme did not form the subject of agreement when the appellant entered the employ of the governors, or of any subsequent agreement, and that it was open to question whether they were legally recoverable.

In support of the assessment the Crown surveyor quoted the charging words under sched. E of the Income Tax Act 1842, s. 146, whereby all emoluments "accruing by reason of such offices" are made liable to assessment, and contended that the whole amount credited was practically an addition to the annual income, performing the function of a payment to a superannuation fund, and thus relieving the appellant from the necessity of making similar provision out of the salary actually paid to him during the year in question; that the possibility of forfeiture was too remote to affect the question, and that the scheme did not comply with the conditions laid down for deduction in the way of life insurance premiums by sect. 54 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, as amended.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sum of 35*l.* was not liable to taxation, and reduced the assessment accordingly from 385*l.* to 350*l.*

The Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and S. A. T. Rowlatt for the appellant.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Ellis J. Griffith for the respondent.

April 19.—CHANNELL, J.—This case was argued before me yesterday, and I think it better for me to give judgment in it whilst the matter is fresh in my mind, though I cannot say that I am altogether satisfied with the decision that I am about to come to. It seems to me to depend upon this: There is a scheme established by the governors of Dulwich College, and the question is whether the true effect of that scheme is to increase the salaries of the assistant masters, imposing at the same time an obligation upon them to deal with a portion of the increased salaries in a certain way, or whether the true effect of the scheme, when you look at the substance of it, is not really to increase the salaries, but to give to the masters upon their ceasing to hold the position of assistant masters gratuities or allowances. I do not use the word "gratuities" in the sense that there is no consideration for it, because the services of the masters during the time that they serve, after the arrangement is made, are no doubt consideration for it, but retiring bonuses, or something of that kind, when they cease. If that is the true effect of the scheme, then I do not think it becomes salary for the purposes of taxation, and, on the whole, I agree with what Mr. Danckwerts says, that you must look at the substance of it and not the words. But, at the same time, I do not say that you must disregard the words, because the fact is, as I think it is in this case, that the objects of the scheme could have been carried out in two different ways. It could have been done either by increasing the salaries and saying: "If we increase your salaries you must devote a certain portion of them to certain purposes," or it could have been carried out by giving them retiring bonuses. Then, if you are left in doubt as to which of those two ways the governing body have in fact carried it out, I do not think you can do otherwise than look at the words they use, to see if they really understood the words that they were using. Now, in this case this scheme deals with two different percentages of 5 per cent. each; there is another of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., which does not apply to this particular master, but stands on precisely the same footing as the first 5 per cent. that we have to deal with and we may leave that out. There are two percentages of 5 per cent. under clause (a) and clause (c) in the first section of the scheme. They are substantially different in my opinion. They both come under the same words as to the increase of salary, and each party is entitled to draw an argument, and each party has drawn an argument from the fact that they are lumped together. The Solicitor-General and Mr. Rowlatt say that (a) is quite clearly in their favour, and therefore that I must come to the conclusion that the entirety is an increase of salary. On the other hand, Mr. Danckwerts says that (c) is quite clearly in his favour, and it is not a sum which the assistant masters ever get at all except as a matter of discretion and bounty, and that therefore I must take it as that is heaped together with it, that neither (a) nor (c) are increases of salary. That prevents me from getting much benefit from either argument; they must be set-off against one another, and one has to look at what the real substance of the thing is. In this case I have to deal with a decision which certainly is very much in point, and that is the decision of Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble (88 L. T. Rep. 186; (1903) 1 K. B. 517). That establishes, if authority were wanted (I think for the main proposition authority clearly existed before) that a sum recoverable by way of salary or wages is not the less salary or wages taxable because for some reason or other the person who receives it has not got the full right to apply it just as he likes. The fact that income which is income but which has even by operation of some statute to be devoted compulsorily to some purpose or another does not prevent it being income. That is decided, of course, by one of the various Mersey Docks cases—namely, Mersey Docks v. Lucas (49 L. T. Rep. 781; 8 Ap. Cas. 891). But this case of Bell v. Gribble goes a little further. There is the case dealt with by Mathew, L.J.: "Suppose in the case of a marriage settlement a man agrees to set apart out of his salary at his office so much every year by way of investment. According to Mr. Asquith's argument that would not be income, but really it is clear in each of the cases I have mentioned the payment is purely voluntary, and is of the same character as a payment made by a thrifty man who out of his salary reserves so much every year for old age or for contingencies." Now, the case is quite clear where a man has a salary from his office, which is what the Lord Justice puts, and by agreement with somebody else, I presume his father-in-law, has bound himself to set apart a certain portion of that salary year by year, and save it and invest it for the benefit of his wife and children. That case is quite clear; it still is income, although he has contracted with somebody else to employ it in a particular way, and to save it; but the decision in Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble goes beyond that, because it applies the same rule to a case where the money comes from the person with whom the contract is made to apply it in a particular way. In Bell v. Gribble it was a case of an Act of Parliament of the city of Manchester enabling them to establish this provident fund for their servants, but it was dealt with as a case of contract, and was a case of contract, of course; the statute was merely the authority of the corporation to contract, and the servants who became servants, and who need not have become servants, were dealt with as contracting with the corporation upon those terms. It is an extension of the illustration Mathew, L.J. was giving, because there is a substantial difference between a sum placed out of the disposal of the person who is being dealt with as having got the enjoyment of it, if it is placed out of his disposal by a contract with the person from whom he gets it. There is a distinction between that and his getting it from one source and contracting with another person to deal with it in a certain manner. I think it is a substantial difference. I may illustrate it by what I think is a pretty well known illustration relating to a technical subject, though not of use beyond an illustration, and that is the law in reference to bills of sale. If a borrower is getting from a lender an advance on a bill of sale it is legitimate to treat the entire sum purporting to be advanced as now advanced notwithstanding that there are some deductions made from that sum for the purpose of paying sums which the borrower is by some other existing independent obligation liable to pay, such as to deduct sums payable for rent, and so on. Those may be properly treated, as I understand the law, as part of the advance, and the advance may be stated as an advance of the entire sum, notwithstanding a portion of it is detained by the lender for the purpose of paying the sum due on an existing obligation of the borrower for his rent or for other matters. But if a sum is detained by the lender from the borrower for some agreed bonus or for something that there is no obligation of

K.B. Div.]

SMYTH (app) v. STRETTON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

SMYTH (app.) v. STRETTON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

the borrower to pay other than the obligation created by the contract that is being made between the parties at the time, then you may not state the entire amount to be an advance made at the time. That illustrates what I mean—that there is a substantial difference between a sum being detained by the person who would otherwise pay it, by reason of a right to detain it that is created as part of the same contract which he is carrying out, and to that extent, therefore, it seems to me that the decision in Bell v. Gribble and Hudson v. Gribble goes beyond what the previous cases and the illustration of Mathew, L.J. has established. But it is binding, and it seems to me that it creates a difficulty in my saying that the governing body here did not mean as to both of these sums really to increase the salary, and to increase the salary with a view of enabling the assistant masters, without losing money, to take part in this provident fund, and not only enabling them to do it, but binding them to do it. In Bell v. Gribble the servants were bound to make those payments or to allow those deductions as part of the terms of their service, just as here this becomes part of the engagement of these assistant masters from the time that it came into operation, and whether they are previous masters or newly-appointed masters really makes no difference for the purpose. I think, under the circumstances, that I am bound to hold that this scheme really meant what it said; that it did mean to increase the salaries, and to provide that as to one portion of the increase the assistant master should have it in any event. All the clauses show that as to the first 5 per cent. the masters were to have it, or their representatives were to have it if they died, and they were even to have it if they left by reason of some misconduct, and they were to have it not year by year, but when they left, and with compound interest. The scheme has been criticised by somebody in reference to the grammar of clause 4, and, I think, criticised with some grounds; it also may be criticised on the ground that it does not state at what rate of interest this compound interest was to be, nor does it state for anybody who had to assess the compound interest what he would want to know what was done as to rests, whether it was to be annual or half-yearly, or how the compound interest was to be calculated. It is not absolutely complete if it is to be criticised, but that does not make any difference for the purpose that I have to consider. In reference to the first 5 per cent., it seems to me that it must have been meant to be that which it is said to be, viz., an increase of salary payable at a future date, and when payable, payable with compound interest; and therefore I do not think the case would have been arguable if that provision stood alone. It does not stand alone. The next one, if it stood alone, would certainly be very arguable. I am not quite clear about it now, but it seems to me that being put as it is with the other sum which is clearly salary, and being in express and clear words used, not by ignorant people, notwithstanding what I have said as to their grammar and other things, but by people—namely, the governors and masters of this college—who must be considered to understand quite well what they say, stated distinctly to be salary, and it seems to me not by any means necessary to prevent it being salary, because there is a binding obligation. As to this sum (c), it is to be left in the hands of the governors of the college upon certain specific terms which are that the masters are not to have it in every possible event, for they are not to have it if they do not serve for ten years unless their non-service for as much as ten years depends on the case of ill-health; and then in the case of ill-health it is discretionary with the governors to give it. So in that case, if they have served for less than ten years, they do not get this sum (c) as of right, and also if they are removed for misconduct or have resigned to avoid being removed for misconduct, they do not receive that sum, but that sum in those cases, if it is not given to them, goes into a general fund which the governors are to distribute to exceptional and special cases requiring and deserving assistance. Therefore each man when he pays down, if you may call it paying down, or when he has deducted from what otherwise would be his salary the sum (c), when he is paying over or submitting to the deduction of that sum, he is paying it in the nature of a premium in respect of advantages which he is probably to get, advantages secured to him for certain in certain events, which he may not get in certain other events, but he is also purchasing the right to have or to ask for and possibly to get it if he happens to be specially unfortunate, and therefore in that sense, the sense of this fund "specially deserving" he has a possibility of getting an additional allowance out of the sums which other gentlemen have contributed. Gentlemen who have served for five years and therefore come into this charge, but have not served for ten, and have gone out perhaps to some better appointment elsewhere, will have paid certain sums which they will not get back, and those go to increase the fund, and each person who subscribes to the fund has a chance of getting a portion of those funds. The result is it is like a premium paid down for an insurance in certain events, a sum paid for advantages which you may or may not get, or get to a greater or lesser extent. It is exactly like the case of a person being obliged to insure his life; that would not prevent the sum being salary. In one sense it is a hard case on these assistant masters. It is a ground of complaint (it is not for me to say if it is legitimate or not) against the income tax that it charges in the same way income arising from a man's own work and exertions, out of which there is a moral obligation at any rate to put something by for his family and those dependent upon him, and for his old age and chance of illness. It treats that, for the purpose of taxation, on exactly the same footing as income arising from capital, which capital remains intact and is there for the man in his old age or his children. It is an objection to be made to the tax, but there is the tax—it exists—and considerations of that sort, it seems to me, cannot be taken into account in considering whether a particular case comes within the principles of the taxation. Of course the Legislature has done something for persons in that position—it is a very little—but something in the way of the provision that exists as to deducting the premiums on life assurances. That is done to meet the grievance. This case though it may possibly come within the mischief which that particular provision is meant to meet, does not come, as it seems to me, within any of the statutory relief that has been given. Of course it is not a life assurance within the meaning of that, nor can it possibly be said, and it is not argued by Mr. Danckwerts in an argument which has assisted me very much, that it comes within the express words set out in this case about certain deductions allowed by Act of Parliament which was one of the things considered in Bell v. Gribble. But this case could not be said to come within that, and does not. The result seems to me to be that I must take this sum as a sum which really has been added to the salary and is taxable, and it is not the less added to the salary because there has been a binding obligation created between the assistant masters and the governors of the schools that they should apply it in a particular way. Judgment for the Crown.

Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Unoccupied furnished house—House Tax Act 1803 (43 Geo. 3, c. 161)—House Tax Act 1808 (48 Geo. 3, c. 55)—House Tax Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 7)—House Tax Act 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36).

The tenant of a dwelling-house which is kept furnished, although during the year of assessment it has not been used for the purposes of residence and no one has dwelt or slept therein, is liable to inhabited house duty under the House Tax Act 1851.

CASE stated by Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax and for executing the Acts relating to inhabited house duties for the division of the Isle of Wight.

The respondent appealed against an assessment to inhabited house duty made on the sum of 100*l.* at 8*d.* in the pound for the year ended the 5th April 1901 upon the annual value of a certain dwelling-house belonging to him, situated at Luscombe-road, Shanklin, in the Isle of Wight.

It was admitted by the appellant on behalf of the Crown that the dwelling-house in question for the entire year ended the 5th April 1901, although furnished, had not been used for the purposes of residence, and that no one had dwelt therein or slept therein.

The premises in question, with a garden attached, are held by the respondent, under a lease for a term of 990 years from 1865 or thereabouts, at an annual ground-rent of 15*l.*

The respondent furnished the house in 1877, and it was furnished during the year of assessment (1900-1), and still remains so furnished.

The premises were furnished by the respondent with the intention primarily of using them for occasional residence as a country residence for himself and his family, and up to the year 1895 he resided with his family in the house for a few weeks in most years.

In the year 1896 the respondent let the house as a furnished residence to a Mr. Wardlaw, whose tenancy expired in 1898.

In each year since the latter year, with the exception of the year of assessment (1900-1), the house has been let by the respondent as a furnished house for a few weeks, but the respondent or his family have only resided in the house for about a month in 1902.

At no time during the year of assessment (1900-1) was the house let or actually resided in by any person whosoever, nor (except as hereinafter appears) was any caretaker employed to look after it. During the year of assessment the house was only used by the respondent for keeping his furniture in. The furniture was not packed away and the carpets were kept down, and the premises were ready for the use of the respondent or any person to whom he might let them as a furnished residence. The keys were kept by the respondent's agent at Shanklin. The windows and doors were occasionally opened by the agent to air the house. A gardener has always been employed by the respondent, and was so employed during the year of assessment once a week, or, if necessary, twice a week, for the purpose of attending to and keeping the garden referred to above in order, and occasionally some of the produce, such as a few apples and pears, was during the year of assessment and is now sent to the respondent.

For the year of assessment and for the previous and subsequent years the income tax schedule A, land tax and poor rates, and other rates were paid by the respondent in respect of the house, the respondent being assessed as the occupier thereof, and inhabited house duty has also been paid in respect of the premises by the respondent for all the above years except the year of assessment (1900-1), the respondent being assessed as the occupier thereof.

The respondent claimed that the house was not chargeable with duty as an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, inasmuch as it was not inhabited, dwelt in, or slept in at any time during the period in question, and that there was no statutory enactment or legal decision which declares that an uninhabited house shall be deemed an inhabited dwelling-house if it has furniture in it. In support of his contention he referred to the case of Riley v. Read (4 Ex. Div. 100).

The surveyor of taxes contended that the inhabited house duties are imposed by the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, on inhabited dwelling-houses of the yearly annual value of 20*l.* and upwards, and that that Act kept alive the various powers, provisions, rules, regulations, directions, exemptions, forfeitures, and pains contained in the unrepealed sections of the Acts 43 Geo. 3, c. 161; 48 Geo. 3, c. 55; 57 Geo. 3, c. 25; 5 Geo. 4, c. 44; 6 Geo. 4, c. 7; 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 113 and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 39, and made them applicable to the assessment and collection of the inhabited house duties as fully and effectually as if they were re-enacted therein; that every inhabited dwelling-house is required by law to be assessed, and that the house assessed in this case was undoubtedly a dwelling-house, and that it was not necessary that a dwelling-house should be slept in or dwelt in to render it liable to assessment; that in view of 6 Geo. 4, c. 7, ss. 2, 3, a house furnished as a dwelling-house, although not dwelt in for any particular year or portion of a year, could not be taken or deemed to be unoccupied and not liable to assessment, and that the case of Riley v. Read (sup.) relied on by the respondent was not a case in point. The house referred to in that case was a building, the ground floor of which was occupied for the ordinary purposes of a club, and the upper floors as offices, and it had never been furnished as a dwelling-house or used as a residence.

In further support of his contention that it was not necessary that the house should be slept in to render it liable to assessment to the inhabited house duties, he referred to 57 Geo. 4, c. 25, ss. 1, 2, and 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, by virtue of which it was necessary that, before exemption could be granted in respect of a dwelling-house used solely for trade or professional purposes, the persons claiming exemption should prove residence in a taxable dwelling-house elsewhere, and that this proof was required until the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 25, abolished its necessity, some sixteen years after the present Inhabited House Duty Act, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36.

The commissioners were of opinion that the contention of the surveyor could not be sustained. The Acts of Parliament referred to impose a tax on inhabited dwelling-houses only, and the question for their consideration was whether this building was an inhabited house within the meaning of those Acts, though no person dwelt therein, inhabited it, or slept thereon. The statutes say that what is taxable is an "inhabited dwelling-house." If "inhabitable dwelling-houses" were the thing mentioned no difficulty would have arisen, but as the Acts speak not of "inhabitable dwelling-houses," but of "inhabited dwelling-house," they were of opinion they were bound to put a construction on the word "inhabited." Was this such a place, since no person resided on or dwelt therein? If there were any statute defining the expression and showing that the term "inhabited" was meant to apply to such a case as the present, or if there were any authority to show that the expression might apply to a mere constructive occupation—in other words, if there were an Act of Parliament or decision of a court of law which showed that a dwelling-house might be taxed as an inhabited dwelling-house in which no person slept, dwelt, or resided, though furnished—they would be bound by such Act or decision, but in the absence of that they felt they must put their interpretation on the words of the statute, and they were accordingly of the opinion that the interpretation of "inhabited" is "to dwell," "to live," "to hold as dweller," "to occupy for all purposes of life," or "occupied by inhabitants," and they were unable to interpret the expression in any other mode.

The commissioners therefore disallowed the assessment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and S. A. T. Rowlatt for the appellant.—The mere fact that no one has dwelt or slept in this dwelling-house during the year of assessment or had used it for the purposes of residence makes no difference and it is liable to duty under the House Tax Acts. It was an occupied house for it was kept furnished, and the premises were always ready for the use of the respondent or for anyone to whom he might desire to let it. The true test is whether the house is occupied, and a furnished house is an occupied house. They referred to

Reg. v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee, 37 L. T. Rep. 126; 2 Q. B. Div. 581.

When the whole scheme of the House Tax Acts is examined, it is clear that the liability to duty depends upon occupation and not on whether the house is or is not inhabited. Throughout the whole of the Acts, with one exception, the word used is "occupier," and the exception is the phrase "inhabitant or occupier." By sect. 10 of the House Tax Act 1803 (43 Geo. 3, c. 161) it is provided that houses occupied at the time of assessment are to be brought into charge at the full yearly rent at which the same are worth to be let as set forth in the two schedules to that statute. Those two schedules are repealed, but in their place are those attached to the House Tax Act 1808, which granted new duties in place of those in the old Act. In sched. B., which is a schedule of the duties made payable on all inhabited dwelling-houses, in rule 1 of the rules for charging these duties it is stated: "The said last-mentioned duties to be charged annually on the occupier or occupiers for the time being of every such dwelling-house." Again, sect. 15 of the Act of 1803 provides that unoccupied houses are to be inserted in the assessment, and the occupier, on coming into occupation, is to give notice, otherwise he is to be charged for the whole year instead of from the end of the preceding quarter. Further, houses becoming unoccupied after assessment are to be charged for the whole year unless notice is given. In order that the liability to duty may be discharged where a lease has come to an end after assessment, there are three requisites necessary—namely, that the tenant must quit, that the tenancy must have determined, and the premises must be wholly unoccupied. This appears from rule 5 of sched. A to the Act of 1808. In sched. B to that statute there are certain exemptions, and case 5 relates to a house left in the care or charge of any person or servant who resides therein for the purpose only of taking care of it, but it was pointed out in London Library v. Carter (62 L. T. Rep. 466; 2 Tax Cas. 594) that this provision only applies to an empty house. The provisions of sect. 15 of the Act of 1803 and sched. A, rule 5, to the Act of 1808 were extended by sect. 2 of the House Tax Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 7), where relief was granted on houses becoming unoccupied although not at the expiration of the occupier's lease or demise, and it is noticeable that the words there used are "The duty thereon shall be discharged . . . for the particular quarter or quarters . . . during which it shall appear . . . such house . . . shall have continued for each entire quarter wholly empty and unoccupied." The inhabited house duty was taken off by the House Tax Act 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 19), but by the House Tax Act 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36) the powers and provisions of the former Acts were to be again in force except as therein provided, and it is under this Act of 1851 that the present duties are payable. When all these statutes are looked at, the whole question is one of occupation, and they clearly show that if you occupy you inhabit. There are several Acts which give exemptions from the duty—namely, the House

Tax Act 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. 25), the House Tax Act 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 44), and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 15)—but, except, perhaps, in the case of the caretaker, there has never been any suggestion that there must be habitation—i.e., in order to make the house liable for duty. There have been several cases in Scotland which show that occupation is habitation. They referred to

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. and C. C. Scott for the respondent.—This house during the year of assessment was not inhabited in any sense of the word. The House Tax Acts only impose duty on inhabited houses. The word "occupier," we admit, is used in a large number of the sections of the statutes, but they are merely what may be called the machinery sections used for the purpose of assessing the duties. The Crown here are trying to construe the machinery of the Act as if it were the charging part of the Act. When construing these statutes it must be borne in mind that two duties are imposed by them—namely, the window tax and the inhabited house duty. Window tax was payable in respect of houses occupied, and that is why the words "occupier" and "occupation" are used in the statutes. Inhabited house duty required habitation for it to attach to a house. It is because the words "occupier" and "occupation" are used in these machinery sections that much confusion has arisen. Under the words in sect. 10 of the House Tax Act 1803 you can only bring inhabited houses within the words of sched. B of the Act of 1808. In order to make a house liable to inhabited house duty it must have been slept in during the year for which it is assessed. They referred to Clifton College v. Thompson, 74 L. T. Rep. 168; (1896) 1 Q. B. 432;

Riley v. Read, 4 Ex. Div. 100;

Lambton v. Kerr, (1895) 2 Q. B. 233.

Even although it may have been slept in it may not be liable to duty as in the case of the exemption 5 in sched. B of the Act of 1808. In sect. 62 of the Act of 1803 the words are "every dwelling-house inhabited or not inhabited," which shows there is a distinction between the two, and distinguishes the houses liable to the window tax and those liable to inhabited house duty. Again, in the Act of 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. 25) the two duties are distinguished, for, in reciting the Act of 1808 (48 Geo. 3, c. 55), it says: "Certain duties were granted to His Majesty upon houses, windows, and lights, as set forth in the schedule to the said Act annexed, marked A, and upon inhabited houses, as set forth in the schedule to the said Act annexed, marked B." There the word used is "inhabited" so as to show the difference between the two duties charged. That there is a distinction between a furnished and an occupied house appears from sect. 3 of the House Tax Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 7). The Scottish cases that have been cited do not bind this court, and do not correctly state what is the law in England. Lord Brampton's judgment in Grant v. Langston (82 L. T. Rep. 629; (1900) A. C. 383) overrules them, certainly so far as this country is concerned.

Rowlatt in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case there is a question of some nicety arising under a somewhat peculiar fact. There is a house which during the year of assessment was fully furnished and ready for occupation as a dwelling-house, but, in point of fact, during the year nobody slept in it or inhabited it in the ordinary sense of physically inhabiting it or living there. It was a house in the Isle of Wight that the owner had been in the habit of visiting from time to time with his family as a country residence and also, in recent years at any rate, had been in the habit of letting furnished to other people to occupy in a similar way, but when he was not there in residence and had not let it he did not leave any servant or caretaker of any kind living in the house. There was a house-agent close by who had the key of it, and he showed people over the house, if necessary, and he occasionally sent in someone to open the windows and air the place, and so on. But at no time during the actual year of assessment was the house lived in in the ordinary way. It was ready for use as a dwelling-house and ready for habitation, but it was not in point of fact inhabited. At the same time it was occupied, because leaving the furniture there is for ordinary purposes, certainly including in particular the purpose of rating to the poor rate, occupation. It is a certain amount of use of the house, and I do not think it is questioned that what happened in this case would amount to occupation, although it is said, and certainly in the ordinary use of the word rightly said, it was not in fact inhabited. Under these circumstances is the inhabited house duty payable? The duty is imposed in respect of inhabited houses not of habitable houses. That much is, of course, quite clear. It was so in reference to the old Acts, and it is so in express terms in reference to the Act which really is the one which one has to consider—namely, the Act of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36 (1851)—which reimposed the inhabited house duty which had been an existing tax, and which had been taken off some few years before. When this Act was passed, the window tax, which was a tax which existed for a great number of years, was taken off, and the inhabited house duty was restored, probably with variations as regards amount or anything of that sort, which does not concern me here. There was the tax imposed upon inhabited dwelling-houses by the first section, and by the second section all the powers, provisions, rules and regulations, directions, exemptions, fines, forfeitures, pains and penalties contained in any of the prior Acts with reference to the duties on inhabited houses were to be enforced in reference to the duties as reimposed. When you come to look at those various provisions, it is quite clear that in all the provisions in reference to the mode of charging the duty in reference to the period during the year of assessment for which relief from the duty was to be granted the word that occurs is "occupied" and not "inhabited," and it appears as if the Legislature were treating the two words as meaning

K.B. Div.]

SMITH (app.) v. DAUNEY (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

the same thing. Unless you can say either that "inhabited" means "occupied" or that "occupied" means "inhabited" you will get into difficulties in some one or other of the sections throughout the Act. There is a substantial difficulty to see how the thing is to be worked out. Before going to the clauses of the Act it seems to me as well just to refer to the dicta upon the subject—I think they are only dicta—to which I have been referred. In Scotland it has been stated in two or three cases, and particularly emphatically and clearly in one case—Glasgow Corporation v. Inland Revenue (18 Sc. L. Rep. 1)—that "habitation" in this section is the same thing as "occupation." The Lord President at page 3 of the Scottish Law Reporter in the year 1880 in the number the case is reported in, says: "It is needless to say at this time of day that an inhabited house does not mean a place of residence—that habitation in the sense of the statute may consist of any kind of occupation of a house or building. If it be not unoccupied—that is to say, without any use made of it at all—then it is an unoccupied house within the meaning of the Act, and, being occupied, it is also within the meaning of the statute an inhabited house." If that passage correctly states the law in England as well as in Scotland—and there is no reason why it should be different, because this statute and the tax extends to Great Britain, and it is given in Scotland on the same terms as it is given in England—the present case seems to me to be quite clear. It is said, however, that there are dicta in England to the contrary, and the principal one, and probably the latest one, and one which certainly I should be inclined to follow if I were clear that it applied to the present case, is a statement by Wright, J. in the case of Clifton College v. Thompson in 1896 (74 L. T. Rep. 168; (1896) 1 Q. B. 432). There was a question of a master's house and some other buildings in reference to Clifton College, and in dealing with one question the learned judge said: "That being so, the only ground on which the Crown could succeed would be that the college is assessable for the remainder of the premises as being a dwelling-house, or as including some other dwelling-house to which the rest is attached and occupied with that dwelling-house. But the premises which I have just mentioned"—I think he is referring to the chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, museum, and so forth—"do not appear to me to be capable of being treated as inhabited dwelling-houses at all. Boys do not dwell in or inhabit any class-room or gymnasium, or any of these other places; they neither dwell there or inhabit there, nor does anybody else so far as the case shows." Then we come to the passage there was a question about. "Then in addition to that on the second point to which I have adverted" (and I think that was shown by Mr. Lawrence to mean "the second point upon which I am now adverting") "it seems to me that the weight of authority in this country is to the effect that nothing is inhabited as a dwelling-house for the purposes of these Acts unless someone sleeps there." There is no doubt he had been referred to the Scottish cases, and to this particular one from which I have read a passage, and also had been referred to a case of Riley v. Read

(4 Ex. Div. 100), which is an English case which has something on the point in it, but not very much; but he has also been referred to another case in England. He had not been referred to many cases, but he deals with it in this short way in his judgment: "It seems to me that the weight of an authority in this country is to that effect that nothing is inhabited as a dwelling-house for the purposes of these Acts unless someone sleeps there." As I say, if I knew exactly what authorities the learned judge was referring to, and that he had this point in his mind, I think I ought to follow that; but I am not quite able to understand. In the first place, he does not tell us which are the cases he does refer to which lead him to that conclusion, and in the next place what he is referring to is not so much to the fact that somebody does sleep there or that there is no sleeping accommodation, but he is referring to the character of the use that is made of this place—as a class-room, gymnasium, and so—and I do not think he is meaning to say that if those places included a bedroom for a caretaker or somebody or other that the assessability for inhabited house duty would depend upon whether or not the bedroom was slept in during the year of assessment. I think he is rather referring to the character of the occupation of what he had before him—that it was not occupation including sleeping accommodation or occupation in the nature of it. In point of fact, laying stress not only upon the word "inhabited," but upon the phrase "inhabited dwelling-house." There being somewhat of an uncertainty as to what that means, the fact that it is only a dictum, and the fact that there are clear decisions in Scotland seem to me practically to leave this quite open, so that I have to go back and look at the statute a little more carefully than I have hitherto done. In this case it seems to be admitted—I think it would have to be admitted, but it seems to me expressly admitted—that if this gentleman in the year in question had done that which in most of the years since he has had the house he has done—namely, lived in it for a few weeks, or let it for a few weeks—then he would have been assessable to the inhabited house duty for the entire year. All the provisions which deal with dividing up the year of assessment into periods for which the tax is to be paid and periods for which it is not to be paid, clearly seem to deal with the question of occupation and not habitancy. The word "occupied" at any rate occurs in all of them, and the test is when it comes to be occupied and so on. It is "occupation" in all those sections that govern the question whether or not a portion of the year is a portion in respect of which the tax is to be paid. That being so, if it is correct to say that this house would have been taxable for the whole year if the owner of it had left it for the greater part of the year in exactly the condition in which he has left it—namely, furnished, with a key at a house-agent's close by, nobody actually in it but for a month in the summer—but had gone down and lived there with his family and his servants, then one has to see how that would come about. It seems to me that it would come about in this way: When the assessment is made, if the person whose duty it is to go and make the assessment goes to the house, and finds it furnished and in that sense

SMITH (app.) v. DAUNEY (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

occupied, he has not to inquire whether anybody was sleeping there the night before, or whether anybody is going to sleep there on that night, but he is to assess it. That, I think, appears from the 10th section of the Act of 1803, and the 15th section of the same Act. The 10th section reads thus: "And every dwelling-house, cottage, or tenement, of whatever description occupied at the time of making the assessment shall be brought into charge in respect of the duties set forth in the schedule marked (A) by the respective assessors." Now, that schedule marked (A) relates to the window tax and not to the inhabited house duty. The section then continues: "And in their default by the respective surveyors and inspectors herein mentioned, according to the number of windows therein, subject to the powers of discharging the same as after-mentioned." Then we get to the portion that seems material for the present case: "And every dwelling-house, cottage, or tenement and other the premises therewith occupied and hereby charged." Now, "the premises therewith occupied and hereby charged" clearly relate to the premises which are, for the purposes of the charge, to be included with the dwelling-house in the charge, such as certain outbuildings and things of that sort, and amongst other things they include the garden, provided it does not exceed one acre. That is, "the premises therewith occupied and hereby charged"—not all the premises therewith occupied, but so much of the premises therewith occupied as is hereby charged. The section then goes on: "As set forth in sched. (B), being together of the annual rent of 5l. or upwards, shall also be brought in charge in the like manner, according to the full and just yearly rent at which the same is really and bona fide worth to be let in respect of the duties set forth in the said schedule marked (B)." And if any assessor omits to charge and so on then he is subject to a penalty, "whether the occupier of any such house, cottage, or tenement shall be entitled to be discharged from the same in manner herein-after mentioned or not." The 15th section corresponds with it, but relates to houses which are unoccupied at the time of making the assessment. It says: "Every house or tenement which shall happen to be unoccupied at the time of making the assessment shall be inserted as such in the assessment with the annual rent at which the same might be let if the same shall amount to 5l. or upwards, and the assessors, and in their default the surveyors, and inspectors, shall cause the same to be certified to the said commissioners from the time of such house or tenement coming into the occupation of any person or persons." So that if the house is occupied at the time of making the assessment, it is to be charged subject to the right of the person to be discharged, if any of the provisions of the statute enable him to be discharged. It seems to me, therefore, at the time of making this assessment the assessor would have to put it in, because he would find it occupied, and that it would not be his business to inquire: "Was it slept in last night; is it going to be slept in to-night?" or anything of the sort. It is occupied, it is habitable, it is a dwelling-house, it is ready for occupation as a dwelling-house, and not for something else. If it had no bed-room furniture in it or anything of that sort, but only class-room furniture or gymnasium apparatus or something of that sort, it would come under a different category as not being a dwelling-house at all, apart from the word "inhabited." But in the condition in which this is, it is "occupied" as a dwelling-house although not "inhabited" as a dwelling-house, because it has the full furniture of a dwelling-house there, and is "occupied" for rating purposes. It seems to me, therefore, it is to come into charge, and, as I say, I think that is admitted in the argument for the respondent here, because it is agreed that he would be chargeable for the whole year if he had occupied or inhabited it at any period. That being so, it seems to me that even if the first operative words, as I may call them, of the section granting the tax would not in their ordinary interpretation of house duty cover it, it is brought in it by this section, which directs that it shall be charged subject to such power as there is for the person charged to be discharged under any of the various sections of the Act. If that is the true interpretation, it is, I think, quite clear that there is no section of the Act under which the respondent can get discharged on the ground neither he nor anyone else had slept in the house during the year in question. None of the sections in reference to dividing up the period into times the house is occupied and times when it is unoccupied apply, and it seems to me that the result, therefore, will be practically that which the Scotch judges appear to have said it was—namely, that for the purposes of this statute a house is to be deemed to be an inhabited dwelling-house if, in point of fact, there is an occupier of it. Of course the fact of there being an occupier of it does not necessarily make him an inhabitant of it. There may be an inhabitant of a house who may be a servant, and his inhabitation may amount to occupation by somebody else, his master. That is the sort of case which may no doubt arise, but it seems to me that if, as here, such occupation as there may be of the house is an occupation of it as a dwelling-house as distinguished from the case dealt with by Wright, J. of a class-room and gymnasium, and things of that sort—if this house is ready to be slept in when the owner or anyone he sends there wants to sleep there, then it is inhabited within the meaning of these statutes. I think that is the better interpretation on the whole. You have either to read "inhabited" in the first part as meaning "occupied" or "occupied" in a great many of the other parts as meaning "inhabited," and there is a choice between the two, and, having regard, amongst other things, to the analogy of rating, although it depends on different words, I think on the whole that the proper conclusion to come to is that the tax here has been imposed upon a house in such conditions as this one. I may just add that if the proposition contended for, that a house which was in the condition in which this house has been for the whole year could be released from a proportion of the tax by reason of its being in that condition for a portion of the year, could be maintained, it seems to me absolutely certain that this question must have arisen long ago, because it is an extremely common case. The particular case that has arisen here—namely, the house being occupied, uninhabited in this way for the entire year—is no doubt a somewhat rare one. It is not often that furnished houses are left without someone sleeping in them and unprotected for an entire year, and that accounts for the question not having arisen and been decided during the number of years which have elapsed since this tax was imposed. If the other proposition was contended for, it would be a very strong argument indeed against it that had never been set up during all this number of years. From the first imposition of the tax, I suppose nearly 100 years have passed; at any rate, it has existed for at least 100 years, and, considering the number of cases in which houses must have been left in this sort of state for a portion of the year, if it were contended that that gave relief for a portion of the year it would be a very strong argument against such contention; but that contention has not been set up, and it is to a considerable extent in consequence of that position of things that it appears to be agreed that relief does not exist for the portion of the year for which the house is in this condition, and it seems to me that it is taxable when it is for the whole year in that same position. On the whole, therefore, I think my judgment must be for the Crown.

Judgment accordingly.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, ROMER, and STIELING, L.JJ.)

BARQUE QUILPUÉ LIMITED v. BROWN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Detention at port — Loading — "Regular turn" — Custom of port — Delay caused by number of vessels chartered — Option.

A charter-party provided that a sailing vessel was to load a cargo of coal at N. "in regular turn" from B. Colliery or any of the collieries the freighters might name. No time for loading was fixed.

At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted.

When the vessel arrived, a great many vessels were waiting to load from B. Colliery, and in consequence sixty-seven days elapsed before a coaling order could be given to the vessel.

The charterers, who were the owners of B. Colliery, had sold a cargo of that coal to be shipped by this vessel.

Held, that the words "regular turn" referred to the colliery turn as distinguished from the port turn both upon their proper construction and also having regard to the regulations and practice of the port.

Held, also, that the defendants had not chartered an unreasonable number of vessels to arrive at the port about the same time so as to make it impossible that the vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and that the probability of delay was known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party.

Held, therefore, that the charterers had not acted unreasonably, and were not liable for the detention of the vessel.

Decision of Kennedy, J. affirmed.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. delivered the 2nd Dec. 1902.

The plaintiffs commenced the action to recover damages for detention of the sailing ship Quilpué at Newcastle, New South Wales, under a charter-party dated the 6th Feb. 1900, made between the plaintiffs, as shipowners, and the defendants, as freighters.

The charter-party, so far as material, provided that the ship should with all convenient speed proceed to Newcastle, "and there in the usual and customary manner load in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, or any of the collieries the said freighters may name, a full and complete cargo, which the said freighters bind themselves to ship."

The defendants were the owners of Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, and chartered vessels to load with their coal.

On the 6th April 1900 they sold a cargo of their coal to be shipped by the Quilpué to certain persons in Valparaiso.

At the port of Newcastle coals are shipped in large quantities from about twenty collieries, none of which can produce a greater daily output than 1100 tons, the coals from the Wallsend and the Duckenfield Collieries being in greater demand than from the others.

The collieries are all some distance from the port, and the coals are conveyed by railway to the loading place, which is called the Dyke, where the vessels are loaded by means of cranes, which are quite sufficient to load more than the output of the collieries, but there is no place at the Dyke for the storage of coals.

The loading is under the control of Railway Commissioners, and No. 2 of the port regulations provides: "Vessels requiring berths at cranes for the purpose of loading or unloading cargoes shall obtain same in the order of their arrival in port, provided . . . the necessary loading orders have been lodged."

The regulations also provide that the cargo must be shipped continuously, and that not less than a certain number of tons a day must be loaded under penalty of fines, and that steamers shall have preference.

Evidence as to the working of these regulations was taken on commission, and on this evidence Kennedy, J. found a well-established practice with reference to sailing vessels that the loading was "a loading in turn of their arrival inter se, subject to their being on what I may call colliery turn with the colliery from which they are chartered to receive their coal."

Under the regulations it is necessary in order to obtain a berth to lodge a coaling order from the colliery, but the colliery can only give an order in turn of the ships booked to it. Therefore a ship booked to the collieries whose coal is in greater demand was under greater risk of delay than a ship booked to one of the others.
This practice was the necessary result of the nature of the colliery output, together with the absence of any facility for storage at the Dyke,

(a) Reported by W. O. BIAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
Vol. XC., 2335.

and the necessity of sending the coal by the railway.

The Quilpué arrived at Newcastle on the 3rd Aug. 1900 (her cancelling date being the 31st Aug. 1900), and there were then over twenty ships waiting to load from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery. She was not berthed for loading until the 6th Oct. 1900, and the loading was finished on the 9th of that month.

As the result of the practice at Newcastle, twenty-seven vessels booked to other collieries which arrived after her were loaded before her, and eleven which arrived before her were loaded after her.

Kennedy, J. held that the defendants were not liable for the delay, as the words in the charter-party, "in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery," referred to colliery turn; but that, if they referred to port turn, their effect was the same, having regard to the practice at the port, as the Quilpué was loaded in her turn on the books of the colliery. He also held that the defendants had not caused the delay by chartering an unreasonable or excessive number of vessels to load from their colliery and so caused a block of vessels, as it had been proved that in 1900 the number of vessels loaded from the Duckenfield Colliery was less than that for the three previous years, and that it was impossible in the case of sailing vessels to know their precise dates of arrival, especially having regard to the long cancelling dates provided for in their charter-parties.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the appellants.—The question is what is the meaning of "regular turn" at Newcastle. Prima facie it means port turn:

Lawson v. Burness, 1 H. & C. 396;

Stephens v. Macleod, 19 Sess. Cas. (4th series), 38.

At Newcastle, under the regulations of the port, a ship will get a loading berth in order of arrival if the cargo is ready, and the charterer is bound to have the coal ready. Vessels which arrived after the Quilpué were loaded before her. This colliery being the property of the charterers, it was not a reasonable performance of the contract to make arrangements which resulted in so many vessels arriving to be loaded at the same time. It is no defence to this claim that there was an unusual demand on the colliery:

Stephens v. Harris, 57 L. T. Rep. 618;

Kay v. Field, 47 L. T. Rep. 423; 10 Q. B. Div. 241;

Gardiner v. Macfarlane, 20 Sess. Cas. (4th series), 414;

Ogmores Steamship Company v. Borner, 6 Com. Cas., 104, 110;

Aktieselskabet Inglewood v. Millar's Karri and Jarrah Forests Limited, 8 Com. Cas. 196, 201;

Tillett v. Cum Avon Works Proprietors, 2 Times L. Rep. 675;

Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company, 31 L. T. Rep. 266; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 540.

The charterers had an option as to the coal with which the vessel might be loaded, and did not exercise it reasonably:

Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co., 65 L. T. Rep. 659; (1891) 2 Q. B. 647; Dobell v. Green, 82 L. T. Rep. 314; (1900) 1 Q. B. 526.

Scrutton, K.C. and Balloch, for the respondents, were not called on to argue as to the meaning of "regular turn."—With reference to the other points. It is impossible to know in the case of sailing ships when they will arrive. The charterers acted reasonably and chartered the other vessels in the ordinary course of business, and are not liable for the delay which took place:

Harrowing v. Dupré, 7 Com. Cas. 157;

Watson v. Borner, 5 Com. Cas. 377.

The Quilpué was only detained a reasonable time having regard to the number of ships which were waiting to be loaded from the Duckenfield Colliery. The purchaser of the coal refused to take any but the Duckenfield coal. The option to load with other coal was for the charterers' benefit, and they were not bound to consider the shipowners' convenience:

Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company, 77 L. T. Rep. 332; (1897) 2 Q. B. 485; affirmed on appeal, 78 L. T. Rep. 661; (1898) A. C. 488.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an action for detention of the sailing ship Quilpué at Newcastle, New South Wales, where she was detained for the purpose of loading for sixty-seven days. The plaintiffs allow a period of thirty days, and they claim damages for detention for the balance of thirty-seven days. Two questions, broadly, arise in this case. The first arises upon the construction of the charter-party, which provided that the ship should with all convenient speed proceed to Newcastle, "and there in the usual and customary manner load in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery, or any of the collieries the said freighters may name, a full and complete cargo of coals which the said freighters bind themselves to ship." Mr. Carver addressed to us an argument in which he contended that "regular turn" there meant "in the order of the arrival of the ships." I do not agree with him. I do not think that is the meaning of the words here. He cited cases to us which do show prima facie, and unless there is something to lead to a different conclusion, that these words "in regular turn" mean "in regular port turn"; but none of these cases show that "in regular turn" cannot mean in regular colliery turn as distinguished from regular port turn. In my judgment, in this case, the words "in regular turn from Brown's Duckenfield Colliery or any of the collieries the said freighters may name" do refer to colliery turn as distinguished from port turn. Indeed, not only does that seem to me to be, from a grammatical point of view, the meaning of these words, but when the condition of these collieries which are referred to in this charter-party are considered and also the regulations of this particular port, which were perfectly well known to all the parties to the charter-party, both the plaintiffs and the defendants, it is hardly possible, in the first place, to avoid the conclusion that the parties to this charter-party must all of them have contemplated that the ship would be loaded in accordance with colliery turn. The second rule of the port regulations provides: "Vessels requiring berths at cranes for the purpose of loading or unloading cargoes shall obtain the same in the order of their arrival in port, provided they are considered suitable by the berthing master and the necessary loading orders have been lodged, and their loading in such order will not in any way interfere with the loading of vessels then under and in turn before them except as hereinafter referred to." When that rule is considered, bearing in mind the fact, as found by Kennedy, J. and really obviously known to everybody concerned in this business, that no one of the collieries could load more than 1100 tons a day, because 1100 tons a day was the maximum output of each one of these collieries, one cannot help coming to the conclusion that the practice at this port must necessarily have been a practice governed and controlled by the colliery output. Under those circumstances I have not the least doubt but that Kennedy, J. was perfectly right in the construction which he put upon these words in this charter-party, and in the conclusion which he has arrived at as to what must guide one in determining what "regular turn" means here. The second point in the case is, that in this contract, and in every other contract, there is an implied contract by each party to it that he will not do anything on his part to prevent the other party to the contract either performing the contract or to delay the other party in performing the contract. I agree. I think it may be generally said that there is an implied contract to that effect imported by the law into every contract, just in the same way as you import into every contract that the various things to be done by the one party and the other are to be done, if no time is specified, within a reasonable time. You may call that, in each of these cases, an implied contract. Perhaps it is, but I only wish to safeguard myself against supposing that the law easily implies any special affirmative contract. I think it is very rare indeed that the law either does or ought to imply such a contract. I agree that the particular contract which the plaintiffs rely upon is implied really in every contract so far as I know. It is said that, there being that contract, the defendants here made breach of it, and did prevent, or unduly delay, the plaintiffs in the performance of the contract. The way in which it is put is twofold. First, it is said that if the defendants were under an obligation to load a cargo from this particular colliery and none other—that is, the Duckenfield Colliery—they really prevented the plaintiffs from loading it, because they entered into contracts with such a large number of ships to take coal from that colliery at or about the same time that the coal ought to have been loaded into the plaintiffs' ship as to make it impossible that the vessel should be able to load within a reasonable time; and it is said it does not matter whether that was done after the contract was entered into or before the contract was entered into; because a man not only contracts that he will not do anything to render the performance of the contract impossible or to delay it unreasonably, but he also warrants that at the time of the entering into the contract he has not already done acts rendering the performance of the contract impossible, or which would unduly delay the performance of it. I will assume that that is the proper way of stating the implied contract, although I am not at all sure that it is not too wide; but, assuming that, I ask myself, Did these people do anything of the sort? It seems to me that one ought, in a case of this sort, to take into consideration facts which are in the knowledge of all the parties. In the case of Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company (ubi sup.) Rigby, L.J. concurred with the majority of the court in the decision of the Court of Appeal. He says: "I do not think that a delay which arises from a contingency the probability of which must have been perfectly well known to and contemplated by the shipowners when they entered into the charter-party can be considered unreasonable." In this particular case it is perfectly plain that at the time when the shipowners entered into the charter-party under which they were to load in regular turn, meaning thereby regular colliery turn, they must have known not only that the charterers would have prior engagements which would delay the colliery turn of this particular ship, but they must have known also that a delay of the ship for loading for a number of days—certainly between forty and fifty days—was not an impossible or even an unusual thing in loading at this port of Newcastle in New South Wales from these collieries which exclusively supply this port. They must have contemplated that there very likely would be such a delay. Under those circumstances I agree with Kennedy, J. that there is nothing unreasonable here in the charterers making such a number of engagements for ships to go and load at this port of Newcastle, even taking the Duckenfield Colliery alone, as resulted in twenty ships being in waiting for cargoes; ships which had priority over this particular ship, the Quilpué, when it arrived. With regard to the additional suggestion that although this might be so, if the only coal which could be loaded was coal from the Duckenfield Colliery, that is not the case here, as the charterers had the option of loading from either of the collieries; and, having that option to select the coal, that option must be reasonably exercised. I think the reasonableness, if that is material, must be reasonableness at the time of the selection of the coal being notified to the ship, which probably was at Newcastle, and not at the time of the sale of the coal, which took place in April, four months before. Taking all this, and assuming in favour of the plaintiffs that the absolute option which in words is given to the charterers to select which coal they choose is an option which has to be exercised reasonably by them, as is stated by Romer, L.J. in his judgment in Dobell v. Green (ubi sup.), I see nothing to show me in the evidence that this option was unreasonably exercised. It is quite true that as things turned out, as possibly the charterers might have ascertained if they had made a full investigation, the loading might have been done somewhat more quickly if it had been from some other colliery, but, assuming all that, there is nothing to show me that this selection of the Duckenfield coal was unreasonably exercised. I do not think one must leave out of consideration, and it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the considerations which are to affect the charterer in his selection, even at the port of Newcastle, are to be quite irrespective of the contracts that have been previously entered into by the charterer. It would not be good for business if the charterer was put in such a position that he would not be able to deal with or sell his cargo until the arrival of the ship at Newcastle. Under those circumstances I think that the judgment of Kennedy, J. was quite right and ought to be affirmed.

[CT. OF APP.]

BARQUE QUILPUÉ LIMITED v. BROWN.

[CT. OF APP.]

JONES LIMITED v. GREEN AND CO.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. On the question of the construction of this charter-party, I agree that the provision in it as to the loading being in "regular turn from" the colliery means loading according to the regular turn of the colliery as found by Kennedy, J. With regard to the other points raised by the appellants, those points depend upon this: Can we find that the defendants hindered the plaintiffs in the performance of the charter-party or prevented them from carrying it out by selecting this particular colliery at the time it was selected by them; or by reason of the overcrowding at the port, and the consequent delay of the ship caused by their having chartered so many ships? In other words, Were the defendants guilty of such unreasonable conduct in the matter as would render them liable for such delay in loading as undoubtedly occurred? As to this, the learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had not established on the facts any such case as was necessary for them to establish as against these defendants; and, after hearing the evidence, I am not satisfied that the learned judge in the court below came to a wrong decision of fact upon the point. That being so, I think that point also fails, and the appeal, as a whole, consequently fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I find it impossible to differ from the conclusions which have been arrived at by Kennedy, J. I do not think I can usefully add anything. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

JONES LIMITED v. GREEN AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Obligation of charterer to have cargo ready—No time fixed for loading—Cargo from specific source—Option of charterer—Knowledge of parties at time of contract.

A sailing ship was chartered to load at N. a "cargo of coals as ordered by the charterers," and they afterwards directed that it should be loaded with coal from W. Colliery. No time for loading was fixed. At the port of N. it was necessary to obtain a loading order from the colliery before a loading berth was allotted. The W. Colliery had a small output, and the coal was in great demand. These facts were known to the parties at the time of the contract. In consequence of the number of ships loading from W. Colliery the ship did not obtain a loading berth for a long time, and, in addition to being delayed at N., lost a charter-party elsewhere, as she did not arrive before the cancelling date.

The owners brought an action to recover damages for the loss thus occasioned to them.

Held, that the charterers were not bound to have a cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship; that the vessel obtained a loading order in due course in her colliery turn and there was then no delay on the part of the charterers, and therefore the cargo was provided within a reasonable time; that the option to select the particular coal was an option for the benefit of the charterers, who were not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the shipowners; and therefore, all parties being acquainted with the practice at the port and the charterers having acted reasonably, they were not liable for the delay.

Decision of Kennedy, J. affirmed.

Little v. Stevenson (74 L. T. Rep. 529; (1896) A. C. 108) considered.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Kennedy, J. delivered on the 2nd Dec. 1902.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed damages for the detention, at Newcastle, New South Wales, of the sailing ship Snowdon, which was chartered by the defendants by a charter-party dated the 14th Feb. 1900, which provided that

The ship shall with all possible dispatch proceed to such loading berth as freighters may name at Newcastle, New South Wales, and after being in a loading berth as ordered, wholly unballasted and ready to load, shall there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals, as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship.

The coal was to be conveyed to the west coast of America.

On the 25th May 1900 the defendants informed the plaintiffs that the ship was to be loaded with Wallsend coal.

The Snowdon did not arrive at Newcastle until the 1st Sept. 1900. There was a great demand for Wallsend coal, and she did not obtain a loading berth until the 15th Dec. 1900. The defendants had sold a cargo of Wallsend coal to be shipped by the Snowdon, and the buyers refused to accept coal from any other colliery.

The custom and circumstances under which coal is loaded at the port of Newcastle are reported in Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown (ante, p. 765); but in this case the form of the charter-party was different, and the charterers were not the owners of the colliery.

The vessel had also been chartered to convey a cargo of nitrate from the west coast of America, but in consequence of the delay at Newcastle she arrived so long after the expected date that the charter-party was cancelled. The plaintiffs therefore also claimed damages for the loss thus occasioned to them.

Kennedy, J. held that the contract was to load the Snowdon in her regular turn at the Wallsend Colliery, and this had been done. He also held, on the evidence and the correspondence, that the plaintiffs knew what the custom was as to loading at the port; and that the defendants had not acted unreasonably either in selecting Wallsend coal or refusing to substitute another coal, as they had sold a cargo of Wallsend coal and could not induce the buyers to take the coal from either of the other Newcastle collieries.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C. and Leck for the appellants.—The charterers had no right to postpone the loading for any length of time. They chose the coal with which the vessel was to be loaded, and were bound to have it ready. They must take the risk of not being ready with that coal. The knowledge of the plaintiffs that the ship must take its turn does not excuse the defendants. The selection of the Wallsend Colliery as the one from which the coal was to come was not a reasonable selection, and when the Snowdon arrived thirty other ships were waiting:

Asquith, K.C. and J. Fox for the respondents.—There was no obligation on the charterers to have the coal ready. The plaintiffs were aware of the exceptional difficulties with regard to the loading of Wallsend coal at Newcastle during that year. The obligation to provide the cargo did not arise until the vessel was at its berth, and when it got there the coal was ready and was loaded. There was no obligation to provide coal from any other colliery than that named in the charter-party:

Carver, K.C. in reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the charter-party contains no mention of "regular turn," and runs thus: "The ship shall with all possible dispatch proceed to such loading berth as freighters may name at Newcastle, New South Wales, and after being in a loading berth as ordered, wholly unballasted and ready to load . . . shall there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of" (then there is a blank in which the charterers had the right to insert the name of the Newcastle coals they wished to have, and they did insert "Wallsend coals") "as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship." Then follow the exceptions, but they are immaterial, because neither side relies on them. The case for the plaintiffs, who are the appellants, is that those words constitute an absolute undertaking on the part of the charterers that they would have the cargo of coals ready to put on board as soon as the loading berth was obtained according to the custom of the port, and it is said that a loading berth might have been obtained at a very much earlier date than in fact it was, if the charterers had not failed to perform their duty, and that their failure to perform their duty was the cause of the ship being so long in getting a berth. Now, if the appellants could show that the reason of the berth not being given was that the charterers failed in their duty, no doubt they would be entitled to succeed. But, according to my judgment, they have not done so. The case seems to be covered by the judgment of Lord Herschell in Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.), which decided that it was not the duty of the charterer to have his cargo ready to load on the mere chance of getting a berth. Lord Herschell took the view that if in the ordinary course it might be expected that a berth would be available if the cargo was ready, and the charterer took upon himself the obligation of having a cargo ready, the loss of the berth would be due to a failure in duty by the charterer. For the appellants Mr. Carver relied, among other cases, on Grant v. Coverdale (ubi sup.). In delivering judgment in that case Lord Selborne draws a distinction between loading and that which is preliminary to loading having the cargo there ready to load, and he pointed out that where there are exceptions in the charter-party which relate to the loading, nothing in those exceptions would relieve the charterers or merchants from the obligation to have the cargo there ready to load. The decision in that case is shortly put by the Earl of Selborne, L.C. thus: "With that observation I proceed to notice that it is not denied, and cannot be denied, that, unless those words of exception according to their proper construction take this case which has happened out of the demurrage clause, the mere fact of frost or any other thing having impeded the performance of that which the charterer and not the shipowner was bound to perform will not absolve him from the consequences of keeping the ship too long. That was decided under circumstances very similar in many respects in the case of Kearon v. Pearson (ubi sup.), and decided expressly on the ground, as was pointed out, I think, by all the learned judges, certainly by my noble and learned friend here present (Lord Bramwell), by Wilde, B., and by Pollock, C.B., that there was no contract as to the particular place from which the cargo was to come, no contract as to the particular manner in which it was to be supplied, or how it was to be brought to the place of loading, and that therefore it could not be supposed that the parties were contracting about any such thing." But the present case is entirely different from the case referred to by Lord Selborne, for it is a case in which the source from which the coal was to come was expressly defined. When that is so, I think it is impossible to lay down an absolute rule that the charterer undertakes an unqualified obligation to have the cargo ready whenever it may be reasonably expected that there may be a berth for the ship if the cargo is ready. It may be so sometimes, but it is impossible to say that it must be so. Now, in the present case, what is the contract so far as the source of coal is concerned, and what is the knowledge of the parties to the contract? I take it that one cannot exclude the knowledge of the parties in the consideration of this matter, because, after all, what we have to consider here is, what was a reasonable time either for the provision of the cargo or for the commencement of the loading, and, when you are considering what is a reasonable time, it seems to me obvious that you must take into consideration those circumstances, which were known to both parties to the contract at the date of the contract, and were taken into consideration by both the parties as affording the basis and foundation of the contract. In the first place, the source of the coal is defined by this contract; first, the coal is to be loaded at Newcastle, New South Wales; secondly, the charterer is to have the right to name the particular colliery from which the coal is to come; thirdly, it was within the knowledge of all the parties that the port of Newcastle, New South Wales, serves a limited number of collieries which are adjacent to that port, and serves no other collieries whatsoever. The whole of the coal which is loaded at Newcastle, New South Wales, is the coal which is the product of these collieries. It was known also to both the parties to the contract that the output of these collieries was a very limited output, not exceeding 1100 tons a day; and also that if sailing ships went to this port of Newcastle, New South Wales, the loading would have to take place according to the regulations of the port there, and that a ship could only get a loading berth if what is called a "loading order" had been obtained from the colliery—that is to say, if the circumstances were such that according to the colliery turn that vessel was entitled to have such loading order. It was also known to both of the parties here that sailing ships undoubtedly were detained a very long time before they could in ordinary course get their loading order from the colliery. This very ship, the Snowdon, in the year previous to the year of this charter-party, had to wait for eighty-three days in order to get a loading order according to the colliery turn. As the result of all that, I have come to the conclusion that all the parties to this contract assumed as the basis of the transaction that there would and must be more or less delay, according to the loading turn at the colliery. I have only one more word to say about this. It is true that the correspondence took place between the parties after February, which was the date of the charter-party, still, when it is considered, I cannot help seeing from that correspondence that the charterers and shipowners, both of them, were contracting in view of this state of things; and really as time went on and it came to the knowledge of the parties that there was likely to be a long "stem," as it is called in the correspondence, both parties assume that this long "stem" is a burden which both will have to bear, and that neither party takes upon himself the risk of the long "stem"; and, eventually, when it is certain that the waiting will be for a long time, the shipowners write to the charterers to ask the charterers to try, as a matter of grace, if they can get the purchasers of the cargo, who had purchased Wallsend, to change it to some other coal, and, although the charterers did their best, they were unable to effect this. It seems to me that all these things which I have referred to clearly bring this case within the authority of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), which is most admirably summarised by Mr. Carver in his book on Carriage by Sea, and the particular passage to which I desire to call attention is this. After dealing with what I may call the general duties of the shipowner and the charterer in the earlier section, he says (sect. 254): "On the other hand, the charterer cannot be assumed to have the cargo ready if it is expressly to be provided from a particular place and the charter has been made in view of circumstances by which, as the parties know, the procuring of a cargo from that place may be delayed. And if in such a case no arrangement is made as to the time in which the loading is to be done, the charterer will be allowed a reasonable time for getting the cargo, having regard to the known sources of delay." It seems to me that the present case exactly falls within this passage. It was a case of a cargo to be provided from a particular place. The charter was made in view of certain circumstances by which, as the parties knew, the procuring of a cargo from that place might be delayed. There is no arrangement in this case as to the time in which the loading is to be done, and under these circumstances, in my judgment, this charterer was entitled to a reasonable time for getting the cargo, having regard to the known sources of delay which I have already specified, with reference to these collieries adjacent to this port. Under these circumstances, what has the learned judge found? He has found as a fact—because really this is fact and not law—that there was nothing done unreasonably, and nothing left undone which the charterer reasonably ought to have done in this case. The only suggestion that is made as to anything the charterer could have done is that he could have substituted another coal. To my mind, he did all that he could be reasonably expected to do when he did his best to get the person who became the purchaser under a contract he made to agree to accept another and a different coal than the Wallsend coal. I will assume here another coal could have been got, but it seems to me on the authorities cited before us, which I really do not think I am bound to go into at length, that this option which the charterers had here to select the particular coal was an option which they had to exercise for their own benefit, and they had a right to determine what that coal was, not when the ship arrived in New South Wales, but at any period they chose which they found commercially convenient after the date of the charter-party. The observations which are made by Lord Wensleydale—Parke, B. as he was then—in Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.) are extremely pertinent, and, after all, they are to my mind summarised with perfect accuracy in the passage I have read from Mr. Carver's book. Under these circumstances I think that the judgment of Kennedy, J. in this case must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point taken on behalf of the appellants is that the charterers were bound to have their cargo of coal ready for loading immediately on the arrival of the ship at Newcastle; and, that being so, the charterers are liable for the delay in

JONES LIMITED v. GREEN AND CO.

[CT. OF APP.]

loading which in fact occurred. But when the charter-party here is looked at, it is clear that, when according to the option given to the charterers they selected the Wallsend as the colliery from which the coal should be loaded, the charter-party became one dealing with a cargo coming from that special colliery at the special port of Newcastle; and I may incidentally point out that it was a charter-party where no special time was fixed by agreement as to the loading and no special provision made as to it. Now, on the facts it is clear that both parties knew all the relevant facts connected with the practice of berthing ships at Newcastle in order to load coal from the collieries there; and I have no hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, it would not be carrying out the true intention of the parties and the true meaning of this charter-party if we did not hold, as I think it ought to be held, that the parties contracted with reference to that common knowledge. What the practice is as to berthing ships at the port of Newcastle has already been fully dealt with by this court in Barque Quilpué Limited v. Brown (ante, p. 765). Both parties knew of it; and clearly this contract of charter-party must be dealt with having regard to the common knowledge of what was the practice at Newcastle. I agree with what Vaughan Williams, L.J. has said as to the statement of the law contained in the passage of the well-known book by Mr. Carver, which he has read. I think the principle there laid down is a true principle, and is borne out by Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), and also by the decision of the House of Lords in Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.). Applying that principle to the present case, I think, subject to the question whether the charterers acted unreasonably in selecting this particular Wallsend Colliery, the shipowners cannot complain of the delay that arose in the loading berth being obtained. That delay arose by reason of the practice of the port known to both, and, as I have said, considered by both with reference to this contract and owing to circumstances which were unavoidable as far as concerns the charterers. After the loading berth was obtained there was admittedly no delay on the part of the charterers, and under those circumstances it appears to me impossible for us to say the charterers had not got the cargo ready in a reasonable and proper time according to the true contract between the parties. I do not think the two Scotch cases which have been cited—viz., Lilly v. Stevenson (ubi sup.) and Gardiner v. Macfarlane (ubi sup.)—are authorities bearing upon the present case. In Ardan Steamship Company v. Weir and Co. (ubi sup.) no common knowledge of the practice of the port was alleged or proved; and the case of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.) and the principle there referred to does not seem even to have been mentioned. The other Scotch case, Gardiner v. Macfarlane, as will be seen when the exact questions there decided are carefully considered, really has no bearing upon the question before us. That being so, the only other question in this case is whether in selecting the Wallsend Colliery the charterers acted unreasonably. All I need say is that that allegation is not proved to my satisfaction. In considering questions of this kind, the principle laid down by Bowen, L.J. in Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. Morel Brothers and Co. (ubi sup.) ought always to be borne in mind. In that case, when dealing with the question as to whether the option given to a charterer has been properly exercised in reference to such cases as this, he said: "The option is given for the benefit of the person who has to exercise it. He is bound to exercise it in a reasonable time, but is not bound, in exercising it, to consider the benefit or otherwise of the other party." Applying that principle here, it is clear to me that the learned judge in the court below came to the right conclusion, that the charterers did not act unreasonably.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was not disputed that under this charter-party the charterers were bound to have a full and complete cargo of coals in readiness whenever the ship was in a loading berth. That duty has been fulfilled. No question arises as to that, but what is contended is that the defendants are liable in respect of the delay which occurred before the ship got into the loading berth. As to that, it seems to me that the obligations of the charterers are such as stated by Lord Herschell with reference to another, though very similar, charter-party, in the case of Little v. Stevenson (ubi sup.). He says: "Undoubtedly that would impose by implication upon the charterer the duty of doing any act that was necessary on his part, according to the custom of the port, to enable her to get a berth. He could not defend himself from a complaint of the shipowner that his vessel had been delayed by saying that she was not in a berth when she was not there because the charterer himself had failed in some duty to do some act on his part to enable her to get there." And then, later on, he adds: "I do not for a moment deny that he is bound to do whatever is reasonable on his part with the view of getting the ship berthed at the earliest period that is reasonably possible." The question which it seems to me we have to decide is whether the defendants, the charterers, omitted to do anything that was reasonable on their part with a view of getting the ship berthed at the earliest period that was reasonably possible. It seems to me, regard being had to the facts proved in this case, and in particular to the circumstances which were known to all the parties to the charter-party when it was entered into, that to their knowledge the obtaining of a cargo at Newcastle might be delayed. I cannot think that the defendants failed in doing anything that was reasonably possible for the purpose which I have mentioned. With regard to the case of Ardan Steamship Company v. Weir and Co. (ubi sup.), it appears to me that, although the charter-party seems to have been in almost identical terms with the present, the facts which were established in that case were different. First of all the learned judge found that there was an absolute failure in the duty of the charterer to provide a cargo at the proper time; and, secondly, there was no evidence of such a state of knowledge as is proved in the present case, which, upon the authority of Harris v. Dreesman (ubi sup.), ought to be taken into consideration. I agree, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROBINS v. GODDARD.

[CHAN. DIV.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

Thursday, June 9.

(Before FARWELL, J.)

ROBINS v. GODDARD. (a)

Building contract—Construction—Conclusiveness of architect's certificates—Limitation of right of action.

A condition of a building agreement stated that any defects which might appear within twelve months, and which arose, in the opinion of the architect, from materials or workmanship not in accordance with the drawings and specification or the instructions of the architect, should, upon the directions of the architect, be made good by the contractor at his own cost.

A subsequent condition contained a proviso that "no certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement."

Held, that this proviso did not deprive the architect's certificates of conclusiveness for all purposes, but only so as not to relieve the contractor from liability to make good defects as provided by the agreement—that is to say, as provided by the condition stated above.

WITNESS ACTION.

The plaintiff was a contractor who had agreed to carry out certain additions and alterations to the defendant's premises, Croxley Green, Rickmansworth. The terms on which the plaintiff had agreed to do the work were contained in certain articles of agreement dated the 15th Oct. 1902, and made between the defendant and the plaintiff.

By these articles it was agreed that the works should be carried out in the manner detailed in conditions set forth in a schedule to the agreement. It was also agreed by clause 3 that the term "the architect" in the conditions should mean John Mansfield Ferguson, or, in the event of his death or ceasing to be the architect for the purpose of the contract, such other person as should be nominated for that purpose by the employer.

By condition 16:

The architect shall, during the progress of the works, have power to order in writing from time to time the removal from the works, within such reasonable time or times as may be specified in the order, of any materials which in the opinion of the architect are not in accordance with the specification or the instructions of the architect, the substitution of proper materials, and the removal and proper re-execution of any work executed with materials or workmanship not in accordance with the drawings and specification or instructions, and the contractor shall forthwith carry out such order at his own cost. In case of default on the part of the contractor to carry out such order, the employer shall have power to employ and pay other persons to carry out the same; and all expenses consequent thereon or incidental thereto shall be borne by the contractor, and shall be recoverable from him by the employer, or may be deducted by the employer from any moneys due or that may become due to the contractor.

By condition 17:

Any defects, shrinkage, or other faults which may appear within twelve months from the completion of the works, arising in the opinion of the architect from materials or workmanship not in accordance with the drawings and specification or the instructions of the architect, or any damage to pointing by frost appearing within the like period, shall upon the directions in writing of the architect, and within such reasonable time as shall be specified therein, be amended and made good by the contractor at his own cost, unless the architect shall decide that he ought to be paid for the same; and in case of default the employer may employ and pay other persons to amend and make good such defects, shrinkage, or other faults or damage, and all expenses consequent thereon or incidental thereto shall be borne by the contractor, and shall be recoverable from him by the employer, or may be deducted by the employer from any moneys due or that may become due to the contractor. Should any defective work have been done or material supplied by any sub-contractor employed on the works who has been nominated or approved by the architect, as provided in clause 20, the contractor shall be liable to make good in the same manner as if such work or material had been done or supplied by the contractor, and been subject to the provisions of this and the preceding clause.

By condition 30:

The contractor shall be entitled under the certificates to be issued by the architect to the contractor, and within fourteen days of the date of each certificate, to payment by the employer from time to time by instalments, when in the opinion of the architect work to the value of one hundred pounds (or less at the reasonable discretion of the architect) has been executed in accordance with the contract, at the rate of eighty per cent. of the value of work so executed in the building until the balance retained in hand amounts to the sum of two hundred pounds, after which time the instalments shall be up to the full value of the work subsequently executed. The contractor shall be entitled, under the certificate to be issued by the architect, to receive payment of one hundred pounds, being a part of the said sum of two hundred pounds, when the works are practically completed, and in like manner to payment of the balance within a further period of two months, or as soon after the expiration of such period of two months as the works shall have been finally completed, and all defects made good according to the true intent and meaning hereof, whichever shall last happen. The architect shall issue his certificates in accordance with this clause. No certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement. The contractor when applying for a certificate shall, if required, as far as practicable, furnish to the architect an approximate statement of the work executed, based on the original estimate.

Condition 32 makes provision for reference to arbitration:

In case any dispute or difference shall arise between the employer or the architect on his behalf and the contractor either during the progress of the works or after the determination, abandonment, or breach of the contract as to the construction of the contract or as to any matter or thing arising thereunder (except as to the matters left to the discretion of the architect under clauses 4, 9, 16, and 19 . . .) or as to the withholding by the architect of any certificate to which the contractor may claim to be entitled.

Certificates had been made from time to time by the architect of sums to which the contractor was entitled, and a final certificate was issued on the 24th July 1903.

(a) Reported by H. C. GAIRNS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The entire amount so certified to be due amounted to 2930*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*, and the present action was for the amount of 1930*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* remaining unpaid.

Before the issue of the last two certificates, which amounted to over 1300*l.*, the defendant had formally notified the architect that he was no longer to regard himself as entitled to issue certificates; but, in spite of this, the architect had continued to issue certificates as theretofore.

The defendant alleged that the certificates were not duly or properly issued by the architect, and counter-claimed for damages arising in respect of the plaintiff's delay in executing and failure ever to complete the work.

He also claimed to set off the sums expended by him in rectifying defects in the work carried out by the plaintiff.

Duke, K.C. and Beddall, for the plaintiff, stated the facts, and continued:—There is a fundamental objection to the defence and counter-claim, which renders it unnecessary to enter into the question of whether there were in fact any defects. It is impossible for the defendant to make a claim for defects. Condition 30 of the contract states that "no certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement." That is not a provision depriving the architect's certificate of conclusiveness in all cases, but only as provided by the agreement. The scope of the condition is then found by searching the agreement for provisions, and we find condition 17 to be the one in which provisions are made. Condition 17 deals with defects, shrinkage, or other faults which may appear within twelve months from the completion of the works; and in such a case the architect is made the person whose decision fixes the liability of the contractor. Clearly, then, the provision in condition 30 is not intended to render the certificates of the architect inconclusive in ordinary cases, but merely enables him, in spite of his certificates, to insist on the rectification of hidden defects which appear within twelve months of the completion of the works. Here the architect has raised no objection to the works as carried out by the plaintiff, but the defendant is attempting to use condition 30 to enable him to go behind the architect's certificates, although he has not impugned the architect's good faith. We submit that this case is covered by Lord Bateman v. Thompson (Hudson's Law of Building, &c., Contracts, 2nd edit., vol. 2, p. 166), which was an exactly similar case.

C. B. Marriott for the defendant.—I submit that condition 30 lays down beyond question that the architect's certificate is not conclusive. This would be absolutely clear except for the additional words, "nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement." I contend that these words do not in any way restrict the previous words, and the right arising thereunder to go behind the architect's certificate:

Hudson's Law of Building, &c., Contracts, 2nd edit., vol. 1, pp. 302, 303.

Further, I submit that the notice given by the defendant to the architect suspending his power to grant certificates would prevent him in any case from giving conclusive certificates. The architect is clearly not in the position of an arbitrator under this agreement, for there is a separate provision by condition 32 for the appointment of an arbitrator in case any dispute or difference should arise "between the employer or the architect on his behalf and the contractor." If the employer suspended the architect's powers without due cause, he would doubtless lay himself open to an action for damages; but, if he chose to take such risk, I submit that he could suspend the architect's powers at any time. The fact that such a notice had been given shows conclusively that disputes had arisen, and therefore the architect's certificates are not to be treated as final and conclusive:

Lloyd v. Milward, Hudson's Law of Building, &c., Contracts, 2nd edit., vol. 2, p. 454.

FARWELL, J.—So far as this action is concerned, it is an action upon certificates given by the architect in relation to a building contract, and it is really an undefended action. But there is a counter-claim which gives rise to the argument I have heard. It depends upon the construction of the contract, and inasmuch as the contract is issued under the sanction of the Royal Institution of British Architects, and is on a printed form, it is, I suppose, in common use; so that a consideration of what is the true view to be taken in this case becomes of some general importance. Now, one approaches contracts of this nature with the knowledge that a person who desires to employ a builder to carry on work for him also employs for his own protection an architect, whom he appoints, and who is usually imposed on the builder as the judge in relation to any matters which may arise in the course of the execution of the work. In the particular case before me, the builder can recover nothing in respect of his work except under the certificates to be given him by the architect under clause 30 of this contract. Now, that particular clause is qualified by a provision which, in my view, is only explicable by reference to the former clauses in the contract, and is not to be extracted or treated as a separate sentence and read as something apart and by itself. Condition 16 provides: [His Lordship then read the condition.] Then condition 17 is as follows: "Any defects, shrinkage, or other faults which may appear within twelve months from the completion of the works, arising in the opinion of the architect from materials or workmanship not in accordance with the drawings, specification, or the instructions of the architect, or any damage to pointing by frost appearing within the like period, shall upon the directions in writing of the architect, and within such reasonable time as shall be specified therein, be amended and made good by the contractor at his own cost unless the architect shall decide that he ought to be paid for the same." Then reading this with the proviso in condition 30 that "no certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence of the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good all defects as provided by this agreement," the contract becomes, to my mind, perfectly reasonable and plain. I should prefer, instead of the word "nor" coupling those two sentences in the proviso, to read it, "No certificate of the architect shall be considered conclusive evidence as to the sufficiency of any work or materials to which it relates so as to relieve the contractor from his liability under condition 17," which is really what is the effect of it. If it were not for the express provision in condition 30, it would be open to argument to say: "Condition 16 tells you the architect may give directions as to proper materials and so on during the course of the work. He has, however, given certificates, and, so far as the materials are concerned, he must be deemed to have dealt with them by those certificates." Thus it might be contended that the matter was finally settled, and no longer open to question. This proviso is put in to prevent that; but, that being so, it is only inserted for the purpose of letting in condition 17. That I am correct in this view appears to me to be conclusively shown by the words in condition 17: "Unless the architect shall decide that he ought to be paid for the same." It obviously constitutes the architect, who, as appears in clause 3 of the contract, is a nominee of the employer and employed by him for his protection, the referee as between the two parties. The matters raised by the counter-claim are not, in my opinion, any of those matters which are to be referred to arbitration under the arbitration condition, and, even if they were, that point is not before me at present. The counter-claim only asks me to decide, either by myself or by the official referee, questions as to deficient workmanship or materials not in accordance with the drawings and specification. Now, that is a matter which is provided for by this particular clause 17, and, unless the architect not only expresses his opinion that they are not in accordance with the drawings and specification, but also decides that the builder ought not to be paid for amending and making good the same, I do not see how I can possibly adjudicate in the matter; I have no jurisdiction, and the result is that in my opinion there is no question or counter-claim arising at all in this action. It is simply an undefended action on the certificates, and judgment must go for the amount claimed.

(Before BUCKLEY, J.)

Re LETHBY AND CHRISTOPHER LIMITED;
JONES' CASE. (a)

Company—Transfer—Address of transferor not appearing—Number of share not stated—Refusal of company to register.

Where by a clause of the articles of association of a company every member may transfer all or any of his shares, but every transfer must be in writing and in the usual common form, the fact that the deed of transfer of a member of the company who is selling his only share does not set out the address of the transferor or the number of the share is not sufficient ground for the company to refuse to register the transfer on the ground of irregularity.

MOTION by Edward James Jones that a company should be ordered to register a transfer, dated the 22nd March 1904, of a fully paid-up share numbered 5998 in the capital of the company from Edith Violetta Isley to Edward James Jones as transferee thereof, and that the register of members of the company might be rectified accordingly.

Edward James Jones was formerly one of the managing directors of the company, but, owing to disagreement with his co-directors, was dismissed. He brought an action against the company for wrongful dismissal, which was settled on the following terms: "Plaintiff's costs to be paid by defendants. Plaintiff to receive 600*l.* as agreed damages. Plaintiff's debentures (standing in the name of his wife) to be taken over at par, and plaintiff to transfer the one share which he holds to the company or their nominee."

The company was a private company. The applicant was an accountant, and it was desired that a possibly hostile person should not be in a position to obtain particulars to which a shareholder would be entitled.

About two months subsequent to this arrangement, the applicant, having purchased from Edith Violetta Isley her only share in the company, sent the certificate and deed of transfer to the company, with a request that a new certificate should be sent to him. The deed of transfer contained neither the address of the transferor nor the number of the share. The company refused to register the transfer on the ground of its being irregular, and that it did not comply with the following clause of the articles of association of the company:

Clause 25. Subject to the restrictions of these presents, any member may transfer all or any of his shares, but every transfer must be in writing and in the usual common form, and must be left at the office of the company accompanied by the certificate of the shares to be transferred and such other evidence (if any) as the directors may require to prove the title of the intending transferor.

It was also provided by clause 28 as follows:

The directors may in their discretion, and without assigning any reason therefor, refuse to register the transfer of any share (not being a fully paid-up share) to any person whom they shall not approve as transferee. The directors may also refuse to register any transfer of shares, whether fully paid up or not, on which the company has a lien, or of any shares which the holder has agreed with the company to hold for a period not then expired.

Astbury, K.C. and G. F. Hohler for the applicant.—The only clause in the articles under which the company have power to refuse registration is clause 28, and that clause does not apply to this share. The applicant is entitled to have the transfer registered.

Beddall for the company.—The transfer was required to be in common form under clause 25 of the articles. The transfer sent to the company was not correct; the address of the transferor did not appear. It is the practice of all companies to give notice of the fact of a transfer being lodged, and the address on the register was not correct. The company knew that Miss Isley had left the address given on the register, and did not know her present address. Further, the transfer is irregular; it does not give the number of the share. [BUCKLEY, J.—The transferor had only one share, and therefore the number was unnecessary: (Ind's case, 26 L. T. Rep. 487; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 485; Bishop's case, L. Rep. 7 Ch. 296).] The transfer is not in common form, and does not comply with clause 25 of the articles of association.

BUCKLEY, J.—The transferee in this case was once one of the managing directors of the company, but, owing to certain disagreements between him and his co-directors, he became distasteful to the company and was dismissed from his office. He brought an action against the company for wrongful dismissal, which was settled by the company giving him certain damages and taking over his debentures at par, he, on the other hand, agreeing to hand over his share to the company. When the company made this arrangement they ought to have remembered that he could buy another share, and provided against this in the agreement. As a matter of fact, he did buy another share, and applied to the company to register it. The directors have no power under the articles to refuse registration unless the company have a lien on the shares, or the holder has agreed with the company to hold them for a period which has not expired, or unless the share is not fully paid up. The shares of the company are transferable, and the transfer is only regulated by certain regulations contained in the articles. Miss Isley had power to transfer this share, and the only regulation that applied was that the transfer must be in writing and in the usual common form, and must be left at the office of the company accompanied by the certificate of the shares to be transferred. It is contended that the transfer is not in the usual common form, because neither the address of the transferor nor the number of the share appears in the transfer. Miss Isley is described on the register of members and on the share certificate as of the same address, and the transferee sent the certificate with the transfer to the company. There can, therefore, be no doubt as to who the transferor was. Now, as to the absence of the number. Miss Isley only holds one share; there therefore cannot be any doubt as to what share she meant to transfer. She transfers the only one she can. I am of opinion that the absence of the address and of the number of the share were, in the circumstances of this case, wholly immaterial. The numbers are directory only. Mellish, L.J. in Ind's case (ubi sup.), at p. 487 of the report, said: "I think the numbers of the shares are simply directory for the purposes of enabling the title of particular persons to be traced," and continues: "If, therefore, a holder of shares has the same number of shares which he professes to transfer, or a larger number, and by mistake the wrong distinguishing numbers are put in the transfer, that will not prevent the fifty shares which belonged to him passing to the transferee." Selwyn, L.J. in Bishop's case (ubi sup.) said: "As there was no doubt whatever either as to the numbers of the shares which he intended to assign or of the intention on the part of the assignee to accept the twenty-five shares, and as he had but twenty-five shares, the circumstance of the numbers being inserted afterwards was perfectly immaterial." As the absence of the address and the number are immaterial, there was no infringement of clause 25 of the articles, and the transfer was in the common form. If, in a deed of transfer, the i's were not properly dotted, and the t's were not properly crossed, could you then say that the transfer was not in the common form? In my opinion you could not. Under these circumstances I think the applicant is entitled to have the transfer registered, and I make the order which is asked for. As a matter of form, I will join Miss Isley as a co-applicant.

KEITH v. TWENTIETH CENTURY CLUB LIMITED. (a)

Ornamental garden—Rights thereto of occupiers of adjoining houses—User by their families and friends—Proprietary club owned by limited liability company—Resident and non-resident members.

By a deed rights of user of an ornamental garden were granted to C. H. B., his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and his or their lessees or sublessees or tenants (being occupiers for the time being) of houses immediately contiguous or adjoining to the ornamental inclosure, and for his or their families or friends in his or their company or without.

A limited company, having purchased certain of the houses from C. H. B. and started a social and residential club for lady workers, authorised and allowed its members to use the garden.

Held, that, as the relation of the members to the club was that of customers, and not sublessees, tenants, or friends, upon the true construction of the deed the company could not authorise such user.

THE plaintiffs in this action were the owners in fee simple as to one and the occupiers as to others of certain houses, Nos. 22 and 23, Stanley-gardens, and Nos. 36, 37, 38, and 39, Kensington Park-gardens, situate at Notting Hill, in the county of London, and were entitled under a deed dated the 25th June 1852 to certain rights over a certain ornamental garden situate between the two rows of houses. They were also the committee of management of the garden.

The defendants were an incorporated company and were registered in 1902 under the Joint Stock Companies Acts, the nominal capital of the company being 10,000l., in 1000 shares of 10l. each, and the registered offices being at Nos. 26, 27, and 28, Stanley-gardens.

The defendant company was registered under the name of the Twentieth Century Club, and the objects of it were to provide, at a reasonable cost, a comfortable home, combined with the facilities of a high-class club, for ladies engaged in professional or other work in London.

In 1902, shortly after their registration, the defendant company purchased the fee simple of four houses, Nos. 26, 27, 28, and 29, Stanley-gardens, and afterwards acquired a lease of No. 25. They acquired these houses for the purposes of the club, and certain ladies joined the club and resided there.

The club, which was of a social character, governed by directors, who elected members and controlled its general affairs, contained eighty-eight single and twelve double bedrooms and also a suite of reception apartments, and was a proprietary club, imposing no liability on the members beyond the payment of the annual subscription of 10s. 6d., payable, in the first instance, on application for election, afterwards on the 1st May in each year. Country and non-resident members, by paying an annual subscription of 10s. 6d., could avail themselves of the facilities of the club; they could also have the use of a bedroom if there was one vacant.

Any member who wished to withdraw from the club or to vacate her apartment could do so by giving one week's notice to the honorary secretary in writing. Members could not give orders to or correct the servants, or interfere in any way with the management or organisation of the club.

The members of the club were subject to the following by-laws:

1. Payments for sleeping apartments and board are due and shall be paid weekly.

2. The cost of a furnished sleeping apartment, payable in advance, is 10s. 6d. per week.

13. The club entrance is closed at dusk. Members desiring to enter later than 11 p.m. shall obtain a latch-key (deposit 1s. 6d.) at the office to avoid the risk of being shut out.

15. The directors do not undertake to reserve any particular bedroom for a member if vacated during holidays, &c., unless paid for.

17. The directors reserve to themselves the right, notwithstanding anything stated or implied in the foregoing by-laws, to remove from the club register the name of any member whose room may be required for other use. In every such case a proportionate amount of the last annual subscription will be returned.

There were also regulations as to the uses which the members might make of their bedrooms; they might not bring candles into their bedrooms or use oil lamps or stoves for lighting or cooking purposes; they might not use sewing machines or play musical instruments, knock nails in the walls without permission, or smoke.

By an indenture dated the 25th June 1852 Felix Ladbroke granted to Charles Henry Blake, his heirs, and assigns for ever all that piece or parcel of ground situate and being at Notting Hill (including the site of the houses afterwards built in Stanley-gardens) bounded on the north by Ladbroke-gardens-road, on the east by the Kensington Park-road, and on the south by the ornamental pleasure grounds laid out for the use of the houses in Kensington Park-gardens. And the indenture proceeded:

And this indenture further witnesseth that for the consideration aforesaid he the said Felix Ladbroke doth hereby give, grant, and confirm to the said Charles Henry Blake, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and his or their lessees and sublessees or tenants (being occupiers for the time being) of the houses now in course of erection or at any time hereafter to be erected immediately contiguous and adjoining to the hereinafter mentioned ornamental inclosure or pleasure ground, and for his or their families and friends in his or their company or without, free use and right of ingress, egress, and regress at all times hereafter into, out of, and upon the said ornamental garden or pleasure ground delineated and described in the plan hereto annexed and coloured green. Together with all rights, privileges, advantages, and appurtenances whatsoever to the said free use and right of ingress, egress, and regress belonging or in anywise necessary for the full and absolute enjoyment thereof respectively, he and they nevertheless conforming to such rules and regulations as to user of the same as shall be ordered and laid down by the said Felix Ladbroke, his heirs or assigns, and the committee (if any) of the resident inhabitants of the houses adjoining the said ornamental ground to whom the management and control of the said ornamental ground shall be committed for the preservation and the keeping of the same, and also contributing towards the expenses of maintaining and keeping up the same such annual sum not exceeding 2l. 2s. per house as shall be contributed by the owners or occupiers of the other houses on the south side of the said ground. To have and to hold the said free use and right of ingress, egress, and regress with the other rights, privileges, and advantages thereto belonging or appertaining unto the said C. H. Blake, his heirs, appointees, and assigns, and his and their lessees and sublessees or tenants (being occupiers for the time being) of the houses as aforesaid for ever.

At the date of execution of the deed the houses in Kensington Park-gardens had been built, and some of the houses in Stanley-gardens were in course of erection.

The defendants through their predecessor in title, C. H. Blake, were entitled to the benefits of this indenture, and the members of the club from time to time entered and used the gardens in the same manner as the owners and occupiers of the other houses in Stanley-gardens and Kensington Park-gardens.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, the freeholder himself not being a party, asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants, their directors, officers, and servants, from authorising or permitting any of the members of the club from entering or using the garden.

By an order of Byrne, J. made by consent on the 3rd March 1904 it was ordered that the following points of law be set down to be argued before the court—namely: (1) Whether the resident members of the club known as the Twentieth Century Club were entitled as of right during their resident membership to enter into and use the gardens. (2) Or whether the defendants were entitled to authorise or allow such entry and user by such resident members. (3) Whether the defendants were entitled to authorise or allow non-resident members of the club to enter and use the said gardens.

Buckmaster, K.C. and G. W. Brabant for the plaintiffs.—The members of the club are neither tenants nor sublessees. To constitute a tenancy there must be some estate or interest carved out of the estate which the landlord has. Here there is nothing of the kind; they have not even got the exclusive right to their bedroom. The occupation is in the nature of a licence, and is not a tenancy:

Astbury, K.C. and Ashworth James for the defendants.—A portion of a house may for some purposes be a house: (per Lindley, M.R. in Kimber v. Admans, 82 L. T. Rep. 22; (1900) 1 Ch. 412, at p. 415). The members of the club are tenants of single rooms; they are tenants within the meaning of the word in the BUCKLEY, J. (after reading the deed of the 25th June 1852, and stating the facts as above set out, continued:—)The garden ground in question belongs to a freeholder, who is the common grantor of both the plaintiffs and defendants, but he is not a party to this action. The plaintiffs are asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from going behind what the plaintiffs say is the grant which is made to them; and they are doing that in the absence of the common grantor, who might have granted, so far as I see, rights to people other than those who are here before me. But I am not trying this action; and the question whether it is complete as to parties is not necessary for my determination, for this reason, that I am only proceeding under an order made by Byrne, J., by which by consent it was ordered that certain points of law raised by the pleadings be set down to be argued. The plaintiffs say that, as regards the use of the garden by the ladies, there will not be necessarily any objection to it on the part of the other householders. Whether there will be ultimately or not I do not know, but they say, as it seems to me, not unreasonably, they want to know what limits there are to the rights of occupiers of the houses under the deed of 1852; because, if they suffer this to go on, and it is not within the deed, they may be prejudiced hereafter in saying what the rights are. Therefore, without any feeling of hostility, but for the purpose of knowing what their rights are, they ask the court to determine the true construction of the deed. There is contained in the deed no words by way of covenant or restriction at all to fetter the purchaser of the ground as to the buildings which he is to put up upon the land. He might, so far as I see, for anything that is contained by implication in the deed, put up residences, or shops, or a factory, or anything he liked. There is nothing about it in the deed at all except the following, which is at least a fair inference, particularly from the language which I have read, that what was in the minds of the parties was residential houses. They were to be built in the neighbourhood of existing residential houses that were already abutting on this garden. Some of them were in course of erection, and, of course, it would be known what their nature was, and they were, in fact, residential houses. They are also spoken of as houses which will be in the occupation of persons who have families and friends. That rather points to residential houses, but, beyond that, I have no guide upon the language of the deed. The club imposes a large number of restrictions upon its members by its by-laws, and also upon the room which the member is to have; and what seems to me to be contemplated is, that the club staff will go into her room for necessary purposes, and that she will not have the exclusive occupation. Then there is nothing affirmatory, except as to country members, with regard to the right of a member to have a room at all. It is inferred that they will become entitled to a room, but there are no affirmative words directly giving a right to a room. As to country members there is this, that they may have the use of a bedroom if there be one vacant. That seems to imply that town members will have the prior right. Country members will only get one in default of there being a town member who wants a room. But, again, there is no provision as between the town members as to how any member is to have a room in case of competition. I mean, supposing there are two rooms empty and five members want a room, there seems to be no provision at all as to how there is to be any right as between one and another to have a room given to her, and there seems no limit as to the number of members. There may be more town members than rooms. It seems to me to have nothing more in contemplation than that the ladies, if they are paying for the rooms, may ask to have a room, and that a room will presumably be given them upon the payment which is required—namely, 10s. 6d. a week. Then it has been pointed out that this 10s. 6d. a week is payable in advance. Certainly, having paid the rent in advance for her room, the lady has rights; and certainly the document contemplates that during the week, having paid her rent in advance, she will have a room. But is there anything which shows that she is to have any definite and particular room—in fact, that the room she is put into first she is to have for a week? There is nothing about it at all affirmatively. There is only this to guide me, that by-law 15 provides that, "The directors do not undertake to reserve any particular bedroom for a member if vacated during the holidays, &c., unless paid for," from which the inference is that if the member does pay for it during her holidays they will keep it for her until she comes back. That is the fair inference, and that, I think, would involve inferentially the major proposition, that if it were not holidays, as the member was not away, they would keep her room for her, and not remove her into another one. But that is all by way of implication. Now, having regard to all these provisions, the first question I have to answer is, whether these ladies can within the language of the deed be spoken of as lessees, or sublessees, or tenants of the limited company. In my opinion they cannot. I think that all those words imply and involve the existence of some estate or interest in the land by the person who is spoken of as the lessee, sublessee, or tenant. There are many circumstances under which a person makes a payment as the price of a right, and with the result that he has the right of entering upon land and doing something upon land of which, nevertheless, he is not a tenant. As, for instance, if a man pays a sum for the occupation of a stall at the opera or theatre. He pays for the right of occupation of a particular seat to view a particular performance. Or take the case of a man who pays for the right to enter a picture gallery and look at the pictures. The right which follows to him is that he is entitled, without being a trespasser, to go into the picture gallery and say: "I have a right over this land—namely, a right to come in and see the pictures." Or take another case. A man pays a sum of money as the price of being allowed to go into a strawberry garden and eat as much fruit as he pleases. Of course, in none of those cases does the person become a tenant at all; he is a licensee. He is a person who cannot be quarrelled with as a trespasser, he being on the land because he has received a licence to go upon the land, but he is not a tenant. He has no estate right or interest in the land as land. He has a right to come upon the land by licence of the person who remains the sole owner of all the estate and interest in the land. I can conceive that every lessee or tenant must be capable of being spoken of as being a person who has some estate or interest in the land carved out of the estate or interest of the person to whom he is the lessee or tenant. Now, in my judgment, these ladies are not, in respect of this right of occupation, anything more than licensees. When the lady has paid her 10s. 6d. in advance for the week she has derived, by virtue of that payment, the right, as against the defendant company, who have taken her money, to be provided with a sleeping-room for a period of seven days, the company, as the person to whom the room belongs, having all the rights to which I have referred. As to the room, which she, in point of fact, had the use of for the time, she is simply a user by licence, and not a tenant. Having so far dealt with the words, "lessees, sublessees, or tenants," I must now consider the words following them—namely, "being occupiers for the time being of the houses." I do not found anything on the difference between an occupier of a house and the occupier of part of a house—of a room in the house. In my opinion, the occupier of a room may be properly spoken of as the occupier of a house, but I think it is plain that those words, "being occupiers, are not words of grant at all, but words of restriction on that which precedes. The user is to the lessee "being occupier of the house"—that is to say, that the lessee who is not an occupier cannot use the garden; if he has underleased, and gone to reside elsewhere, he cannot say he is entitled to use it. You must be able to predicate of the person who wants to exercise the right of user that he is a lessee, and also an occupier. The words occupiers are, as I said, not words of grant, but words of qualification of the lessee. Nothing arises, therefore, upon the fact that these ladies are occupiers of the house. In my judgment they are, but there is no grant to the occupier of the house unless he be also a tenant, and they are not tenants. Then I have to go on to this, that the clause which entitled them to use includes further "his or their families and friends in his or their company or without. "His or their" is the freeholder, or lessee, or tenant, and so on. Now, nothing arises on the word "families." Of course, these ladies are not of the family of the limited company. The family there spoken of is the wife and children and relations of the man who is supposed to be the occupier of the house. This corporation has no family in that sense. But what is the meaning of the word

KEITH v. TWENTIETH CENTURY CLUB LIMITED.

[CHAN. DIV.]

"friends"? There it seems to me that the first distinction to draw is this: that the lessee or other person—the company in this case—cannot invite anybody they choose to come in merely from friendly motives. Supposing a lady tenant or occupier of one of these houses was interested in a neighbouring Sunday school, and was desirous of inviting all the children from it to come in for an afternoon's play, and have tea with her in the garden, I conceive she could not do that. Or, supposing she had a brother in a factory, employing a number of workmen, and she wished to invite her brother's servants and workpeople to come there with their wives and children for an afternoon, she could not do that from friendly motives. The test is not whether you invite persons to come there from friendly motives, but whether the person is your friend. I am not going to attempt to draw an exact line, and say exactly where friendship begins and ends. I have to look and see whether the ladies I have to deal with here can properly be spoken of as friends of a limited company. Friendly relations may exist between them, but they are not friends within the meaning of this deed. The word by which I should describe them would be "customers." The defendant company are carrying on business; it is no less a business because it is one for the advantage of ladies of small means. The persons who become members of this proprietary club, and make a payment—out of which the company may or may not make a profit—are accepted as such, not because of friendship existing between the one party and the other, but from the commercial relationship between them. The lady finds it worth her while to find a home with the conveniences that are offered to her for the payment demanded, and the company find it worth their while, as proprietors of the club, to accept the payment from her in return for giving her the advantages which they hold out. I think these persons are properly described as customers, and are not properly described as friends. It seems to me extremely difficult to draw the line. I will give one or two illustrations by way of showing what I think upon it. Supposing the inhabitant of one of these houses invites friends to stay with him in his house, he may certainly invite them into the garden. If he has friends to dine with him, they may go into the garden. Supposing he meets a man on his way home, and describes to him the advantages of his house, and asks him to come in with him and see the garden; he is a friend. It does not turn on the duration of the friendship, but on the nature of the relationship between the parties. If the inhabitant of a house takes in a paying guest, it may be a nice question as to whether he is a friend or not. It seems he might be. But if it were a boarding-house, or a private hotel, or a hospital, or board school, or anything of that kind, persons invited by the owner under those circumstances would, in my opinion, not be friends, and I think that therefore they are outside this definition. The first question I have to answer is whether the members themselves have a right. In my opinion they have not. The second and third questions must also be answered in the negative.

[K.B. Div.]

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 28 and 29.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ.)

FOSTER v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Railway—Carriage of goods—Owner's risk—Over-carriage by mistake—Goods forwarded by another route to reduce damage—Liability of railway company.

Barrels of fish were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants to be carried to J. via S. upon the condition that the defendants were to be relieved from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention.

At E., instead of transferring the barrels to another truck to go to S., owing to a mistake they were carried on to T. It being too late to return the barrels to E. and send them via S. to J., the defendants, to save further delay, sent them via W. Owing to this there was a delay in the delivery, and the fish was damaged.

Held, that the defendants were not liable.

Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (80 L. T. Rep. 53; (1899) 1 Q. B. 309) considered and distinguished.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Lush Wilson, sitting at the Plymouth County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract to carry certain barrels of fish from Brixham to Jersey via Exeter and Southampton.

The barrels in question were delivered to the defendants by the plaintiff to be carried, subject (so far as is material) to the following conditions, which were incorporated in consignment notes signed by the plaintiff and addressed to the defendants:

Receive and forward under-mentioned merchandise, to be carried at the reduced rate below the company's ordinary rate, in consideration whereof I agree to relieve the Great Western Railway Company and all other companies over whose lines the merchandise may pass or in whose possession the same may be during any portion of the transit from all liability for loss, damage, misdelivery, delay or detention, except upon proof that such loss, damage, misdelivery, delay, or detention arose from wilful misconduct on the part of the company's servants, and I also agree to the conditions on the back of this note. This agreement shall be deemed to be separately made with all the companies or persons, parties to any through rate under which the merchandise is carried.

It was agreed at the trial that if the plaintiffs should succeed in the action they would be entitled to judgment for the sum of two items—namely, 2l. 5s. and 7s. 11d.

It was admitted that in the ordinary performance of such a contract as the one in question, the barrels should have been taken off the truck or waggon at Exeter and transferred to a London and South-Western Railway truck or waggon.

In fact, the barrels in question were over-carried to Taunton, where they were discovered and unloaded. When so discovered and unloaded, it was too late to return the same to Exeter so as to catch the Southampton boat to Jersey, and to save delay the goods were sent via Weymouth to Jersey.

It was proved that the fish in question arrived by the Great Western Railway via Weymouth at Jersey in a damaged condition, and later than it would have arrived if it had been carried in the ordinary course by the route contracted for.

The learned judge found that the before-mentioned figures represented the damage sustained by reason of such delay, and the question he had to decide was whether on these facts, and having regard to the conditions above set forth, usually called "owner's risk" conditions, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Mr. Ward, for the plaintiff, contended that the facts of this case are on all fours with the facts in Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (80 L. T. Rep. 53), and that I am bound by that decision. I am unable to distinguish for the purposes of my decision the facts in that case from the facts in the present case. The court, so far as I understand the decision, held that in carrying the goods by another route than the one contracted for, the railway company broke their contract, and would not, therefore, avail themselves of the conditions. Mr. Schiller, for the defendants, cited several cases decided before Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (sup.), in which the courts had held that the conditions applied in cases of misdelivery and delivery short of and beyond the terminus contracted for. The authorities cited do not appear to have been cited to the Divisional Court. I feel bound to say, with great respect to Day and Lawrence, JJ., that I agree with his argument. It appears to me that the contract attaches the moment the consignment note is signed and handed to the defendant company and the goods are received; that the over-carrying the goods to Taunton was an act of negligence; that at the time of unloading the goods at Taunton the injury and some damage had been occasioned; that the sending them via Weymouth was not wilful misconduct within the meaning of the exception to the exemption condition, which means "misconduct" to which the will is a party (Bramwell, L.J. in Lewis v. Great Western Railway Company, 37 L. T. Rep. 774; 3 Q. B. Div. 195, at p. 206), or a wrong and reckless act of a servant indifferent as to consequences, but was a reasonable act intended to avoid or reduce any damage resulting from the previous act of negligence. But for the decision of Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company, I should, without hesitation, have held that the defendant company are protected by the conditions of the contract, and should have entered judgment for them. I also think the principle of the decisions cited inconsistent with the decision of Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company. But as I cannot distinguish the facts of that case from the present, I feel bound by it, and therefore give judgment for the plaintiff for 2l. 12s. 11d.

The defendants appealed.

Schiller (Cripps, K.C. with him) for the defendants.—The learned County Court judge was wrong in thinking that he could not distinguish Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (80 L. T. Rep. 53; (1899) 1 Q. B. 309) from the present case. Both Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (sup.) and Sleat v. Fagg (5 Barn. & Ald. 342) are cases where the goods were sent not in accordance with the contract, but by a different route. In this case the fish was sent by the right route, but, by a mistake, it got off that route, and, in order to minimise the damage that arose, the defendants sent it on as quickly as possible. If the defendants, when the mistake had been discovered, had sent it back on to the original route, although there would have been more damage than in fact arose, they clearly would not have been liable, and the mere fact that they did the best they could, when a mistake arose, for the plaintiffs cannot make them liable. The delay arose from the mistake at Exeter. They referred to Duke, K.C. and Hawke for the plaintiff.—The last three authorities cited have no bearing on this case, as they were decided on the Carriers Act, and the question that arises here is on a contract—namely, the consignment note. Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company is in point here, for the damage to the goods did not arise on the route which was contracted for, but on another route by which the defendants chose to send the goods. The words “during any portion of the transit” refer to the transit contracted for, and do not relieve the defendants from the liabilities of negligence committed on another route.

FOSTER v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

[K.B. Div.]

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion the learned County Court judge ought to have acted upon that which he undoubtedly felt to be the true view of the law, although I think it is right to say that he may possibly have felt more bound by the decision in Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company (80 L. T. Rep. 53; (1899) 1 Q. B. 309), or by what appeared to him to be the principle involved in Mallet's case than we are. So far as Mallet's case is concerned, with very great respect to my brother Sir John Day and my brother Lawrance, I think the extent of the authority of that case, if it is supposed to lay down a principle that the condition cannot apply if the damage happens, or if the injury to the goods happens, upon some part of the route not contemplated by the parties at the time the condition was signed, may require further consideration. I do not wish to say—I do not think I have a right to say—I cannot, of course, overrule it—more than this, that certainly in so far as it lays down any principle which would involve that it must be applied to this case, I think it is at variance with more than one decision of co-ordinate courts, and particularly the decisions which have held that misdelivery to a wrong person will not render the company liable in the absence of something which makes the condition inapplicable, as, for instance, wilful misconduct. Here the misdelivery happened upon a route that was contemplated by the parties. Whatever may be the view as to whether or not Mallet's case can be supported upon the ground that it refers to a particular case of an injury occurring upon a route which never formed the basis of the contract, that is really not this case. Here the Great Western Railway Company undertook to carry from Brixham to Jersey, by way of Southampton, which meant that they were to hand over the goods to the South-Western Railway Company at Exeter. Whether at some other place they would also hand them over was not one of the conditions. But they were to hand them over at Exeter. They, by some mistake, and from causes which do not prevent the condition being applicable, carried the goods on to Taunton, and therefore the breach of contract, in my opinion, occurred on the very route contemplated—namely, that instead of being given to the South-Western at Exeter, the goods were carried on to Taunton, and the breach, so to speak, was complete. What happened afterwards? As I have said, if in any way it could be contended that there was a new route then set up, and a new route as between the parties to which the condition did not apply, I could understand it. But it is agreed (and the case proceeded upon that basis in the court below), finding them at Taunton, instead of sending them to Southampton, which they could have done by sending them back to Exeter and giving them to the South-Western, in which case there would have been delay and the fish would have been spoilt, they endeavoured to do the best they could by sending them to Weymouth, to be forwarded by an early steamer. It seems to me that, if they would have been protected if they had done that which would have caused more delay and given a greater chance of spoiling the fish, to argue that they are liable now, having done the best they could, would be a very dangerous principle to lay down. It would prevent the defendants, who had broken the contract, from doing the best they could to save damages, and possibly to prevent damage, by adopting a reasonable course. Therefore I think their action in sending the fish to Weymouth when they found that they had made a mistake was not sending it by a fresh route in the sense of Mallet's case, if that be an authority with regard to that fact. But it was an act on the part of the defendants to do the best they could when they found that they had broken their contract. That brings us back to the question: Aye or no, does this condition protect them in the case of an erroneous carrying on from Exeter to Taunton, instead of delivering to the South-Western at Exeter? That really, I think, cannot be decided against the railway company without overruling the cases which have decided that under such conditions as these they are protected from the consequences of misdelivery where there are no words in the conditions to make them liable. I therefore think that the learned judge was not bound by Mallet's case to the extent which he thought he was, and I think he should have followed the principle which he was disposed to follow. I only wish to say that while I do not think the Carriers Act cases are what may be called authorities, because different conditions apply to a certain extent in these Carriers Act cases, I think the principle of them is to a large extent applicable to show that this condition does protect where such a state of things as this happens, and it is not a fresh route in the sense which the learned County Court judge thought, acting upon his view of Mallet's case. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to Mallet's case, if the circumstances were exactly the same we should be bound to follow it. But they are not exactly the same, and therefore it is not an authority which covers the exact facts of this case. Now, dealing with the case apart from Mallet's case, it seems to me the construction which Mr. Duke sought to put upon the words of the contract was a very forced one. I think when the contract says: "I agree to relieve the Great Western Railway Company and all other companies over whose lines the merchandise may pass, or in whose possession it may be during any portion of the transit," those words are used to describe and particularise the companies which are entitled to protection. I illustrate what I mean by saying this, that if, instead of doing what they did, the company had sent the fish by the Midland, we will say to Birmingham or anywhere else, that company whose line was not designed to be an original part of the transit would not be protected by this. But I think that in other words, as applied to this case, it means that the Great Western Railway Company and the South-Western Railway Company shall be entitled to the benefit of this contract. Now, what is the contract? It relieves them from all liability for loss or damage, unless the plaintiff proves that such loss arose from wilful neglect on the part of the company's servants. Of course this did not. What really happened was this—that a mistake was made at Exeter upon the Great Western Railway Company's line, which was the line of the original contracting party, and in consequence of that mistake the goods went away on to another portion of their line and were spoilt. It seems to me that that is directly within the terms under which the protection is sought to be obtained.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the case of Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company—speaking solely for myself, of course—I should desire to reserve any question about that case or its correctness. It seems to me that very different considerations apply to this case and to that. Those conditions sufficiently appear by the headnote, which is obviously correct, that it was there owing to their sending the goods by a different route that the damage arose. There the damage arose by reason of an error on the contract route, as it was intended all along to carry it out. The subsequent sending the goods off the route so far as regards the intention of the company (unfortunately, it had no good effect, it is true), so far from increasing, was intended to diminish, and would intend to diminish, the mischief which had happened, owing to the mistake that had occurred while the goods were in transit on the contract journey. That seems to me, I confess, to be a sufficient distinction. I only refer to the mistake at all because the learned County Court judge has evidently from his judgment which has been read, felt himself so much pressed by this case of Mallet v. Great Eastern Railway Company that, against his own view, as it would have been had that case not existed, he decided in the way he did. But it seems to me there is a difference between the case of a carrier who pleads the protection of a contract applying to conveyance by a specified route, where he has from negligence, and not from wilful misconduct, but from negligence, not sent the goods by that route at all, which was Mallet's case, and this case, where they were duly, faithfully, and correctly sent by the route contracted for. As I understand the facts, when the goods got to Exeter, which is on that route, unfortunately they were not transferred into the truck that would take them on to Southampton, but were taken on to Taunton. It seems to me there is all the difference in the world between the two cases in the same way that deeds are viewed differently when intention has to be deduced with regard to keeping a contract or not keeping a contract. I think myself that the judgments which my Lord and my brother Wills have delivered are perfectly right. I desire to add nothing more, except that I think that Mallet's case is not the same case as this in the essential particulars I have pointed out.

Appeal allowed.

CORBETT v. PEARCE. (a)

Employer and workman—Employment on barge—Seaman—Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 and 44 Vict., c. 42).

A man employed on a sailing barge whose main duty is to load and unload her, but who in fact assists in the navigation, such barge being suitable for coasting purposes, and is in fact being used on the sea reaches of the Thames, is a seaman, and so is not entitled to sue for personal damages for personal injuries under the Employers' Liability Act 1880.

APPEAL from His Honour Judge Shortt, sitting at the Brentford County Court, in an action brought under the Employers' Liability Act for damages for injury sustained.

The facts proved in the case were that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant in the Alexandra, a sprit-sail barge of thirty-eight tons, and registered under the Merchant Shipping Act as a British ship.

The crew consisted of only two hands, the plaintiff and the captain, who both assisted in loading and unloading the barge. The plaintiff was under the orders of the captain, and whilst his main duty was to assist in the loading and unloading of the barge, yet he in fact assisted in navigating the barge.

It was admitted that, although the barge had not been used for coasting purposes, there was no reason why it should not be so used.

On the day on which the accident happened to the plaintiff the captain was under orders to bring the barge from Oldhaven, on the sea reaches of the river Thames, to Brentford. The barge was sailed up to Woolwich, and was there, with some other barges, taken in tow by a tug. The barges were kept abreast by means of a breast rope, which rope was supplied by the defendant.

On the journey, it being necessary to alter the position of the barges, the plaintiff was ordered by the captain to hold on by the breast rope. The plaintiff did so, and, owing to its defective condition, the breast rope broke. The captain then told the plaintiff to hold on by the tow rope, and, in doing so, received injuries.

The learned judge held it was in consequence of the rope breaking that the plaintiff suffered the CORBETT v. PEARCE.

[K.B. Div.]

injuries complained of. The learned judge also held that the plaintiff was not a seaman but a labourer, and that the accident having been occasioned by the defective rope supplied by the defendant, he was entitled to succeed in his claim under the Employers' Liability Act.

The learned County Court judge delivered judgment as follows, after stating the facts:—

It was argued for the defendant (1) that the barge was a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, and (2) that if so, the plaintiff must be considered a seaman within the meaning of that Act, and consequently cannot be a workman within the meaning of sect. 8 of the Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), referring to sect. 10 of the Act of 1875. In support of the first contention, the case of the Mac (46 L. T. Rep. 907; 4 Asp. M. C. 555; 7 P. Div. 126) was relied on; and especially the language of Brett, L.J. at p. 130. But granting that a barge may be considered a ship for certain purposes, it does not, in my opinion, necessarily follow that every person employed in or about it is on all occasions to be considered a seaman as contra distinguished from a workman. The same learned judge, when Master of the Rolls, in the case of Yarmouth v. France (19 Q. B. Div. 650) likened the work done by the plaintiff in that case (who was held to be a workman within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act) to that of a lighterman who conducts a barge or lighter up and down the river, the navigating of the lighter forming the easiest part of the work; his real labour, that which tests his muscles and his sinews, is the loading and unloading of the lighter. The principal labour of the present plaintiff was of this kind, and I shall therefore hold that the defendant's contention fails. And I give judgment for the plaintiff for 33*l.* and costs.

The defendant appealed.

R. Dunlop for the defendant.—The Employers' Liability Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42) applies to a "workman," and a workman is defined by sect. 8 as "a railway servant and any person to whom the Employers and Workmen Act 1875 applies," and by sect. 13 of that statute of 1875, "this Act shall not apply to seamen or to apprentices to the sea service." Turning to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) by sect. 742, "seaman" includes every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship, and "ship" includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. The vessel here was a sprit-sail barge, and the barge was sailed up to Woolwich, and the plaintiff assisted in navigating the barge. The plaintiff was therefore employed on a ship, and was a seaman, and the Employers' Liability Act 1880 does not apply to him. He referred to

Reg. v. Lynch, 77 L. T. Rep. 568; (1898) 1 Q. B. 61;

Oke v. Monkland Iron Company, 21 Sc. L. Rep. 407;

The Ruby, 78 L. T. Rep. 267; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; (1898) P. 52;

Yarmouth v. France, 19 Q. B. Div. 647.

Overend for the plaintiff.—The County Court judge was right. It does not follow that every person employed on a barge is a seaman, and not a workman. The learned judge has found, as a fact, that the principal labour of the plaintiff was loading and unloading—in fact, that he was a workman, and so the Employers'

Liability Act 1880 applies to his employment. He referred to

Salt Union v. Wood, 68 L. T. Rep. 92; 7 Asp. M. C. 281; (1893) 1 Q. B. 370;

Reg. v. Judge of City of London Court, 63 L. T. Rep. 492; 6 Asp. M. C. 547; 25 Q. B. Div. 339.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—When considering the construction of this section one cannot ignore the fact that seamen have attempted to get the benefits of the Employers and Workmen Act, and so it is impossible to treat the matter as one that has been overlooked by the Legislature. Now, the Employers' Liability Act 1880 is confined to workmen within the meaning of the Employers and Workmen Act 1875, and this earlier statute, in its definition of workmen, excluded seamen. Now, it is contended on behalf of the defendant here that the seamen excluded by this statute are those defined by sect. 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which followed sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The definition of the word "seaman" in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 includes every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship, and by the same section (742) "ship" includes every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars. I am not going to say whether or no anyone doing temporary work on board a ship, such as a painter or a stevedore, would be a seaman within the Acts, but that is certainly not the case here. This man was one of the crew of a barge coming from the sea reaches of the Thames, which barge could be used for coasting purposes. I think here for the purposes of this Act the plaintiff was a seaman and the barge was a ship, and therefore the Act excluded the plaintiff's right to recover. We should be straining the language of the Acts if we were to hold he was not a seaman. The plaintiff assisted to navigate the ship, and while he was so doing he was injured. I do not think the plaintiff can recover under the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. Both upon the construction of the Acts of Parliament and in the ordinary sense of the word the plaintiff was a seaman. What constitutes a seaman amply appears in Reg. v. Judge of City of London Court (sup.). The plaintiff had to assist in navigating the barge, and, in ordinary language, he was a seaman, for he had to have a certain amount of knowledge of navigating and of seafaring matters.

KENNEDY, J.—I also think the plaintiff was a seaman, and that he is within the definition of a seaman in the statutes, and also within the ordinary sense of the word. He was employed on a vessel in the sea reaches of the Thames, and such a vessel is within the definition of a ship in the Merchant Shipping Acts. The vessel being a ship, what the plaintiff had to do on board shows that he was a seaman. He therefore cannot recover under the Employers' Liability Act 1880.

Appeal allowed.

FARTHING (app.) v. PARKINSON (resp.). (a)

Food and drugs—Warranty—Notice—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 25—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 20.

An information having been laid by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, the appellant's solicitors sent on the 2nd Nov. to the respondent the following notice: "We beg to give you formal notice that our client purchased the same butter with a written warranty from G. L. Limited, of 84, C.-st., M. The following is a copy of the warranty in question: 'We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure; guaranteed pure butter within the 3rd and 7th sects. of the Margarine Act 1887.' . . . The defendant intends to rely on the foregoing as a defence to this summons."

On the 4th Aug. the appellant had purchased the butter of the wholesale house, and on the invoice was stated: "We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure." The appellant was dissatisfied with this, and, when going to the wholesale house the following week, and after the butter was delivered, took the invoice to the wholesale house, who put on it: "Guaranteed pure butter in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1887. In case of samples being taken for analysis, show this warranty to the inspector."

Held, that the notice of the 2nd Nov. was a good notice of a defence under sect. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant, under sect. 6 of the Food and Drugs Act 1875, for that the appellant, on the 5th Oct. 1903, at his shop, by one of his employees, did unlawfully and wilfully sell to the respondent, and to his prejudice, as and for a certain article of food—to wit, butter—a certain article of food which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article of food demanded by him, the same containing 18.75 per cent. of water, contrary to the statute and the regulations of the Board of Agriculture in such case made and provided.

Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted by the appellant that the respondent, on the date named in the summons, purchased from him a pound of butter for analysis, and that the respondent had, in connection with such purchase, complied with all the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act of 1875 and 1899 in relation to a purchase for analysis.

Furthermore, the appellant did not dispute the analyst's certificate, showing that the butter contained 18.75 of moisture, being 2.75 in excess of the standard fixed by the Board of Agriculture in the Sale of Butter Regulations 1902, but he relied for his defence upon a warranty under sect. 25 of the Food and Drugs Act 1875, as amended by sect. 20 of the Food and Drugs Act 1899.

Before the defence was opened the respondent took the objection that such defence was not available to the appellant, inasmuch as his notice of intention to rely upon the warranty did not comply with the requirements of sect. 20 of the Food and Drugs Act 1899, as it was not accompanied by a copy of the invoice or alleged warranty relating to the butter purchased by him.

The following is a copy of the notice of Nov. 2, 1903:

With reference to the summons issued by you on the 26th Oct. against Fred Farthing, of 323, Ainsworth-road, Radcliffe, for selling you adulterated butter on the 5th Oct., and which summons was served upon our client on the 30th Oct., we beg to give you formal notice that our client purchased the same butter with a written warranty from George Little Limited, general provision merchants, of 84, Corporation-street, Manchester. The following is a copy of the warranty in question: "We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure; guaranteed pure butter in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1887." The defendant sold the butter in question in the same state as purchased, and at the time when he sold it had no reason to believe that it was otherwise. The defendant intends to rely on the foregoing as a defence to this summons.

The following is a copy of the whole invoice or warranty at the time of sale given in respect of the purchase of the butter by the appellant:

We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure.—GEO. LITTLE LIMITED, GEO. W. LITTLE.

Before giving their decision upon the objection the justices decided to hear the appellant's case.

In support of the defence the following facts were admitted or proved in evidence:

The appellant in due time, as required by the statute by his solicitors, wrote and sent to the respondents and to Messrs. Geo. Little Limited (the wholesale merchants from whom the appellant purchased the butter) the letter, a copy of which is set out above.

The appellant on the 4th Aug. 1903, in the ordinary course of his business, called upon Messrs. Geo. Little Limited at their warehouse in Manchester to buy some Irish butter, and he was shown by Mr. Little certain Irish butter. The appellant cut and tasted the same, and then and there asked Mr. Little whether the firm would give him a warranty with the butter in question. Mr. Little replied that he would give the appellant the fullest warranty, such warranty to be put upon the invoice. The appellant, relying upon this

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B. Div.]

FARTHING (app.) v. PARKINSON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

undertaking, thereupon agreed to and did purchase twenty firkins of the butter.

On the same day—namely, the 4th Aug.—in the ordinary course of business, the invoice for the firkins of butter (a copy of which is set out above) was made out and sent to the appellant, together with six of the same twenty firkins of butter.

The appellant, being dissatisfied with the warranty as originally written upon the invoice, upon his next journey into Manchester the following week, but after delivery of the butter described and comprised in the invoice, personally took the original invoice back to Messrs. Little Limited and told them it was not as full as he had expected, and that he should prefer to have it strengthened.

Thereupon Messrs. Geo. Little Limited indorsed upon the original invoice the further words following:

Guaranteed pure butter in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1887. In case of samples being taken for analysis, show this warranty to the inspector.—GEO. LITTLE LIMITED.

The remainder of the twenty firkins of butter were delivered to the appellant on the 6th Aug. 1903, prior to the invoice being altered by the addition of these words.

The pound of butter purchased by the respondent was out of the twenty firkins so purchased by the appellant from Messrs. Geo. Little Limited, and was comprised within and covered by the same warranty or warranties upon which the appellant made his purchase, and the appellant had purchased it as the same article in nature, substance, and quality, as that demanded of him by the respondent on the 5th Oct. 1903, and he sold it to the respondent in the same state as purchased by him, and he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it to the respondent it was otherwise.

On the close of the appellant's case the respondent again contended (a) that the defence of warranty under sect. 25 of the Food and Drugs Act 1875 was not available to the appellant, as the letter of the 2nd Nov. was not a sufficient compliance with the form of sect. 20 of the Food and Drugs Act 1899, inasmuch as it was not accompanied by a copy of the invoice or warranty relating to the purchase; and the respondent also contended (b) that the copy warranty contained in the letter of Nov. 2nd was not a correct copy, because it included words of warranty which were not originally upon the invoice at the time the property in the goods passed or when the same were delivered, and such words having been reduced into writing after the date of the purchase were not available as a warranty under sect. 25 of the Act.

The appellant in reply contended (a) that the general warranty originally upon the invoice was sufficient without regarding the supplemental warranty indorsed afterwards; (b) that the original warranty being a general one, the letter of the 2nd Nov. was a sufficient compliance with the 20th section of the 1899 Act without sending a copy of the invoice as well; (c) that the supplemental warranty indorsed under the circumstances set out above was good and available as a warranty within the meaning of sect. 25 of the Food and Drugs Act 1875 as it was, he contended, not necessary for a warranty which is in fact contracted for (as in this case) to be reduced into writing at the time of the contract; (d) that if the respondent's objection to the supplemental warranty was good, the fact that the words of it had been included in the letter of the 2nd Nov. did not prevent such letter from being a good notice of the original warranty.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant had proved what would have been a good warranty had it been available as a defence, but being also of opinion that the letter of the 2nd Nov. was not a good notice within the meaning of sect. 20 of the Food and Drugs Act 1899, they considered the appellant was debarred from relying upon it as a defence, and they accordingly convicted the appellant upon the information.

By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 25:

If the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove to the satisfaction of the justices or court that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, he shall be discharged from the prosecution, but shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor, unless he shall have given due notice to him that he will rely on the above defence.

By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 20 (1):

A warranty or invoice shall not be available as a defence to any proceeding under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts unless the defendant has within seven days after service of the summons sent to the purchaser a copy of such warranty or invoice, with a written notice stating that he intends to rely on the warranty or invoice, and specifying the name and address of the person from whom he received it, and has also sent a like notice of his intention to such person.

Avory, K.C. (Biron with him) for the appellant.

—The letter sent contained the written warranty, and therefore it was a statement of what the warranty was. As the warranty originally stood it was quite sufficient, and it was only ex abundantia cautela that the subsequent words were added to make it beyond dispute. All that is required under these sections is that there shall be a notice to the prosecution that you are going to rely on the warranty, and that its terms shall be set out. The real complaint here is that we have given the prosecution too much information; in fact, we have given them more than is necessary. He referred to Irving v. Callow Park Dairy Company; Bacon v. Same, 87 L. T. Rep. 70.

Gordon Hewart for the respondent.—The words on the invoice originally were not a sufficient warranty. The words, "or invoice," in sect. 20 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 refer back to the Margarine Act of 1887, because, under sect. 7 of that Act the invoice is sufficient—that is to say, it is enough under that Act that the commodity should have been bought as butter. There must not only have been a warranty, but there must have been a written warranty contemporaneous with the contract of sale. It is misleading to add words in the notice which are added to the warranty afterwards. The statute provides the warranty shall be a written warranty with which the butter was purchased. The cases of Farmers' Cleveland Dairy Company v. Stevenson (63 L. T. Rep. 776; 17 Cox C. C. 481), Laidlaw v. Wilson (1894) 1 Q. B. 74, and Elliot v. Pilcher (85 L. T. Rep. 50; (1901) 2 K. B. 817) are different from this case. The Act provides that what is to be sent by the defendant is a copy of the warranty—that is to say, a copy of the warranty which is a contemporaneous description. If the defendant was going to rely upon a warranty contained upon the invoice he ought to have sent a copy of the whole of the invoice with the warranty upon it. Even if it were not necessary to send a complete copy of the invoice, the notice here was bad, because the later words were added. They were certainly not words of warranty upon which the butter had been purchased.

Avory, K.C. in reply.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion a great many points have been raised in this case that do not arise, and on which I do not intend to express my opinion at all. If, for instance, under sect 20, the person setting up the warranty has thought fit to add words which would alter the character of the warranty, which was truly given, to make them more in his own favour, and has said, "This is my warranty," and the magistrates have before them, or are satisfied that that is added for the purpose of putting something which was not the warranty at the time, I do not say whether or not we ought to allow the defence to be set up. The only point which I decide is that this section is a procedure section amending the original sect. 25, giving certain protection to prosecutors, and giving certain rights to the person who is called in by virtue of the warranty. Sect. 25 says that if the defendant proves to the satisfaction of the justices that he purchased the article as the same in nature and substance, with a written warranty to that effect, and he had no reason to believe it to be otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state, he is discharged, but he shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor, unless he shall have given due notice that he will rely upon that defence. That left it to a certain extent in doubt as to what the prosecutor was to be told. Then came sect. 20, which undoubtedly was partly framed on sect. 7 of the Margarine Act, which had provided that a person should also be allowed to set up a written warranty or invoice. The words, "or invoice," came from that, and there are cases in which the warranty is only to be implied from the invoice. Therefore, when the Legislature came to amend the Act, they had to deal with the first Act, which spoke of a warranty, and the second Act, which spoke of a warranty or invoice. The section says: "A warranty or invoice shall not be available as a defence" unless the defendant has sent to the purchaser a copy of such warranty or invoice, with a written notice stating that he intends to rely upon the warranty or invoice. The reason the words, "or invoice," are added in that section was because in the beginning of the section they said, "warranty or invoice shall not be available," and, to construe the section reasonably, it means that, if you rely on a warranty under sect. 25, you should send a copy of the warranty; if you rely on an invoice you should send a copy of the invoice. But I can only repeat that which I said in Bacon v. Callow Park Dairy Company (87 L. T. Rep. 70), and the argument in this case has not made me think that I went too far—that the section meant a copy of that which entitled the defendant to believe that the article was the same in nature, substance, and quality as that which is to be sent, and prima facie it means a copy of the terms of the warranty on which the defendant bought. I have never said anything, to my knowledge, to indicate that I do not think the warranty ought not to be in writing. On the contrary, I pointed out in Bacon's case and another case which is referred to there, that under sect. 25, and under all the sections, the warranty must be in writing. The whole point there was, the warranty being "pure milk, with all its cream," which words were put on each churn, and were given in pursuance of a verbal contract, I held that the previous contract to give the warranty need not be in writing, but the warranty itself under which the goods were bought must be in writing. I have heard nothing to-day to the contrary, and I certainly now do not entertain any opinion to the contrary. Now, what happened in this case? I think the defendant may be quite entitled to say: I did buy these goods on the terms of the written warranty, but whether that involved both documents or only one I express no opinion about. I only say he may be entitled to say, when the case comes to be dealt with, that the only warranty may be that on which the goods were bought, and which contained the first words: "We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure." At present I have not been able to understand, and I have read the section as carefully as I can, the subsequent part, which contains the words: "Guaranteed pure butter, in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1877." I do not understand they add anything at all to the words "absolutely pure." Therefore I view this case as a case at any rate in which, even if you take the two sets of words together, the warranty was exactly the same, and it is not suggested there was any fraud here, or that the defendant did not mean to set up the warranty. What has he said? He has told the prosecutor from whom he bought the butter that he bought it under a warranty. That was this warranty: "We guarantee all butters sold by us to be absolutely pure." And he meant also to rely upon the warranty: "Guaranteed pure butter, in accordance with the 3rd and 7th sections of the Margarine Act 1887." The ground of my decision is that the magistrates ought not as a preliminary objection to decide the point as to what was the warranty under which the goods were sold. They have got to deal with it when they come to the substantive defence under the 25th section of the Act of 1875 and the 20th section of the Act of 1899, where it speaks about the article being the same in nature, substance, and quality. Then there might be a case for the determination by the magistrates. A point was made by Mr. Hewart which I certainly was unable to follow, when he was contending that the invoice ought to have been sent as well. He said the justices should have found the butter was Listowel Roses. I desire to point out not one single word in this case has been proved directly or indirectly as to

FARTHING (app.) v. PARKINSON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Listowel Roses giving any information for the purposes of a warranty, and I cannot help thinking that is an argument introduced to meet a case that certainly was never made in the court below. I come to the point which was taken, and which certainly seems to me the best argument proceeded upon, a point which developed in the course of the case and which was not the point the prosecutor originally desired to take. Before the case was opened the prosecutor said that the letter of the 2nd Nov. did not comply with the requirements as to sending a copy of such warranty or a copy of such invoices. I pointed out, and I cannot repeat myself, that a "copy of warranty" means copy of warranty, and "a copy of invoice" means "a copy of invoice." Then at the close of the case the prosecutor contended again it was not a proper invoice, because it was not accompanied by a copy of the notice or warranty relating to the purchase, and then that the copy was not a correct copy, because it included words of warranty which were not upon the original invoice at the time the property in the goods passed. If those additional words did not form part of the contract, did not form part of the warranty, or if they added something, then when the magistrates come to deal with this case they will have to say whether the goods were not bought with these additional words, but I cannot think it right, under the 20th section, that a man cannot bonâ fide set up the defence under the section on giving a full copy of what he intends to rely upon, or that he is not then entitled to open that defence, especially as sub-sect. 2 of the same section allows the person to come and give evidence. I think, therefore, the magistrates ought to have heard the case on the warranty before they decided it.

WILLS, J.—I have come with some hesitation to the same conclusion, and my concurrence in the judgment which has been delivered is upon the ground that I think sect. 20 of the Act of 1899, which requires a copy of the warranty to be delivered to the complainant, did not mean to say that under all circumstances the warranty must be correctly set out when there is room for the contention as to what the warranty actually was under which the goods were sold. It seems to me that in many cases to say that would deprive the defendant of a perfectly good defence, because he might be wrong in his construction of what the warranty actually was. I think the Act did not mean to deprive him of the power of saying that in his view and intention upon the evidence the warranty was such as he had set out in his copy, although it might prove to be erroneous when the matter came to be contested. Of course I assume for the purpose of anything I am saying that what has been done is bonâ fide, if it is not bonâ fide then cadet questio. Nobody feels more strongly than I do that it would never do to say or do anything which should encourage a person who has bought under a warranty to improve that warranty for the purpose of stopping a prosecution, because it might very well be that if he were at liberty to add terms which he alleged were part of the original warranty, which at the time were not in writing, it might very well be if he had added the words it would stop the prosecution, where if he had simply given a copy of that which was in existence at the time the article was bought it would not have had that effect. If anything of that kind could possibly be the case, then I should say the Act certainly was not complied with. In this case the added words have really added nothing, and therefore the substance and effect of the warranty is perfectly truly set out in that which is said to be a copy. As long as the added matter really added nothing to the sense, it certainly is not open to any of the objections which I have pointed out, and which I feel fully the force of, and in a proper case would be prepared to give full effect to. Therefore it comes to this, that the case must not be stopped, the magistrates must inquire what the warranty was under which the goods were sold, and whether the man has bought them upon the warranty which he represents. If he has bought them upon a written warranty, which is to all intents and purposes exactly the same, I do not see that any harm has been done by the addition of the words—namely, the addition which is complained of here. It will remain for the magistrates to inquire, under sect. 25, whether the actual written warranty under which the goods were bought is a good and sufficient one; whether it comes up to the terms of sect. 25.

KENNEDY, J.—I think this is a difficult case, and I share my brother Wills' feeling that it is a case which certainly the magistrates, in my view, should not take it that we are deciding any question of law as to the sufficiency either of the document as it stood before the alteration or of the document as it stood after the addition of the words. Mr. Ivory, in the course of the argument, seemed to indicate that he was prepared to contend that it would be sufficient that there was a contract, oral or not, in the original document, in the nature of a warranty after the delivery of the goods, upon which the question arose for prosecution after the sale. As far as I am concerned, I am not bound to consider any of those points, nor is my Lord or my brother Wills, but what I do think is the right view to come to is to take a liberal construction of a statute which is, after all, intended to prescribe a necessary formality, of course to be honestly observed and fairly observed; and that is, that there is to be a copy of the invoice or warranty sent. Here a document was sent which, as it stands, may be alleged (I will say no more, because the matter is still open) to contain that which is a warranty plus something which cannot come, within the fair meaning of the statute, under the title of warranty, something that has been a dead letter. The recipient, therefore, has got a copy of the warranty. He has got something there which is said also to be a part of the warranty, but which may not be, according to the law, a part of the warranty, or to be treated as such. It is clear in some cases that a difficult point may arise, and even with good faith, on a warranty which is sent which may be different from the thing which is proved in court when lawyers come to handle it, and where the recipient, without any authority on the part of the other party, has considered it entirely differently. I can conceive such a case arising on correspondence, and I agree that when the case arises it will have to be considered. I should not feel myself bound by this particular document of to-day. Suppose, for a moment, interlaced with words which a lawyer would find to have been given as a warranty, there were

TEWKESBURY GUARDIANS v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS.

[K.B. Div.]

words which materially altered, enlarged, or amplified the document, and it was held not to be a copy, because it contained differently the words of warranty, that might lead to a case to be argued. So also with other clauses or words which made the real warranty a very different one to that set out. I think the difficulty is in drawing the line, but here I do not think we should express what ought to be held as a matter of opinion, or something in the nature of an intimation. Therefore I think the case will have to go back. It will be recollected the magistrates put in their case: "We were of opinion that the appellant had proved what would have been a good warranty had it been available as a defence, but being also of opinion that the letter of the 2nd Nov. was not a good notice within the meaning of sect. 20 of the Food and Drugs Act 1899, we considered that the appellant was debarred from relying upon it as a defence, and we accordingly convicted the appellant upon the said information, and fined him as stated." In other words, as my Lord has said, they stopped at the point when they found themselves, as they thought, faced with a good technical objection to the words, "Copy of the invoice or warranty." I think in this particular case there was that which ought here to be considered, but, after all, these things are to be dealt with on the merits, and with as little technicality as possible. I think the justices were wrong, and this case must go back.

Judgment accordingly.

TEWKESBURY GUARDIANS v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS. (a)

Poor law—Removal of pauper—Settlement—Married woman—Husband having no settlement—Derivative settlement—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

A pauper and her husband, who was a foreigner with no settlement, came to reside in the parish of Birmingham in Jan. 1901, and resided there until June 1901, when the husband went to America with no intention of deserting his wife, and with the intention of returning. The wife and her children continued to reside in the parish of Birmingham until March 1902, when they went into the workhouse.

Held, that the pauper and her children, who were all under the age of sixteen years, were irremovable from the parish of Birmingham.

CASE stated by the Recorder of Birmingham on an appeal against an order dated the 3rd Sept. 1902 for the removal from the parish of Birmingham to the parish of Bredon, in the Tewkesbury Union, of Alice Alinquist and her four children.

The pauper Alice Alinquist is the wife of Charles Alinquist, a foreigner with no settlement of his own. They were married on the 6th July 1890, and the children are the lawful issue of the pauper and Charles Alinquist, and are all of them under the age of sixteen years. Doris was born in Aug. 1892 in America. Rose was born on the 5th Jan. 1898 in the parish of West Bromwich. Herbert was born on the 17th Oct. 1899 in the parish of West Bromwich, and Charles was born on the 26th April 1902 in the workhouse infirmary in the parish of Birmingham.

The pauper Alice and her husband came to reside in the parish of Birmingham in Jan. 1901, and continued so to reside in that parish of Birmingham until the 20th June 1901, when the husband went to America to work for his brother-in-law, intending to send for his wife and children when he got settled.

The pauper Alice heard from him several times, but he said he was not able to get work, and had made up his mind to return to England. He had not returned at the date of the order of removal, but the recorder found as a fact that he did not desert his wife, and that he had the intention of returning.

From the 20th June 1901 the pauper Alice, with her three older children, continued to reside in the parish of Birmingham until the 27th March 1902, when she removed with them to the Birmingham Workhouse, where she was confined of her youngest child on the 26th April 1902. She remained there till the 19th Sept. 1902, when she went out with all her children, and has not returned.

The pauper Alice was born in 1869, and is the lawful daughter of Robert Warner, who, at the time the pauper attained the age of sixteen years, had obtained a settlement by residence in the parish of Bredon, in the Tewkesbury Union.

It was contended for the appellants that the pauper alien was irremovable by reason of her continuous residence in Birmingham for more than one year previously to her becoming chargeable, notwithstanding the temporary absence of her husband, and that the case of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (22 L. T. Rep. 440; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 364) was in point.

It was further contended on behalf of the appellants that by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35, all derivative settlements were abolished, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and of a child under the age of sixteen from its father or widowed mother, as the case may be, and that the husband of the pauper Alice, having no settlement she was irremovable; also that with regard to the children there was no derivative or other settlement which they could take, inasmuch as their father had no settlement and their mother was not a widow.

It was contended for the respondents that there was a break in the residence of the husband when he left for America on the 20th June 1901, and that the period of residence of the pauper Alice with her husband, prior to his departure, could not be added to her residence after his departure, so as to make up the full year of residence necessary for her to have acquired a status of irremovability. It was also contended on behalf of the respondents that by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35, inasmuch as the husband had no settlement, the wife became removable to the place of her maiden settlement in the Tewkesbury Union derived from her father, and that with regard to the children, as there was no settlement

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

TEWKESBURY GUARDIANS v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS.

[K B. Div.]

which they could derive from their father, they acquired the settlement of their mother, and were also removable with her to the Tewkesbury Union.

The recorder was of opinion that in the circumstances aforesaid the pauper Alice was irremovable from the parish of Birmingham by reason of her continuous residence there for more than one year prior and up to the date of the order of removal, and he adopted the reasoning of the judgment in the case of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (22 L. T. Rep. 440; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 364) as applicable to the present case.

He also considered that 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 35, was a bar to the setting up of a derivative settlement of the pauper Alice from her father: (see Reg. v. Guardians of Bridgnorth (48 L. T. Rep. 600; 11 Q. B. Div. 314).

He accordingly held that neither the alleged settlement of the mother nor of the children had been made out, and he allowed the appeal with costs, and quashed the order of removal.

The questions for the opinion of the court were as follows: (1) was the pauper Alice Alinquivist, at the time the order of removal was made, irremovable from the parish of Birmingham; (2) if not, was the pauper Alice Alinquivist or were any of her children properly removable to the Tewkesbury Union?

By the Poor Removal Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66), s. 1:

Whereas it is expedient that the laws relating to the removal of the poor should be amended: Be it enacted that from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for [one year] next before the application for the warrant; provided always that the time during which such person shall be a prisoner in a prison or shall be serving Her Majesty as a soldier, marine, or sailor, or reside as an in-pensioner in Greenwich or Chelsea Hospitals, or shall be confined in a lunatic asylum, or house duly licensed, or hospital registered for the reception of lunatics, or as a patient in a hospital, or during which any such person shall receive relief from any parish, or shall be wholly or in part maintained by any rate or subscription raised in a parish in which such person does not reside, not being a bonâ fide charitable gift, shall, for all purposes, be excluded in the computation of time hereinbefore mentioned, and that the removal of a pauper lunatic to a lunatic asylum under the provisions of any Act relating to the maintenance and care of pauper lunatics shall not be deemed a removal within the meaning of this Act; . . . [here followed a proviso.]

By the Poor Removal Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111), s. 1:

Whereas by an Act passed in the 10th year of the reign of Her Majesty, intituled, &c. (reciting 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, s. 1), and whereas by reason of the generality of the expressions used in the last proviso, doubts are entertained as to the meaning thereof, and it is desirable to remove such doubts: Be it therefore enacted that the said last proviso be repealed, and that instead thereof the following be enacted: provided always that whenever any person should have a wife or children having no other settlement than his or her own such wife and children should be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would be removable notwithstanding any provision of the said recited Act, and should not be removable from any parish or place from which he or she would not be removable by reason of any provision in the said recited Act.

By the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35:

No person shall be deemed to have derived a settlement from any other person, whether by parentage, estate, or otherwise, except in the case of a wife from her husband, and in the case of a child under the age of sixteen, which child shall take the settlement of its father or its widowed mother, as the case may be, up to that age, and shall retain the settlement so taken until it shall acquire another. An illegitimate child shall retain the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement. If any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent, without inquiring into the derivative settlement of such parents, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born.

Pritchett (Macmorran, K.C. with him) for the Birmingham Guardians.—The question raised here is whether the pauper Alice was irremovable from the parish of Birmingham, she being a married woman whose husband was a foreigner, and had no settlement, such husband having left her with an intention to return. Since her husband left her the pauper has not resided for a sufficient time to give her a status of irremovability, but the learned recorder has added two periods to give her that status, namely, the time before the husband left and the time after he left until she became chargeable to the union. The learned recorder based his decision on the reasoning in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (22 L. T. Rep. 440; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 364) as applicable to the present case. In that case a pauper, having a maiden settlement in the parish of Limehouse, had resided for more than a year in the parish of St. George, and married a foreign sailor who had no settlement. They resided together in the parish of St. George until the husband left, intending to return, but having made no provision for the pauper's maintenance. She continued to reside in the parish of St. George and became chargeable, but the husband had not resided one year in this parish. It was there held that the pauper was irremovable from St. George's parish by reason of the continuous residence before and during marriage, and that she was not affected by the proviso in the Poor Removal Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111). Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (sup.) has been overruled by the House of Lords in Medway Union v. Bedminster Union (61 L. T. Rep. 733; 14 App. Cas. 465). In that case the husband of a pauper had resided in a parish within the Medway Union for more than three years before his death, and after his death she continued to reside with her children in the same parish for three months. She and her children subsequently became chargeable to the Bedminster Union, and it was there held that the widow and children were rightly removed into the Medway Union, as her husband had at the time of his death a settlement in that union, and that the widow and children took that settlement under sect. 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876, but not on the ground that the widow had acquired an original settlement by residence in that union. The view of Lopes, L.J. as to sect. 34 of the Act of 1876 where he said (61 L. T. Rep., at p. 36; 21 Q. B. Div., at p. 233):

K.B. Div.]

TEWKESBURY GUARDIANS v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS.

[K.B. Div.]

"The important question is as to the meaning of the words 'any person' in sect. 34. I think they mean persons sui juris who are capable of acquiring a settlement or status of irremovability for themselves, and do not include unemancipated women and children under covertures. . . . During his life she cannot do anything to acquire a status of irremovability in her own right or a settlement, but her status and settlement follows and changes with his," is approved by Lord Watson in the House of Lords, who says: "I am of opinion with Lopes, L.J. that the father having at the time of his death acquired a settlement under sect. 34, his widow and children took his settlement under sect. 35." That case in the House of Lords shows that a wife living with her husband who has an original settlement, has not during the subsistence of her derivative settlement from him the capacity to acquire by residence another settlement of the same quality and in the same parish. Break of residence by the husband is also a break of residence by the wife, although the wife remains resident in the union, and the period she has resided as a wife cannot in such a case be added to the residence as a widow:

Reg. v. Llanelly, 17 Q. B. 40;

Reg. v. Manchester Overseers, 45 L. T. Rep. 679; 8 Q. B. Div. 50.

In order for there to be a break of residence there need not be any intention to desert, but where a husband has no settlement, or if he has abandoned his wife or is absent when she becomes chargeable, she may be removed to her maiden settlement. He referred to

Reg. v. St. Mary-le-bone, 16 Q. B. 352.

Here there has been a break of residence, and so the two periods of residence cannot be added together. The wife, therefore, has acquired no status of irremovability, and is thrown back on her maiden settlement. He referred to

Rex v. Ryton, Cald. 39;

Reg. v. St. Mary-le-bone, 16 Q. B. 353;

Poor Removal Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66), s. 1;

Poor Removal Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 111), s. 1.

Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), s. 35.

It is true that in Reg. v. Bridgnorth (11 Q. B. Div. 314, s.c. Madeley Union v. Bridgnorth Union (48 L. T. Rep. 600), it was held that in determining the settlement of a wife or child you could not go beyond the husband or the father of the person to be removed, but that case was treated as overruled by Reigate Union v. Croydon Union (61 L. T. Rep. 733; 14 App. Cas. 465), and the law on this point is that laid down in West Ham Union v. St. Giles-in-the-Fields (63 L. T. Rep. 496; 25 Q. B. Div. 272). This being so, the order of removal of the pauper and her children was rightly made, as the husband having no settlement the wife was properly removable to her maiden settlement which she got from her father. As the children could not acquire any settlement from their father, they acquired their mother's settlement, and so would have to be removed with her. He also referred to

Dorchester Union v. Poplar Union, 59 L. T. Rep. 687; 21 Q. B. Div. 88;

Milford Union v. Wayland Union, 63 L. T. Rep. 299; 25 Q. B. Div. 164.

B. Cunningham Glen for the Tewkesbury Guardians.—The case here turns on status of irremovability, and not on any question of settlement. Sect. 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 deals with settlement made up by irremovability. Turning to sect. 35, that section deals with settlement, and not with irremovability at all. Whichever of the two ways this case is looked at, the decision of the learned recorder was right, for if the pauper is within the proviso added by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 111, s. 1, to sect. 1 of the Poor Removal Act 1846, then the case of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East is in point, and she is irremovable from Birmingham. If she is not within that proviso, she is not removable, because her husband, if he had been living with her, would not have been removable, and she is in the same position as he would have been. It is here found as a fact that the husband did not desert his wife, and he had the intention of returning. That distinguishes this case from Reg. v. St. Marylebone (sup.) and Reg. v. Llanelly (sup.). Residence for three years, partly while under the age of sixteen and partly when over that age, has been held to be sufficient to give a settlement in Highworth and Swindon Union v. Westbury-on-Severn Union (61 L. T. Rep. 733; 14 App. Cas. 465). This being so, by analogy the two periods of the pauper's residence can be added together, and in fact, there has been no break in the pauper's residence, and she has acquired a status of irremovability. Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (sup.) is precisely in point. He also referred to

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I always, I am afraid, shall feel the same diffidence in expressing an opinion in these cases. I repeat what I said not many months ago, that I cannot imagine anything more likely to impair and destroy any judicial capacities a man may possess than an endeavour to decide these pauper removal cases, and I hope they will not come very frequently to this court. But I am of opinion that the decision is right, and substantially for the grounds that the learned recorder has stated. Now, we heard a most learned and interesting argument from Mr. Pritchett, who invited us to consider the principles on which a number of cases have been decided, and endeavoured very logically and clearly to my mind to show that a good many of these principles had been destroyed, and were inconsistent with not the last case, but with one of the cases in the House of Lords—Medway Union v. Bedminster Union (61 L. T. Rep. 733; 14 App. Cas. 465). If it had been necessary to follow Mr. Pritchett through the whole of that argument, and to endeavour to reconcile all the cases, I think the task would have been almost hopeless, but I agree and I think: the result of his argument was to show that he was quite justified in saying that it was extremely difficult to lay down any rule which is consistent with all the cases. I doubt myself whether for the purpose of the decision in this case it is necessary to decide whether the period during which a wife is living with her husband can or cannot be counted or considered for any purposes of her acquiring a settlement or status of irremovability in her own right. I do not think any case has gone as far as deciding that that is the state of things. I do not think Lopes, L.J. meant to say that. I think what Lopes, L.J. meant to point out was that the wife was deriving or might have derived a settlement through her husband, and that it was the question whether or not she had derived that settlement through her husband, which was in one sense the important matter or might be the governing fact in that particular case. All I desire to say is whether it be right or wrong, but I take it to be right, because I understand the Court of Appeal (1904) 2 K. B. 121 has affirmed our decision in West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union (89 L. T. Rep. 609; (1903) 2 K. B. 627) that to a certain extent that would seem to show that that principle cannot be altogether very strictly applied, and cannot be applied as strictly as Mr. Pritchett contended for. If it be true that the period during which a woman is married has no value whatever except for the purpose of conferring upon her a settlement which is that of her husband, it seems to me it might have been equally well contended that the time during which a child was under sixteen would have no effect for the purpose of the child acquiring a settlement by residence. In the view I take of this case, however, it is not necessary to decide that. All I am prepared to say is that I do not accede to that part of Mr. Pritchett's argument that it is necessary to decide this case upon. The short ground, if I may so call it, upon which I want to decide this case is that in substance I think the learned recorder was right in saying that the principle of the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (22 L. T. Rep. 440; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 364) applies, and I myself am not able to see that that case is indirectly, certainly not directly, overruled by the House of Lords. It is not referred to in any of the judgments, and I cannot see anything that makes the reasoning upon this part of the case inconsistent with anything which the House of Lords has said. The reasons which he gives, and which I will not repeat, I venture respectfully to adopt as being to my mind conclusive in a case where a husband has left a wife but not deserted her under circumstances which are found as a matter of fact not to amount to desertion. When the husband has left the wife under circumstances which are found as a matter of fact to indicate an intention to return, and when the husband could not be removed—I do not like to even venture on the expression acquiring a status of irremovability, because I am not sure that that might not be used against me hereafter—I think Lord Blackburn points out very good reasons why the wife could not be removed. That seems to me to be part of the reasoning of the case of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (sup.), which I adopt, and which I respectfully venture to think is sound. Had the husband been here he could not have been removed either before the twelve months or after. Of course, if he had been here for twelve months then Lopes, L.J.'s judgment would have applied directly. The wife would then have acquired what is called the status of irremovability by virtue of having resided with her husband for a period of twelve months, but it seems to me that we ought to find clear, plain, and distinct language to say that the wife who has in fact resided shall be removable to her maiden settlement in a case in which a husband not having deserted her, and meaning to come back, cannot himself be removed. I think it is pretty plain that the wife does not come within either the original or the amending Act. If it is right that the wife could only be removed when the husband can be removed, then the position is pretty clear. I am very glad to have had the suggestion of what that proviso may mean, but I share a great deal more of the difficulty of Lord Blackburn, even if I had his ability to solve the matter. I think that proviso in the amending Act is one of the most incomprehensible things I have ever had to consider. All I have to decide in this case is this: Here the woman came within the enacting part of the 1st section; she does not come within, in my opinion, the terms of the proviso as I understand it. Therefore it seems to me that unless it is necessary to hold that Mr. Pritchett's proposition must be right—namely, that you cannot consider at all what has been happening to her during the period of coverture when she had been residing with her husband, if it is unnecessary to consider that, inasmuch as the husband could not be removed, I think that those who claim the wife should be removed fail on the principle which Lord Blackburn has laid down. This woman having resided here, there is no state of things which would have made the husband removable if he had been here, and for the present purposes, whether you call it irremovability or not being able to remove him it is a different way of stating that which leads to the same result—namely, that the wife cannot be removed. I therefore come to the conclusion that the order was right, and, as I have said more than once, on the ground that the learned recorder thinks—namely, that the principle of Lord Blackburn's judgment applies. I concur in that view, therefore I think this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I have come with much difficulty to the same conclusion. I need hardly say with much difficulty, because the legislation upon this subject is obscure beyond the power of words to reconcile. Amongst other things, we have to consider a proviso which has been described already in judicial decisions as an example of how language can be used to conceal meaning; and we have also to consider the 34th and 35th sections of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act of 1876, the 35th section of which is a kind of Chinese puzzle, and is beyond measure to interpret. Fortunately, with regard to the interpretation of that there is a kind of paraphrase of it which has been given by Lord Watson, which helps one more than one is helped with regard to many other parts of the enactments upon this difficult subject. Indeed it is admitted, I think, by Mr. Pritchett, with regard to whose argument I wish to indorse all that my Lord has said—so far as my judgment is concerned it has been very able and very interesting and very thorough—that, unless Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East (sup.) is overruled, it governs this case.

K.B. Div.]

TEWKESBURY GUARDIANS v. BIRMINGHAM GUARDIANS.

[K.B. Div.]

Now I understand the reason for supposing it is overruled by the case in the House of Lords of Medway Union v. Bedminster Union (sup.) is that the reasoning in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East is founded partly on the case of Reg. v. Glossop (12 Q. B. 117) and to some extent follows the same lines, and that Reg. v. Glossop has been disapproved of in this case in the House of Lords—that is to say, not the decision of Reg. v. Glossop, but the grounds on which it was arrived at. It was Medway Union v. Bedminster Union itself in which the decision was approved, but the grounds were disapproved of. If I thought that Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East was really overruled by the case in the House of Lords, of course I should neglect it; but it does not seem to me that the reasoning in the House of Lords goes so far as that. What was said about Reg. v. Glossop was that the House disagreed with the view of the majority of the court and agreed with that of Lopes, L.J. Then when we come to see what Lopes, L.J.'s view was, as explained by Lord Watson, it was that where the wife has a derivative settlement from her husband he does not think the wife has the capacity to acquire by residence another settlement in the same parish. That leaves quite untouched the present case, which is not a case where the wife has a subsisting derivative settlement through her husband, and therefore the view entertained by the House of Lords with regard to Reg. v. Glossop does not touch the facts of this case, and of course the considerations are also very different where the wife has the settlement by reason of her husband's settlement and where she has none by reason of her husband having no settlement at the time when she is residing in the parish. Under those circumstances we are, as it seems to me, driven to look at the very words of the Act, and the words of the Act are that she shall acquire the status of irremovability if she has been resident for a year before the time she has become chargeable within the parish. It is quite true that in one sense there is a difference between her residence before the husband goes away, and after he goes away, because after he goes away he himself has broken his residence, and therefore she cannot tack on simply as a wife her residence after the break of her husband to that which she had before the residence which was in process of completion before he went away, and she cannot therefore claim to have acquired the status of irremovability because her husband had acquired it. There is no decision, and if there is not a decision, I do not see why we should make one, to prevent her tacking on the residence when she had no settlement by reason of her husband not having a settlement with the residence which she had afterwards after her husband had gone away. It is not at all like the case of the wife and the widow in which case it was held that when the wife had the settlement so long as she was a wife she could not tack on afterwards the residence of her widowhood. The case is not the same, and inasmuch as it seems to me there is no decision which makes it imperative upon us to say that she has not resided, it is better to follow the language of the Act, and say that she has resided for the necessary period. Our late decision in West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union (sup.) is not entirely without its bearing upon this matter, because it does show that residence may be completed for the purpose of conferring a status of irremovability where the first portion of it was under a different capacity from the second, and was during the period during which there was a maternal settlement which existed in favour of the child. As it seems to me, there being no express enactment or decision which militates against this view, the residence may be considered as complete within the terms of the statute, and as conferring the privilege of irremovability. Although I follow what my Lord has said about the husband being, I will not say irremovable, but its being impossible to remove the husband on other grounds if he were there, I prefer to put my judgment upon the ground that I have put it—namely, that the two periods may be tacked together—because I do feel that there is a very considerable difficulty between the position of a person who cannot be removed because there is no place to remove him to, and the position of a person who otherwise might be removed and who had a place to which he could otherwise be removed, but who has acquired the protection of irremovability by reason of residence. For these reasons, imperfect as they are—I am very conscious of that—I have come to the conclusion that the learned recorder is right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion upon the facts which I think are important, and which are found thus: The woman is the wife of a man who has no settlement of his own. The man has left her, not deserted her, and with the intention of returning, and therefore he is in the position really in a sense of being treated as still residing at the place. Under those circumstances, before she becomes chargeable the woman is a married woman with her children who has resided for the statutory period which would confer upon her the status of irremovability if she could be treated as an independent personality. Is she when she becomes chargeable, to be taken away to her maiden settlement, which is the settlement of her father, which she acquired through her father at Tewkesbury, she and her children, or is she to be treated as being chargeable to Birmingham, where she is and where she has resided for the statutory time, and where she is the wife of a man who has not deserted her, who intends to come back to her and her children, and who only for the time is absent? As I understand it, if one may venture to hope one understands the principle on which a great deal of legislation has taken place, there are two important things to be considered—namely, not to separate husband and wife and children and parents—and one may assume that as far as possible the Legislature has not consciously brought about legislation which has affected those governing principles. Now, what has happened here? The husband has no settlement of his own; therefore the wife cannot take a settlement from her husband. She has resided herself as a married woman, it is true, all this time, which would otherwise give her a status of irremovability, and if she is removed to the place of her maiden settlement then there will be a grave question, to say no more, as to whether the children will be able to follow her or will be planted—as I think Mr. Pritchett happily put it—in various spots, and certainly she will be separated from her husband because her husband has no settlement where she had. He has no settlement anywhere, in fact, and the whole family would be, as it were, sent floating about to the various points that they might be directed to. Now, if the husband had a settlement there would be no question as I understand it. Her place of settlement would be his place of settlement. But where the husband has no settlement what happens? I have felt as strongly as one can do justifiably, where there is a complicated question of this kind, that no flaw can be found in the judgment of the great judge, Mr. Justice Blackburn, as he was then, in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, and Mr. Pritchett to whom I desire to join in tendering my humble tribute of thanks for his argument, frankly admitted that unless the judgment could be treated as overruled, the learned recorder was perfectly right in the judgment he came to, and it could not be upset. But it was said that case was overruled and had been treated as overruled in a number of cases, finally by the judgment of Lord Watson and the reasoning in the Medway Union v. Bedminster Union. I confess myself I entirely differ. I see no trace of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East having been overruled directly or indirectly in any of the cases including the last. On the contrary, I think the point emphasised by Lord Watson in that judgment, where he asserts his affirmance of Lopes, L.J.'s view in the Court of Appeal, pivots on the fact that the husband has a settlement, and where that is so the wife follows that settlement, and you must obey that. That does not exist here. Then can it be said that the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment 1876 has modified either the grounds upon which Lord Blackburn proceeded, or has altered any statement of his as to what he finds the law to be? That really is not suggested. It is again practically admitted, and rightly admitted, that the legislation, so far as the case of wife and husband is concerned, has not affected the statement of law upon which Lord Blackburn gave judgment in that case, the only position which is reasonably consistent, when the husband has no settlement, with the great object of keeping the family together and keeping husband and wife together, subject to this, that if the husband has a settlement of his own, the wife must follow his settlement.

Appeal dismissed.

NEW RIVER COMPANY (apps.) v. MAYOR, &C., OF WESTMINSTER (resps.). (a) Metropolis—Street opened by water company—Reinstatement of street by contractor employed by local authority—Power of local authority to recover expenses of supervising and superintending the works—Metropolis Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 114.

Where the soil of a street in the metropolis has been opened up by a water company, the local authority can by virtue of sect. 114 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 recover the expenses of superintending and supervising the filling in and making good the soil so opened up.

CASE stated on a complaint by the respondents that the appellants did neglect or refuse to pay to the respondents the sum of 89l. 9s. 8d. made up of sums amounting respectively to (a) 81l. 6s. 7d. and (b) 8l. 3s. 1d. alleged to be due to the respondents for expenses incurred in filling in, making good, and maintaining the pavement in the streets within the city of Westminster, where the same had been broken up by the appellants pursuant to the powers contained in the Act of Parliament authorising the company to execute work in the city during the month of Jan. 1903, payment of which sum had been duly demanded of the appellants by the respondents.

At the hearing of the complaint the following facts were admitted or proved:—

In Nov. 1901 the respondents issued to the appellants and the other companies and corporations having statutory powers to open up roads, a "scale of charges for reinstating trenches" to be made by the respondents after the 31st March 1902 in respect of road repairs.

In Oct. 1902 the respondents also issued another "scale of charges for reinstating trenches" to be made by the respondents after the 1st Jan. 1903.

The charges made by the respondents in the first above-mentioned scale were in excess of the actual amounts paid by them to the contractors, and were so made by the respondents to cover so-called incidental expenses (a) alleged to occur during the execution of the works, and (b) which they alleged they were or might be put to by reason of the subsidence or failure of the works during the period of the appellants' liability to maintain the same under sect. 32 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847.

The respondents made a subsequent additional increase of 10 per cent. to cover their estimate of the expenses to which they were put for superintending the works during the execution thereof. The second scale of charges did not state the ground on which the additional 10 per cent. was claimed, nor were the appellants informed of the prices in fact paid by the respondents to the contractors until the statement and evidence in relation thereto were made and given in court.

The respondents did in fact exercise some superintendence and supervision over the works.

The works in question were executed for the respondents by certain road contractors under contracts based upon a fixed scale of charges.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants (a) that it was just (within the meaning of sect. 226 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855) that the respondents should be repaid only the amounts actually paid by them to the contractors in respect of the expenses of filling in the ground and making good the pavement or soil, and that no amount ought to be paid for incidental expenses by way of insurance against future possible repairs or otherwise, but that future repairs must be dealt with as and when they became necessary; and (b) that on the true construction of sect. 114 of the Metropolis Management Act 1885 the respondents were not entitled to make any charge for supervision or superintendence, although such supervision or superintendence was in fact given, and that the same formed part of the general administrative duties of the respondents.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that by virtue of sect. 23 of the General Paving (Metropolis) Act 1817; the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, ss. 31, 32, and 34; the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, s. 114; and the Metropolis Local Management Act 1862, sect. 82, the respondents were entitled to be fully indemnified in respect of all the work which they had to do in respect of filling in trenches and restoring the streets to a state fit for traffic and that the employment of officers to superintend and supervise such work was an ordinary and necessary expense incurred by the corporation in carrying out the work of reinstatement.

The magistrate was of opinion (a) that it was just that the respondents should be repaid only the amounts actually paid by them to the contractors, and no appeal was brought from that part of his decision; and (b) that in law the respondents were entitled to recover a sum for expenses incurred in respect of the supervision or superintendence of the works.

The learned magistrate delivered the following judgment, which was annexed to the case:

I do not propose to deal with the Waterworks Clauses Act further except in so far as it extends the period to twelve months. In my view the principal Act is the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, s. 114. There is power for the vestry to break up the roads and to reinstate the pavements. The practice here between the parties is for the water companies to break up the ground and fill in the soil, but for the city, the representative of the vestry under the old Act, to reinstate the pavement. They can either reinstate the pavement personally—do it themselves—or do it by contract, or they can do it part by contract and part by themselves. Here what they charge for is the contract price plus a sum which they say represents the average reasonable sum for keeping it in repair. I think that the sum that they have made a contract to pay is a fair charge whether they pay more or less than other boroughs. I do not stop to consider that now. I will take it that they are reasonable sums, but they are only entitled to charge for the expenses they have actually incurred. They cannot charge on a question of average what might be a reasonable and probable sum. They must charge the sums they have actually spent. They might also by arrangement between the parties charge the contract sum plus 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. if they like to agree, but it is for them to prove there is such an agreement, which up to the present I have had no such proof of. An agreement between corporations is a very formal matter and must be proved in solemn form. I have had no evidence that there is such an agreement. Then the question of the 10 per cent. is now the only point I have to consider. The question is really as to whether that is part of the expenses in making good the pavement. If two persons were to arrange that one was to dig a trench and another was to repair the pavement—private individuals—it would be important that they should have somebody, such as a surveyor, to see the work was properly done; it is to the benefit of both parties that the work should be properly done. The charge of 10 per cent. for supervision I take it includes also surveyor's expenses, which as between individuals would be charged like a surveyor's or architect's expenses. Whether 10 per cent. is a reasonable sum I have not yet decided, but I think they are entitled to charge a sum for supervision. If 10 per cent. is agreed on as a reasonable sum I think they may properly charge that. I propose to leave open really the question of quantum with regard to the balance. I think I have expressed my view of the law. The matter is important to both parties, and most likely the parties would like to have a case stated in order that they might have a decision of the court on that point.

After hearing the case the magistrate made an order against the appellants for the recovery (1) of the sum of 73*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* in respect of claim (a) of the respondents, and (2) of a sum (to be hereafter assessed by him if necessary) in respect of claim (b) of the respondents.

By 57 Geo. 3, c. xxix (the General Paving (Metropolis) Act 1817, s. 23, it is (inter alia) enacted as follows:

That when and as often as any payment of any streets or public places in any parochial or other districts within the jurisdiction of this Act shall be broken or taken up by any water or gaslight company, or by any commissioners of sewers, or by any person or persons acting by or under their respective orders or authorities, or by any other person or persons by the directions of this Act or by and with or without the consent of the commissioners or trustees or other persons having the control of the pavements in any parochial or other district wherein any street or public place shall be situate the pavement whereof or any part whereof shall be broken or taken up, then all such part or parts of the pavements of any such street or public place which from time to time and at all times shall be broken and taken up as aforesaid and the pavement contiguous thereto as far as may be rendered necessary in the judgment of a surveyor of pavements to such commissioners, or trustees, or other persons having the control of pavements in such parochial or other districts, and after the ground opened shall be refilled and rammed down pursuant to the directions of this Act, shall be with all convenient speed completely and substantially repaved with all necessary stones, ballast, gravel, and other materials, and shall be kept in complete repair by the pavior or mason then contracting with or employed by such commissioners or trustees, or other persons, or by such person or persons, as they may from time to time appoint for that purpose under the inspection and direction and to the satisfaction of the said surveyor of pavements to the said commissioners or trustees or other persons for the periods following (that is to say), all such part or parts of the pavements of any such street or public place which from time to time and at all times shall be so broken or taken up as aforesaid, and the pavement contiguous thereto as aforesaid which shall be so broken or taken up for the purpose of making and laying down any main or mains of pipes, or of substituting iron for wooden pipes, or of making any sewer, vault, or drain for twelve calendar months next ensuing the breaking and taking up of the same pavements, and all such part or parts of the pavements of any such street or public place which from time to time and at all times shall be so broken or taken up as aforesaid, and the pavement contiguous thereto as aforesaid which shall be so broken or taken up for the purpose of altering the position of or of repairing any pipes, stop-cocks, or plugs, or of repairing, cleansing, or altering any sewer, vault, or drain for three calendar months next ensuing the breaking and taking up the same pavements, and that the costs, charges, and expenses of taking out any ground and filling in hard rubbish or other good materials, and of repairing and keeping in necessary repair for the periods aforesaid all or any such pavement in manner aforesaid, and all the expenses of cartage and all other charges and expenses attending the same, as well as all costs and charges which may be incurred pursuant to the directions of this Act by any surveyor of pavements in and about executing and performing any works or matters neglected to be executed and performed by any company or commissioners of sewers as hereinbefore directed, shall be ascertained and fixed from time to time by the surveyor of pavements to such commissioners or trustees, or other persons within whose parochial or other districts such works and other matters shall have been performed and executed, or such pavements shall have been broken up and repaved.

By sect. 28 of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 17 (the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847), which Act, with the exception of certain sections not affecting this case, is incorporated in the New River Company's Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clx.), power is given to the undertakers (namely, the appellants) to break up streets, &c., under the superintendence of the persons having the control or management thereof (namely, the respondents) or of their officer. By sect. 31 of the Act it is provided that streets are not to be broken up except under the superintendence of such persons as aforesaid, but if they fail to superintend the undertakers may perform the work without them, and by sect. 32 of the Act it is provided that the streets, &c., broken up by the undertakers are to be reinstated by them without delay. By sect. 34 of the Act it is provided that in case of delay by the undertakers other parties (namely, the respondents) may cause the work so delayed or omitted to be executed, and the expense of executing the same shall be repaid to such persons by the undertakers.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 (the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855), s. 114, it is enacted as follows:

Provided also that whenever the permanent surface or soil of any street is broken up or opened it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which the same is situate, in case they think it expedient so to do, to fill in the ground and to make good the pavement or surface or soil so broken up or opened, and to carry away the rubbish occasioned thereby instead of permitting such work to be done by the company or person by whom such surface or soil is broken up or opened, and the expenses of filling in such ground and of making good the pavement or soil so broken up or opened shall be repaid on demand to the vestry or board by such company or person.

By sect. 225 of the last-mentioned Act it is enacted as follows:

In every case where the amount of any damage, costs, or expenses is by this Act directed to be ascertained or recovered in a summary manner, or the amount of any damage, costs, or expenses is by this Act directed to be paid, and the method of ascertaining the amount or enforcing the payment thereof is not provided for such amount shall in case of dispute be ascertained and determined by and shall be recovered before two justices.

By virtue of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act 1839, s. 14, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, s. 33, the proceedings may be taken in the metropolis before a single metropolitan police magistrate.

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102 (the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862), s. 82, it is enacted as follows:

In every case in which any company or person shall be liable under the firstly recited Act (the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855) to reinstate the pavement, surface, or soil of any street under the control of any vestry or district board which may have been broken up or opened, or to repay to such vestry or board the expenses of reinstating the pavement, surface, or soil of any street every such company or person shall be liable to reinstate the pavement, surface, or soil, or to pay the expenses of reinstating the pavement, surface, or soil, of such parts of the street as shall have been so broken up or opened, as well as of the part or parts contiguous thereto which may be affected by the works of such company or person to the reasonable satisfaction of the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or district having control over the pavements in such parish or district.

E. A. Jelf (Courthope-Munroe with him) for the appellants.—The question here is whether the respondents are entitled to charge the cost of superintending the work in addition to what they pay to their contractors. That depends on sect. 114 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 which says that "the expenses of filling in such ground and of making good the pavement or soil so broken up or opened shall be repaid on demand to the vestry or board by such company or person." [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Why does not that include the proper cost of supervision?] The local authority have to see generally to the supervision of all the various works under their control. That is part of their general duties, and all we have to pay is the expense of filling and making good. In the Private Streets Works Act, 1892, which deals with a similar matter this question is dealt with in terms, for it says that the expenses of superintendence may be recovered. That is provided for by sect. 9, sub-sect. 2, of that statute, and that, I submit is an indication that the Legislature, if they wish to include expenses of superintendence enact it in so many words. If the contractor had been employed by the undertakers, as at one time he would have been, the local authority, though they were bound to supervise, had no power to charge for the superintendence. Outside the London area by the Waterworks Clauses Act, the undertakers would have had to make good. He referred to the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, ss. 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 34. Those sections form a scheme, and I contend under that that the superintendence could not be charged against the water company. He referred to Vestry of St. Luke v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company, 35 L. T. Rep. 329; 1 Q. B. Div. 760;

General Paving (Metropolis) Act 1817 (Michael Angelo Taylor's Act) (57 Geo. 3, c. xxix.), s. 23; Walthamstow Local Board v. Staines, 65 L. T. Rep. 430; (1891) 2 Ch. 606.

Morton Smith for the respondents.—The appellants, by referring to certain statutes which do not apply to the metropolis are trying to cut down the rights of local authorities within the metropolis. Up to 1865 the position was this, that so far as regards the metropolis (namely, the parishes to which Michael Angelo Taylor's Act applies) the water company had no right whatever to do this work themselves. Under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act the local authority were bound to do the work and employ a contractor, and they were entitled to recover the expenses they had paid the contractor and all other expenses they were put to. The other side contend that because the Waterworks Clauses Act was passed in between the earlier statute and the

K.B.] MANCHESTER CARRIAGE, &C., CO. v. SWINTON & PENDLEBURY URBAN DIST. CO. [K.B.]

Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, when you come to read the word "expenses" in the later statute that word is to be cut down and the rights of the local authority are to be reduced, and the local authority is to have a liability put upon it which did not exist at the time of the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act in 1855. The respondents contend that they are entitled to charge against the appellants as expenses under sect. 114 of the Act of 1855 all the special expenses which they are put to. [He was stopped.]

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case depends almost on the question of fact. It depends upon the construction of sect. 114 of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855. I think there is no doubt that under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act the vestry were entitled to get all the charges and expenses attending the same. That would cover the expenses of their men's time and proper superintendence. The Waterworks Clauses Act does not apply to the metropolis—I mean for this purpose—because it does not exempt for this purpose the companies whatever they are from being liable under the Act already existing, that would be Michael Angelo Taylor's Act before the Metropolis Local Management Act of 1855, and sect. 114 afterwards. Therefore, at the time the Waterworks Clauses Act was passed, in the year 1847, Michael Angelo Taylor's Act was in force. Now, when the Act of 18 & 19 Vict. comes, the language is that of sect. 114. Mr. Jelf has argued very fairly and strenuously that the words "the expenses of filling in such ground and of making good the pavement or soil so broken up or opened shall be repaid on demand to the vestry or board by such company or person" mean the work actually done, and do not mean the superintendence of the work. It seems to me that it really is a question of fact, and if the magistrate is of opinion, as he is in this case, that this is really part of the expenses of doing the work, it is that which the local authority are entitled to recover. Now, the magistrate has put it in this way: "The question is really as to whether that"—that is, the 10 per cent. which, of course, he has not given them, but the quantum has to be ascertained—"is part of the expenses in making good the pavement. If two persons were to arrange that one was to dig a trench and another was to repair the pavement—private individuals—it would be important that they should have somebody such as a surveyor to see that the work is properly done. It is to the benefit of both parties that the work should be properly done. The charge of 10 per cent. for supervision, I take it, includes also surveyors' expenses which as between individuals would be charged like a surveyor's or architect's expenses. Whether 10 per cent. is a reasonable sum, I have not yet decided, but I think they are entitled to charge a sum for supervision." It seems to me that dealing with this matter in this section in a practical way, and assuming they were, as I think they were entitled, to this charge under Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, what the Metropolis Local Management Act has said is that the expenses of filling in the ground and making it good shall be allowed. I agree with the view taken by the learned magistrate—that it was a fair and reasonable charge for seeing that the work was properly done either by the contractor by whom it is done or by their own men, if they choose to employ their own men. This is a charge which comes within the words "expenses of filling in such ground and making it good." I think the learned magistrate was right upon the question which was left to him to be ascertained as to it being a proper charge, and therefore this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I suppose the reason why the city of Westminster employ contractors to do this work is that they think it will be more cheaply and better done by persons whose regular business it is than by their own workmen. Then, if that be so, I should have thought that it follows almost as a matter of course that, according to the general principles of human nature and of experiences in matters of this kind, nobody in his senses, if he was having the work done for himself, would think of giving a contractor a free hand and allowing him to do the work without any counteracting influence or supervision to see that it was properly done. If a man builds a house and employs a contractor to do it he is sure to employ a clerk of the works also to act as a kind of watch-dog over the contractor; and when he comes to ask himself how much his house has cost him and what has been the expense of building the house, he certainly would throw in the wages of the person employed to check the contractor and see that the work was properly done. On those grounds it seems to me it is a reasonable thing to say that the expense of such necessary and reasonable superintendence is part of the cost or expense of filling in the ground and making good the pavement.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that one must look at it as a reasonable question as to whether this should be included under the head of expenses. Now, expenses cannot really mean the expenses of merely filling in the ground and the expenses of making good the pavement or soil merely as manual acts. It includes surely a degree of supervision, and skilled supervision, which, looking at the nature of the work, the work requires; and, if it has been honestly expended, the payment so made, and which is now sought to be charged by way of supervision, seems to me to be a thing which is reasonable, and the learned magistrate has expressed it to be so looking at the particular work.

Appeal dismissed.

MANCHESTER CARRIAGE AND TRAMWAYS COMPANY LIMITED v. SWINTON AND PENDLEBURY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

Tramway—Purchase by local authority—Depot outside district of local authority—"Used with and suitable to" the undertaking—Liability of local authority to pay for—Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), s. 43.

By sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 it is provided: "Where the promoters of a tramway

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

in a district are not the local authority, the local authority . . . may" (within certain specified times) " . . . by notice in writing require such promoters to sell, and thereupon such promoters shall sell to them their undertaking, or so much of the same as is within such district, upon terms of paying the then value . . . of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district."

The tramway company was the owner of a large depot situated some distance outside the boundary of the district council, but found by an arbitrator to be "used with and suitable to" the undertaking of the tramway company within the council's district.

The district council having given notice to the tramway company that they were required to sell to the council under the conditions and in the manner provided by sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 so much of their works and undertaking as were within the council's district.

Held, that the council were bound to pay for this depot.

Held, further, that the words "within such district" applied to the "undertaking," and not to "all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters."

AWARD stated in the form of a special case pursuant to sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889.

By the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879 it was enacted (so far as material) as follows:

2. The following Acts and parts of Acts (except where expressly varied by this Act) are incorporated with and form part of this Act—that is to say, Part 2 (Construction of Tramways) and Part 3 (General Provisions) of the Tramways Act 1870.

4. Subject to the provisions of this Act the company (meaning thereby the Manchester Suburban Tramways Company) may make, form, lay down, work, use, and maintain the tramways hereinafter described in the lines and according to the levels shown on the deposited plans and sections, and in all respects in accordance with those plans and sections, with all proper rails, plates, works, and conveniences connected therewith.

The tramways hereinafter referred to and authorised by this Act are: The Swinton lines, 1 mile 3 furlongs 7 chains and 3 yards in length, the whole of which is double line, except two chains at the termination thereof to be wholly situate in the townships of Pendlebury and Swinton, in the parish of Eccles, in the county of Lancaster, and consisting of the tramways numbered on the deposited plans as follows—that is to say, tramways numbers 1 and 1A, commencing respectively in Manchester-road by junctions with the tramways authorised by the Salford Improvement Act 1875 at their termination at the boundary of the township of Pendleton at points eighteen yards or fifteen yards or thereabouts respectively south of the public lamp-post at the corner of the Manchester-road and the Bolton-road, and passing thence in a north-westerly direction along Manchester-road and Chorley-road, and terminating at a point in Chorley-road eighteen yards or thereabouts north of the north-westerly corner of Partington-lane, being the corner of Swinton Parish Churchyard.

34. For the protection of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Salford (in this section referred to as the corporation) the following provisions shall have effect (that is to say). . . (8) Nothing in this Act shall authorise the company to use or in any way interfere with any tramway not being a tramway of the company which now is or hereafter shall be laid in the borough of Salford.

35. In the making, working, and using of the tramways in this Act, called the Swinton Lines, the following provisions for the protection of the Local Board for the District of Swinton and Pendlebury, shall be observed and have effect. . . (3) Every tram-car and carriage travelling upon the Swinton lines which shall belong to or be used by the company, their lessees, licensees, or assigns, shall travel without delays (except necessary stoppages for taking up or setting down passengers, and in cases of emergency) from Swinton to Manchester and from Manchester to Swinton, and so that passengers shall not be required to change carriages at Pendleton or elsewhere. (4) The fares from Manchester to Swinton, or from Manchester to Pendlebury, and from Swinton to Manchester, or from Pendlebury to Manchester, shall not, unless with the consent of the said local board, exceed 4d. each inside and 3d. each outside.

By the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company Act 1880, the Manchester Suburban Tramway Company was dissolved, and all the rights, powers, and privileges which, by the said Act of 1879 (lastly hereinbefore recited), were conferred upon the company were by the Act transferred to and vested in a company by the Act incorporated by the name of "The Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company" (hereinbefore called the tramways company), who were by the Act authorised to exercise all those rights, powers, privileges, and authorities (except only the powers of raising money, which powers and the provisions of the Act of 1879 relating thereto, were thereby repealed) as fully in all respects as the Manchester Suburban Tramways Company might have exercised the same if the Act now in recital had not been passed.

By the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company's Order 1897, confirmed by the Tramways Order Confirmation (No. 1) Act 1897, it was enacted (so far as is material) as follows—that is to say:

2. The provisions of . . . the Tramways Act 1870 are hereby incorporated with this order, except where the same are inconsistent with or expressly varied by this order. . . .

5. The tramways by this order authorised shall be deemed to form part of the undertaking authorised by . . . the Act of 1879 (meaning thereby the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879. . . .

8. The promoters (meaning thereby the tramways company) may construct and maintain, subject to the provisions of this order and in accordance with the plans and sections deposited at the office of the Board of Trade for the purposes of this order, as the same have been amended previous to the passing of the Act confirming this order . . . the tramways hereinafter described, with all proper rails, plates, curves, points, offices, weigh-bridges, carriage-houses, engine-sheds, warehouses, works, and conveniences connected therewith, or for the purposes thereof, and may work and use the same.

The tramways authorised by this order are: Tramways No. 1, 2 miles 1 furlong and 0.20 chain in length, of which 4 furlongs and 5.20 chains is double line, and 1 mile 4 furlongs and 5 chains is single line, commencing in Chorley-road by a junction with the existing line authorised by the Act of 1879 in that road, at a point thirty yards from the south-easterly corner of the southerly end of Station-road, and passing thence along Station-road and the road leading from Manchester to

Bolton, called Bolton-road, and terminating at Irlams-o'-th'-Height by a junction with the existing lines, authorised by the Act of 1879, at the boundary of the borough of Salford.

49. The powers of purchase given by sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 shall, as regards the following portions of the undertaking, be exercisable by the respective local authorities of the respective districts hereinafter referred to as follows: (a) As regards tramway No. 1 (within the urban district of Swinton and Pendlebury), as if the construction of that tramway had been authorised by the Act of 1879.

53. Where, under the provisions of the Tramways Act 1870 and this order, any matter in difference is referred to the arbitration of any person nominated by the Board of Trade, the provisions of the Arbitration Act 1889 shall, except where otherwise specially provided, apply to every such arbitration, and the decision of the arbitrator shall be final and conclusive, and binding on all parties.

The tramways authorised by the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879 were completed and opened for traffic in the year 1880, and the tramways authorised by the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company's Order 1897 were also completed and opened for traffic. These tramways are hereinafter collectively referred to as "the Swinton lines."

In the year 1877, before the passing of the Act and order hereinbefore recited, the Manchester Suburban Tramways Company or their predecessors in title became lessees of another tramways undertaking belonging to the Corporation of Salford, extending from the boundary of the City of Manchester to the boundaries of the Swinton and Pendlebury urban district in one direction and the parish of Eccles in another direction. These lines are hereinafter collectively referred to as "the Salford lines." After the incorporation of the Tramways Company that term became vested in them for the residue then unexpired thereof.

The tramways company are the owners of two large depots situate respectively in Ford-lane and Church-street, Pendleton, Salford, some distance outside the boundary of the Swinton and Pendlebury district. These depots were originally constructed or adapted by the predecessors in title of the tramways company in 1875 to serve as depots for a large omnibus, cab, and fly business that they carried on before the tramways were made. They were modified to some extent in anticipation of the opening of the tramways, and have been also to some extent rearranged or added to since, but they now cover the same area and are substantially the same depots as they were in 1877.

Between the years 1877 and 1880 the two depots were used by the predecessors in title of the tramways company as depots in connection with the Salford lines, of which they were lessees, though the omnibus, cab, and fly business was still carried on there. Upon the opening of the Swinton lines in 1880 they were also used as depots in connection with those lines, a certain proportion of the cab horses and stock being removed to make room for the additional horses and cars required for the Swinton lines. The depots were the only depots used for the Swinton and Salford lines.

All the cars for both the Swinton and Salford lines were kept at the Church-street depot, as there was no physical means of access for cars to Vol. XC., 2336.

the Ford-lane depot, there being no tram lines thereto or therein. As regards the Church-street depot the means of access for cars from the Swinton line is by running over the Salford lines and then over a small spur of line laid down by the tramways company. The cars so kept at the Church-street depot were thirty-eight in number, of which fourteen were exclusively used for the through route over the Swinton lines to Manchester and back, four were exclusively used on the Eccles branch, and twenty were used on the rest of the Salford lines.

Of the total number of horses kept at the two depots sixty-four were used exclusively on the Eccles branch, 168 on the rest of the Salford lines, 200 for the omnibus, cab, and fly business, and 160 exclusively for the through traffic between Swinton and Manchester. The horses for the Swinton traffic proper were all kept in the Church-street depot. At holiday-time and at other times of great pressure upon the Swinton lines both cars and horses, which were usually set apart for the other routes, and also the omnibus, cab, and fly horses, were to some extent requisitioned for the Swinton to Manchester traffic.

At the Ford-lane depot the fodder for all the horses in the Ford-lane and Church-street depots, and also in another depot (not the subject of the present inquiry) was kept and prepared, and there was an infirmary for such horses from both the Swinton and the Salford lines.

Since the date of the opening of the Swinton lines those lines have been worked as a part of a common undertaking with the Salford lines. The tramcars have been run through and with through fares from Swinton to Manchester and back over the Salford lines, and obviously, as a matter of ordinarily prudent management, the Swinton and Salford lines would always continue to be worked together as a part of one system.

On the 22nd Jan. 1901 the Swinton and Pendlebury Urban District Council duly gave notice to the tramways company that they were required to sell to the council, under the conditions and in the manner provided by sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870, so much of the tramways works and undertaking of the tramways company as are within the urban district of Swinton and Pendlebury.

On the 27th April 1901 the lease to the tramways company of the Salford line expired.

On the 26th April 1901 the tramways company agreed to sell, and the Corporation of Salford agreed to purchase the whole of the tramcars and horses belonging to the company, theretofore used upon the Salford and Swinton lines, such agreement being subject and without prejudice to the right and claims of any local authority under sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870. The price of the same was, by a further agreement in writing, dated the 1st May 1901, fixed at 42,500*l.*, and the same were transferred to the Corporation of Salford accordingly. The company, by the agreement of the 26th April 1901, further agreed to grant to the corporation, as from the 2nd May 1901, a lease of certain premises, including the Church-street and Ford-lane depots, and such agreement was carried into effect by an indenture dated the 9th Oct. 1901, and made between the tramways company of the one part and the Corporation of Salford of the other part, whereby the company demised unto the corporation the two depots (less certain excepted portions) for the term of two years from the 28th April 1901, subject to a proviso that the lease was subject and without prejudice to the rights and claims of any authority under sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870, or any statutory modification or re-enactment thereof.

On the same 28th April 1901 an agreement in writing was entered into between the tramways company and the District Council of Swinton and Pendlebury, whereby it was agreed as follows, that is to say:

1. The council shall take possession of the tramways so constructed as aforesaid, in pursuance of the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879 and the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company's Order 1897 respectively, on the 28th of April instant.

2. The council, in addition to the value to be paid by them for such tramways, in pursuance of sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870, and contemporaneously with the payment of such value, shall pay to the company interest at the rate of 4l. 10s. per centum per annum, calculated from the 28th April inst. to the date of payment, upon the sum which the referee to be appointed by the Board of Trade shall determine as the value of such tramways, possession whereof is agreed to be given by clause 1 hereof.

3. The council shall not interfere with (except for the purpose of necessary repairs) or reconstruct any of the said tramways before arbitration under the said sect. 43 of the Tramways Act shall have taken place.

4. Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to prejudice or affect the question as to what lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant (if any) of the company are suitable to and used by the company for the purposes of their undertaking within the district of the council within the meaning of the said sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870.

Since the 28th April 1901 the Corporation of Salford have worked both the Salford and Swinton lines as a common undertaking in pursuance of an agreement made by them in that behalf with the Swinton and Pendlebury District Council, dated the 13th July 1899 (which is scheduled to the Salford Corporation Act 1899) whereby it was agreed that forthwith, after the purchase of the Swinton lines by the urban district council, the council should grant to the corporation a lease thereof for the term of twenty-one years, that during the interval between the time when the council should have obtained possession of the Swinton lines and the date of the lease the corporation should maintain a service of tramcars thereon, and that the lease should contain a covenant by the corporation binding them during the term of the lease to provide and maintain a service of tramcars on the tramways not less frequent or less efficient or at greater fares than the existing service of the tramways company.

On the 29th Aug. 1902 the Board of Trade, by writing under the hand of an assistant secretary thereof in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by the Tramways Act 1870 on the joint application of the urban district council of Swinton and Pendlebury, and of the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company Limited, appointed Sir Frederick Bramwell, Bart., F.R.S. as referee, to determine the value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramways constructed within the urban district of Swinton and Pendlebury under the authority of the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879 and the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company's Order 1897, and of all lands, buildings, works, material, and plant of the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company suitable to and used by them for the purposes of the undertaking within such urban district authorised by the Act of 1879 and order of 1897.

At the hearing of the reference on the 27th March 1903 it was agreed between the parties that Mr. James More, junior, on behalf of the company and Mr. J. D. Wallis on behalf of the district council should (without prejudice to the question referred to hereafter as to whether the district council is compellable to buy the two depots or either of them) value the fixtures, fittings, and utensils in and upon the two depots, and that the amount of their valuation subject to a reference to the referee in case they should differ should be included in his award.

At the hearing of the reference, counsel for the Swinton and Pendlebury Urban District Council admitted that the council were bound to purchase and pay for the actual tramways within their district authorised by the Act of 1879 and the order of 1897 hereinbefore set forth, but they contended that under sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 they were not compellable to purchase either the Ford-lane or the Church-street depot on the ground that even if such depots or either of them were suitable to and used by the tramways company for the purposes of the tramways they were both of them situated geographically without the district of the council, and that the section only made it obligatory upon the local authority to purchase that which was within their district.

Counsel for the tramways company contended that if such depots were in fact suitable to and used with their undertaking within the council's district the council were under the section compellable to purchase them, although the depots themselves were outside the district.

The referee having inspected the tramways and depots, and, having heard the parties, their counsel, and witnesses, found as a fact that the Ford-lane depot, although in a limited sense used with the undertaking of the tramways company within the district of the council, is not suitable to such undertaking, and he further found as a fact that the Church-street depot was used with and is suitable to the undertaking.

He therefore awarded that the value, exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramways constructed within the urban district of Swinton and Pendlebury under the authority of the Manchester Suburban Tramways Act 1879 and the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company's Order 1897, and of all land, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the Manchester Carriage and Tramways Company suitable to and used by them for the purposes of the undertaking within such urban district authorised by the Act of 1879 and order of 1897 is as follows: (a) The value of the tramway lines, including an agreed sum of 1250l., 24,689l.; (b) the value of the land and buildings constituting the Church-street depot and the tramway lines therein and the tramway line in Church-street leading into the depot, 24,009l.; (c) the value of the fixtures and fittings in and upon the Church-street depot (as per the valuation of Messrs. More and Wallis hereinbefore referred to), 308*l.*; or a total of 49,006*l.*

Should the court be of opinion that the council are not compellable to purchase or pay for the Church-street depot then the items (b) 24,009*l.* and (c) 308*l.* must be deducted from the above total, and in such event he awarded the value to be the sum of 24,689*l.*; and he further awarded that the expenses of the reference and award be borne and paid by the Swinton and Pendlebury Urban District Council.

Fletcher Moulton, K.C. (Eldridge and E. F. Sanders with him) for the tramway company.—On the true construction of sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 the local authority must take all the undertaking within the district, together with all the lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant suitable to and used for the purpose of such undertaking. The arbitrator has found here that this depot was used with and is suitable to the undertaking within the district of the council, and they are bound to pay for it even although it may be physically situated outside their district.

Balfour Browne, K.C. (George Rhodes with him) for the district council.—The council cannot be compelled to pay for this depot, for they only have power under sect. 43 of the Tramways Act 1870 to buy the undertaking with the suitable lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant used with the undertaking and situated within their district. This depot, which the arbitrator has found to be used with and suitable to the undertaking, besides being situated outside the council's district, was used for other purposes than the tramway undertaking. It is not, therefore, suitable within the section. He referred to North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council, 72 L. T. Rep. 586.

CHANNELL, J.—I am afraid I feel bound by the binding of this special case. I think if Sir Frederick Bramwell had been alive I should have been inclined to send it back to him. I think there is a substantial difficulty about the entirety of this building being found to be suitable to and used for the purposes of this undertaking when there are facts set out in considerable detail which show that it was only partly used for the purposes of this part of the undertaking, and a much greater use of it was made for the purposes of the other part of the undertaking. There really is very great difficulty in understanding exactly how it was that the arbitrator came to that conclusion. I do see that a similar question arises, not to a large extent, but to some extent, with regard to the other buildings, and that may, to some extent, account for this. The point that is clearly submitted to me is this: In the case of a building which is outside the district of the local board, assuming as a matter of fact that the building was at the time of the undertaking being taken over—"then" is the word used (I do not know whether it is at the beginning of the notice, or at the expiration of the notice, and it does not signify)—assuming it was then suitable to, and used by them for, the purposes of their undertaking, the point is, whether the purchasers are bound to pay for that building. I think it is quite clear that they are. They are bound to pay for the building: there might be a doubt whether they are bound to purchase it, but, if they are bound, as they clearly are in my view, upon the terms, to pay for it, I think one would read the two consistently by saying, therefore, in that case it must be included in the purchase, and must be deemed to be part of the undertaking within the district for the purpose of this purchase. But the other part I am really quite clear about. The reason why, grammatically, "within such district" must refer to the undertaking is not merely because it is the last thing, but because, when you look at some of the other things, some of them are movable things. With reference to the plant, "suitable for the purposes of the undertaking" does not mean the plant within the district suitable to the purposes of the undertaking, but it means plant suitable to the undertaking within the district. Therefore, if it means that there, it means it in reference to the building also, it seems to me. So that, upon that point, which the arbitrator has clearly referred to me, I have a strong opinion in favour of the view, I understand, he himself took. Therefore that point I must decide for the company. Then there comes the question of how to deal with the other matter. Any findings of fact that the arbitrator has made are binding upon me. Even if he wished to refer them to me under the Arbitration Act, he could not do so. He has only power to state cases upon questions of law. Consequently, even if he wished to do it, I do not see that he could refer it to me. The only way in which it can be done is this, and sometimes it is done. Sometimes the court assumes a jurisdiction which must be very near the border line of dealing as a question of law with the question of whether there is any evidence upon which he could so find. The only way, as it seems to me, in which I could deal with this point as a question of law is by saying that there was no evidence upon which the arbitrator could find that this was suitable to the undertaking. Now, I should have a little difficulty about that. If it clearly means that the entirety of this big building was both used for, and suitable to, I think there is a little difficulty. But I do not think I can say there is no evidence. It is always such a troublesome question. Upon the evidence that he has stated, I frankly say I do not see how he arrived at the conclusion that he did about the entirety. I think that he must have had some reasons which I do not fully appreciate. That is why, if it were possible, I should have liked to clear it up, but, as it is, it does seem to me that the only possible doubt as to whether he has or has not found this as a question of fact arises from the use of the word "with" in the case. There he says: "I find as a fact that the Church-street depot was used with, and is suitable to, the undertaking." "With" is a shorter word than "for the purposes of," and I think that the arbitrator has done something besides that in variation of the words. He has varied the order in which they come. In the Act of Parliament it is: "Suitable to, and used by them for, the purposes of." Then, in varying the order, he has, perhaps not unnaturally, substituted the word "with" for the words, "for the purposes of." Otherwise it would come in a little awkward. If I could think that he meant to avoid finding that it was used for the purposes of, possibly I should say that I could not act upon the finding, but, when you compare it with what he has found in the next clause, he goes back and uses the words in the order in which they appear in the Act of Parliament, and says: "Suitable to and used by them for the purposes of the undertaking," and I think that he therefore shows on the face of this award that, when he used the word "with," he meant it to be the same thing as "for the purposes of the undertaking." Therefore, though with some reluctance—a reluctance that I only feel, as I said just now, in cases where one has not power to review the facts, but has to review a portion of the matter, and one feels that perhaps one is not doing complete justice in the matter—I feel bound to say, upon the point of law, which is clearly referred to me, I must come to the decision which I have already mentioned, and that I somewhat reluctantly decide that nothing else is open to me. The result is, I think I must support the award for the larger figure.

[CT. OF APP.]

Judgment accordingly.

COURT OF APPEAL.

May 31 and June 1.

(Before VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, ROMER, and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.)

Re STRAND WOOD COMPANY LIMITED. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Company—Winding-up—Summons taken out by liquidator for alleged misfeasance by directors—Security for costs of application—Practice.

The court has no jurisdiction to require the liquidator of a company which is in course of being wound-up to give security for the costs of an application against directors of the company for misfeasance under sect. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890. But an order for payment of costs by the liquidator personally will be made in a proper case.

The principle established by Cowell v. Taylor (53 L. T. Rep. 483; 31 Ch. Div. 34) considered and applied.

SPECIAL resolutions were passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings of the above-named company, held respectively on the 21st Jan. 1902 and the 6th Feb. 1902, for the voluntary winding-up of the company and appointing a liquidator.

On the 19th April 1904 a summons was taken out by the liquidator, under sect. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890, against some of the directors of the company, seeking to make them liable for moneys of the company alleged to have been misapplied by them.

On the 28th April 1904 two of those directors took out a summons asking that the company and the liquidator might be ordered to give security for the costs of his application upon the ground that the company had no assets—the whole of its property having been transferred on reconstruction to a new company formed for that purpose—and that the liquidator was, as the applicants were informed and believed, a man of no financial position.

In opposition to that application the liquidator stated that he retained control of the greater part of the assets of the company pending the discharge of outstanding liabilities, which assets would be available for costs; that the new company had sanctioned the issue of the summons by the liquidator; and that it was not true that he was a man without property.

The registrar before whom the summons came on to be heard refused to make any order upon it; but he gave leave to appeal.

The applicants now appealed accordingly.

A. H. Jessel for the appellants.—The registrar refused to order the liquidator and the company to give security for costs in this case on the authority of Re W. Powell and Sons Limited, 74 L. T. Rep. 220; (1896) 1 Ch. 681.

It was there held by Romer, L.J. (then Romer, J.) that the court having jurisdiction at the hearing of a misfeasance summons to order a liquidator to pay the cost of the proceedings personally, will, in an ordinary case, refuse to order him to give security for costs. The question is whether that case is of general authority, or whether the fact of a liquidator and company being insolvent is sufficient ground for ordering security for costs. Sect. 69 of the Companies Act 1862 provides that: "Where a limited company is plaintiff or pursuer in any action, suit, or other legal proceeding, any judge having jurisdiction in the matter may, if it appears by any credible testimony that there is reason to believe that, if the defendant be successful in his defence, the assets of the company will be insufficient to pay his costs, require sufficient security to be given for such costs, and may stay all such proceedings until such security is given." The present case is analagous to one arising under that section. I submit that in a proper case the court has jurisdiction to order a liquidator to give security for the costs of a misfeasance summons. In Palmer's Company Precedents (9th edit., part 2, pp. 632, 633), an unreported decision of Pearson, J. to that effect in Re Wedgwood Company (29th May 1884) is cited. [ROMER, L.J. referred to the observations of Baggallay and Bowen, L.JJ. in Cowell v. Taylor (53 L. T. Rep. 483; 31 Ch. Div. 34).] In Re W. Powell and Sons Limited (ubi sup.) the case of Re Wedgwood Company (ubi sup.) and also the decision of Bacon V.C. in Re Seventh East Central Building Society (51 L. T. Rep. 109) were referred to in the course of the arguments. Upon that case, and also upon the decision of Pearson, J., the statement as to the practice contained in Palmer's Company Precedents (ubi sup.) was no doubt founded. In Re W. Powell and Sons Limited (ubi sup.) Romer, J. seems to have assumed that, in a case like the present, the court had jurisdiction to make an order for security for costs; and, although the learned judge declined to order it in that case, yet he did so on the ground that the court at the trial might order the liquidator to pay the costs personally; and he also thought that, in considering whether

[CT. OF APP.]

Re LONGBOTHAM AND SONS.

[CT. OF APP.]

the liquidator ought to be ordered to pay the costs personally, the court would have regard to the fact that the liquidator had opposed an application for security. That has since been followed by Stirling, J. in Re Western Counties Steam Bakeries and Milling Company (4th May 1896), cited in Palmer's Company Precedents (9th edit., part 2, pp. 622, 623). [ROMER, L.J.—The principle of Cowell v. Taylor (ubi sup.) is against the appellants.] In Re W. Powell and Sons Limited (ubi sup.) it was argued that the court had no jurisdiction to order a liquidator to give security, but it was not so held. [ROMER, L.J.—It appears to me now, though it did not occur to me at the time, that I might have based my decision upon want of jurisdiction.] In this case the liquidator is a mere shadow, and the company will get no benefit by its action, as it has sold its undertaking to another company. That brings this case within the exception stated by Bowen, L.J. in Cowell v. Taylor (ubi sup.). [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Yours is, in effect, an argument that every impecunious litigant in the High Court should be compelled to give security for costs.] Without going so far as that, I submit that there will be a very serious injustice done to the appellants here if no security is ordered.

Mark Romer for the respondent, the liquidator, was not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am afraid that the practice is against the appellants, and that the appeal fails. I wish to say for myself that if this were a new matter, inasmuch as I personally while acting as the judge in company matters saw many instances of the abuse of the present law, I should not have been sorry if there had been a power to require security to be given in a case of this kind where the circumstances were such as to lead the court to think that it ought to be ordered. The cases, however, are too strong for me, and we must be content with the practice as it stands.

ROMER, L.J.—I think that the appeal fails and must be dismissed. I rely upon the principle on which Cowell v. Taylor (53 L. T. Rep. 483; 31 Ch. Div. 34) was decided. The liquidator comes here under the Act of Parliament, and in the performance of his statutory duties, and in a case like that, where it is not suggested that the application is frivolous or made improperly by the liquidator, it is not in accordance with the practice of this court that he should be required to give security for costs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. It is clear that this case does not come within sect. 69 of the Companies Act 1862. Here the company are not the plaintiffs, but it is argued that by analogy, where the liquidator comes under the express provisions of sect. 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act 1890 we ought to treat him as being in the same position as a plaintiff company. I cannot follow that. As a general rule the practice as to security for costs is settled by Cowell v. Taylor (53 L. T. Rep. 483; 31 Ch. Div. 34) and other cases. It seems to me that we should be going beyond that authority if we required the liquidator here to give security for costs. I wish to emphasise what was said by Romer, J. in Re W. P. Powell and Sons Limited (74 L. T. Rep. 220; (1896) 1 Ch. 681) that the court on a misfeasance summons will not have the least hesitation in making a personal order for payment of costs by the liquidator in a proper case.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Solicitor and client—Costs—Taxation—"Third party liable"—Taxation of mortgagee's solicitors' bill by mortgagor—Practice—Solicitors Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 38.

A mortgagor is entitled, under sect. 38 of the Solicitors Act 1843, to have taxation of the bill of costs of the solicitor acting for the mortgagee limited to the items of costs incurred by the mortgagee strictly in that capacity and not in his personal capacity.

Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73) and Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239) considered and approved.

Decision of Kekewich, J. affirmed.

SOLICITORS who had acted for a mortgagee carried in their bill of costs for taxation at the instance of the mortgagor.

From the bill more than one-sixth was taxed off.

On the solicitors raising objections the master answered that he had taxed the bill upon the principle laid down in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239), by taking off all the items which could not be charged as between the mortgagee and mortgagor; stating, further, that the bill was made out on a wrong principle, the old practice being relied on by the solicitors.

The items disallowed were in the nature of charges as between solicitor and client, such as attendances by solicitors to take steps necessary for the protection of the mortgagee without consultation with the mortgagor, and in respect of unnecessary letters.

Thereupon an application was made by the solicitors to review the certificate of the taxing master.

The applicants admitted that their application was made in order to obtain a reversal of the ruling of the learned judge in the case of Re Gray (ubi sup.), in which it was submitted that Cozens-Hardy, J. while referring to the earlier decision of Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73), which in turn referred to Re Brown (16 L. T. Rep. 729; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 464), had in effect altered the previous practice in such matters.

Kekewich, J., before whom the application came on to be heard, required a certificate from the taxing master, which was as follows:

Your Lordship having desired a certificate from the masters of the Supreme Court (Taxing Office) of the practice generally in cases between the mortgagor and the solicitor of the mortgagee, I beg respectfully to report to your Lordship: That the practice followed by the masters in taxations under sect. 38 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 (the Solicitors Act) up to within recent years was to tax as between the solicitor and the client (the party chargeable in the first instance), and not as between the solicitor and the party liable to pay, effect, however, being given, as far as possible, to the cases of Re Negus (ubi sup.) and Re Abbott (4 L. T. Rep. 576), and the observations of Cotton, L.J. in Re Morecroft (29 Sol. Jo. 471 C. A.) The principles, however, laid down by these cases were, in the opinion of the masters, considerably extended by the case of Re Gray (ubi sup.), and since that case the practice in the taxing office in taxations under this section has been to tax, apart from the order, as between the solicitor and the party, or estate liable to pay.

Kekewich, J. read the above certificate, and, without further argument, refused the application; but his Lordship gave leave to appeal.

The applicants now appealed accordingly.

George Lawrence for the appellants.—It is clearly laid down by the authorities that taxation, when ordered under sect. 38 of the Solicitors Act 1843, must proceed as between the solicitor and his client the mortgagee:

Re Morecroft, 29 Sol. Jour. 471;
Re Holliday and Godlee, 58 L. T. Rep. 301.

Those are the various reported cases which support the contention of the appellants in the present case. The question is whether the decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239) was intended to revolutionise the third party taxation under sect. 38 of the Solicitors Act 1843. I submit that that decision has not overruled the earlier cases, and that the taxation ought to proceed according to the rules which would govern a taxation of the same bill of costs at the instance of the mortgagee. The sole question is, What is the bill? My submission is that the bill is the bill which would be delivered by the solicitor acting for the mortgagee. If the court is against me upon the cases to which I have referred, I do not know that it will be necessary to cite all the cases of which Re Gray (ubi sup.) is an example, and which are against the appellants here. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—As, for instance, Re Brown (16 L. T. Rep. 729; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 464).] That case is inconsistent with the other decisions, and notably with:

Re Dickson, 8 De G. M. & G. 655.

The case of Re Brown (ubi sup.) has been explained, and, as I submit, satisfactorily so, by Kay, J. in Brown v. Burdett, 59 L. T. Rep. 388; 40 Ch. Div. 244.

Those were the authorities governing the practice until the decisions in Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73) and Re Gray (ubi sup.). The former is only founded on Re Brown (ubi sup.), and, as I say, upon a misapprehension of Re Brown (ubi sup.); and it is, moreover, inconsistent with Re Newman (ubi sup.). The practice appears to be stated substantially the same in every text-book of authority:

T. L. Wilkinson, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1.—The following judgments were delivered:—

ROMER, L.J., at the request of Vaughan Williams, L.J., first read his judgment.—I will first deal with this case on principle. When a third party taxes a bill under sect. 38 of the Solicitors Act of 1843 it is clear, both from the wording of the section itself and the authorities, that the taxation must be on the footing of a taxation between the solicitor and the client. But the third party is not, for all purposes in connection with the taxation, to be treated as if he were himself the client. For instance, where the client has paid the bill and might not be able to show special circumstances sufficient to entitle him to have the bill taxed, it does not follow that of necessity the third party is thereby precluded from obtaining taxation. The proviso at the end of sect. 38 shows that. And, in my opinion, that proviso is important and useful; and a court will doubtless act upon it in cases where justice requires that the third party should not be bound by what has taken place between the solicitor and the client. Again, the solicitor may have acted for the client in more than one completed matter, and the client may not be entitled, as against the solicitor, to obtain delivery of a bill and taxation, except on the footing of having all the matters included and taxed. But if the third party be only interested in, and liable to pay the costs of, one matter, it is clear, in my opinion, as a matter of principle, that, under sect. 38, he can obtain taxation of the bill so far as concerns that one matter only, and on the footing of being liable to pay only the taxed costs of that matter, and that principle really decides this case, and shows that the appeal should fail. For in the present case the third party is a mortgagor, and he is only interested in the relations between the solicitor and his client so far as they concern the position of the client strictly in his character of mortgagee. The mortgagor, therefore, is entitled, under sect. 38, to have taxation of the solicitor's bill limited to the items of costs incurred by the client strictly in his position of mortgagee, and it is on that principle that the taxing master has proceeded. It may well be that the client, as between himself and the solicitor, is liable for costs incurred in relation to the mortgaged property with which the mortgagor is not concerned, and for which the mortgagor is not liable. Those will be costs incurred by the mortgagee in his personal capacity so far as concerns the mortgagor, and not costs incurred by him in the capacity of mortgagee strictly and properly considered, and accordingly would not have to be taxed or considered by the taxing master in a taxation by the mortgagor as third party. And I may add, though it may not be necessary to do so for the purposes of the present case, that, if the mortgagee chose to sanction a charge by his solicitor beyond what he and the solicitor knew, or must be taken to have known, could be properly charged, as against the mortgagor, though the mortgagee might be bound for the excess by reason of his sanction, the mortgagor would not be bound, for the sanction by the mortgagee would be held as given by him in his personal capacity, and not in his capacity of mortgagee. With regard to the authorities, they are so numerous that I do not pretend to say that all the observations by the various judges who decided them can be reconciled. But the principle on which this judgment is based is not, in my opinion, contrary to any express decision that has been cited, and that principle has been recognised, and, I think, rightly so, in the cases of Re Brown (16 L. T. Rep. 729; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 464); Re Morecroft (29 Sol. Jour. 471), (and in particular the judgment of Lindley, L.J. in that case); Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73); and Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239); and by the observations of Turner, L.J. in Re Dickson (8 De G. M. & G. 655); and I do not think it will serve any useful purpose to go through the cases cited seriatim. The appeal will accordingly be dismissed with costs.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I concur. I wish to add one or two observations. In the first place, I assent entirely to every word read by Romer, L.J., in so far as it deals with questions regarding all such matters as do not strictly concern the mortgagor, and which involve costs incurred by the mortgagee otherwise than in his capacity of mortgagee. Such costs are outside the costs which the mortgagor is liable to satisfy. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to go beyond that. It seems to me that when we go that length we are affirming the judgment of Chitty, J. in Re Negus (71 L. T. Rep. 716; (1895) 1 Ch. 73), and the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J. in Re Gray (84 L. T. Rep. 24; (1901) 1 Ch. 239). In each of those cases there were costs incurred in respect of matters which did not concern the mortgagor, and which were not costs incurred by the mortgagee as mortgagee, but in his personal capacity. All that it is necessary for us to do in our present judgment is to affirm the principle of those two decisions, which, as Romer, L.J. has pointed out, are really decisions that were anticipated by Romilly, M.R., in Re Brown (16 L. T. Rep. 729; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 465). There is one passage in the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J. in Re Gray (ubi sup.), which expresses all that it is necessary to say in the present case. At p. 248 of (1901) 1 Ch. I find these words: "The governing idea of Chitty, J.'s judgment"—that is to say, the judgment in Re Negus (ubi sup.)—"is that even a third party taxation the court is bound to look at the nature of the items and to consider whether, apart from the order, the applicant is under any liability to pay them. In other words, although the solicitor may put in one bill as against his own client a series of items, some of which may go beyond the liability of the third party, the third party does not, by obtaining an order to tax, render himself liable to the whole bill. With respect to matters falling within his liability under a contract express or implied, he cannot dispute the amount properly payable as between the solicitor and his own client; but in other respects his liability is not increased by obtaining a third party order to tax." I wish further to add that I do not think that in any of the cases referred to it has been forgotten that what is authorised in favour of a third party by the 38th section of the Solicitors Act 1843 is a taxation obtained by a third party against the solicitor. What I mean is that the proceeding which is sanctioned by the section is a wholly different proceeding from that which is described by Romilly, M.R. in the case of Re Massey (34 Beav. 463; 34 L. J. 492, Ch.). He says in that case (at p. 495 of 34 L. J., Ch.) when refusing to grant an order for taxation at the instance of Mr. Waters, a third party: "In other words, in my opinion a bill from Mr. Massey"—that was the solicitor—"would have to be submitted to be moderated by the taxing master, and the amount at which the taxing master would fix it would be all that Mr. Waters would be required to pay the directors." That proceeding or moderation is a proceeding which is not intended to be included by the 38th section of the Solicitors Act 1843. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—As this case is in substance, although not in form, an appeal from my decision in the case of Re Gray (ubi sup.), I will content myself with saying that I agree with the judgments which have been delivered by Romer, L.J. and my Lord. Appeal dismissed.

HAMBRO AND SON v. BURNAND AND OTHERS. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Principal and agent—Underwriter—Authority of underwriter to write names—Ordinary business at Lloyd's—Guarantee policy—Policy underwritten for private purposes and benefit of agent—Liability of principal.

When an agent, having express authority to make a particular kind of contract on behalf of his principal, makes such a contract in the name of his principal with a person who deals in good faith, the principal is liable although the agent in fact makes the contract for his own purposes and in his own interests, and not in the interests of his principal.

APPEAL of the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury; and a cross-appeal of the defendants.

The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the sum of 200l. from each of the defendants upon a policy of guarantee subscribed by the defendant Burnand in his own name and in the names of the other four defendants.

The policy was in a printed form, and was as follows:

To Messrs. C. J. Hambro and Son.—In consideration of your accepting at our request the drafts of Henry Gaze and Sons (hereinafter called the drawers) to such an amount as you may think proper, such drafts to be drawn and accepted within one year from the 1st

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Oct. 1902, and in consideration of the premium of 12. per cent. paid to us by the drawers on the execution hereof (the receipt whereof we hereby acknowledge), we, the underwriters, agree that, if the drawers do not at or before maturity of any such drafts put you in funds to meet the same, we will within thirty days of receipt of notice from you of such default on the part of the drawers pay to you in cash the amount of such drafts, and will further indemnify and hold you harmless against all moneys, loss, costs, charges, and expenses, which you may have to pay or to which you may be put by reason of having accepted such drafts or by reason of any claims made by any company or person in respect of the transactions above mentioned, provided that our liability hereunder shall not exceed the amount of our respective subscriptions hereto with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the time of payment being demanded.

The policy was subscribed with the names of the five defendants, the names of the last four defendants being subscribed by Burnand by procuration.

On the 9th Oct. 1902 the plaintiffs accepted a draft of Gaze and Sons Limited at ninety days' sight for 1000l.

The bill fell due on the 10th Jan. 1903, and Gaze and Sons Limited made default in finding money to meet it.

Burnand and the other four defendants were all members of Lloyd's. The other four defendants employed the defendant Burnand to do business for them at Lloyd's.

In each case the terms of the employment were contained in a written document, all the documents being substantially to the same effect.

The agreement, so far as is material, was as follows:

Burnand shall act as the agent of . . . for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd's and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's in the name and on behalf of . . . in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd's.

In 1900, 1901, and 1902 the plaintiffs accepted many drafts of Gaze and Sons Limited, and at the end of 1902 the sum of 7500l. was due to the plaintiffs in respect of drafts which had not been met by Gaze and Sons. All these drafts were guaranteed by policies similar to the one sued upon in this action.

Before June 1902 these policies were subscribed by other underwriters as well as the defendants. After that time they were subscribed by the defendants only, and the plaintiffs insisted on Gaze and Sons obtaining "solvency policies" also, by which the solvency of the underwriters was guaranteed.

The plaintiffs never saw Burnand, all the business being conducted with them by Parry, the managing director of Gaze and Sons Limited; and they never made any inquiries in the matter.

During the three years Burnand was a director of Gaze and Sons Limited, and it was very much to his interest to keep the business of Gaze and Sons going. In underwriting these policies he was, as found by the learned judge at the trial, acting for himself and in furtherance of his own interests, and not for or in the interests of the other four defendants.

Burnand never obtained any premiums for the policies, for Gaze and Sons never paid any. The policies were not entered in Burnand's business books.

The other four defendants contended that the underwriting of these policies was not within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's.

The learned judge at the trial, after hearing evidence, found that the underwriting of these policies was within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's.

The other four defendants further contended that, even if the authority given to Burnand authorised him to sign guarantee policies, yet, as this policy was not subscribed for and on their behalf, but for Burnand's benefit only, it did not bind them.

The defendant Mordan set up the further defence that he had revoked the authority of Burnand.

The action was tried before Bigham, J. without a jury; the learned judge gave judgment against Burnand, but he gave judgment in favour of the other four defendants upon the ground that the policies were not subscribed on their behalf, but for the benefit of Burnand only (89 L. T. Rep. 180).

The plaintiffs appealed; and the defendants, other than Burnand, gave notice of a cross-appeal.

Asquith, K.C., Scrutton, K.C., and F. D. Mackinnon for the plaintiffs.—There was ample evidence to justify the finding of Bigham, J. that the underwriting of this guarantee policy was within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's, and his finding upon that question cannot be reviewed. Burnand, therefore, had express authority to subscribe this policy with the names of the other defendants. The learned judge, however, held that, as Burnand was in fact, in subscribing the policy, acting for himself and in the furtherance of his own interests, and not in the interests of his principals, the principals were not bound. That fact is, however, immaterial, and does not in any way affect the rights of a third party who enters into a contract with the agent which is within the terms of his express authority:

Keighley, Martin, and Co. v. Durant, 84 L. T. Rep. 777; (1901) A. C. 240.

When an agent has professed to contract for principals and has their authority, his state of mind or intention cannot be inquired into in order to show that he was not really making the contract for his principals, but for his own purposes. A person contracting with an agent is in no way bound to inquire whether the agent is in fact really acting in the interests of his principal or is merely acting in his own interests and for his own purposes. The learned judge was very much guided by the judgment of Nelson, J. in the American case of North River Bank v. Aymar (3 Hill, 262). The point was, however, subsequently dealt with in other American cases, and the question has there been now settled contrary to the opinion of Nelson, J.:

New York and Newhaven Railroad Company v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. (7 Tiff.) 30; in favour of the plaintiffs. In Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P. C. 61) Lord Brougham said: "But it is said that the power was given to do the acts in question on the donor's behalf. This is really only saying that what the agent is to do, he is to do as representing the principal; as doing it on behalf of, or in the place and in the right of, the principal. But it is further said that, even if the expression be read as only amounting to this, the indorsement is only to be made for the benefit of the principal, and not for the purposes of the agent. We do not see how this very materially affects the case, for it only refers to the use to be made of the funds obtained from the indorsement, and not to the power; it relates to the purpose of the execution, not to the limits of the power itself; and, though the indorsee's title must depend upon the authority of the indorser, it cannot be made to depend upon the purposes for which the indorser performs his act under the power." And in Bryant, Powis, and Bryant v. Quebec Bank (68 L. T. Rep. 546; (1893) A. C. 170) Lord Macnaghten, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, approved of the law as laid down in President, &c., of Westfield Bank v. Cornen (ubi sup.). A principal who has authorised an agent to make a contract is bound by the contract made by his agent, whatever may be the intention and object of the agent in making that contract:

Montague Lush, K.C. and A. J. Ashton (Rufus Isaacs, K.C. and Maurice Hill with them) for the respondents. — The finding of the learned judge, that the underwriting of this policy was within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd's, was not justified by the evidence, and ought to be set aside. The decision of the learned judge that the respondents were not bound by the act of Burnand in subscribing their names to this policy was right, and ought to be upheld. It cannot be said that the respondents in any way held out Burnand to the plaintiffs as having authority to make this contract, and therefore there is no estoppel. The respondents are not bound by the act of Burnand, because he was not in fact acting for them, but for himself only. The authority which they gave him was to make contracts on their behalf, and, when he made a contract for his own purposes and not in their interests, he was not acting in the exercise of that authority at all, although he professed to act as their agent. The question is, when one person professes to act as agent on behalf of another, whether he is acting within the scope of his authority, and, when he acts for his own purposes only, he is not acting within the scope of his authority, and does not bind his principal:

The two cases in the Privy Council, Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (ubi sup.) and Bryant, Powis, and Bryant v. Quebec Bank (ubi sup.) related to negotiable instruments, and were decided upon the rules relating to the position of a bonâ fide holder for value of a negotiable instrument. The plaintiffs ought to have made inquiry as to the authority of Burnand and as to the purpose for which this guarantee policy was being given. Therefore they are affected with notice that Burnand was not acting bonâ fide on behalf of his principals.

Scrutton, K.C. replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This, no doubt, is a very important point, but when we have had the assistance which we have had from the learned counsel in argument, and the authorities cited before us which were not cited before Bigham, J., I think there can be no reasonable doubt upon the matter, and that we should gain nothing by taking time to consider our judgment. The action in this case is brought by bankers, Messrs. Hambro and Son, who arranged with Messrs. Gaze to accept drafts drawn by them on the terms that those drafts should be secured by what has been called in this case a guarantee policy. The policy in question was given on the 1st Oct. 1902. It was underwritten by Mr. Burnand, with four other names, which have been called in this case his names, these gentlemen having given an authority in very wide terms, to which I will refer in a moment, to Mr. Burnand to underwrite risks for them at Lloyd's. The policy in question is the last of a series which began as far back as 1900, but which were from time to time renewed until the 1st Oct. 1902, which is the date of the policy sued on. It is in these terms, and addressed to Messrs. Hambro and Son, the plaintiffs: "In consideration of your accepting at our request the drafts of Henry Gaze and Sons (hereinafter called the drawers) to such an amount as you may think proper, such drafts to be drawn and accepted within one year from the first day of October, one thousand nine hundred and two, and in consideration of the premium of one pound per cent. paid to us by the drawers on the execution hereof (the receipt whereof we hereby acknowledge), we the underwriters agree that, if the drawers do not at or before maturity of any such drafts put you in funds to meet the same, we will within thirty days of receipt of notice from you of such default on the part of the drawers pay to you in cash the amount of such drafts, and will further indemnify and hold you harmless against all moneys, loss, costs, charges, and expenses, which you may have to pay or to which you may be put by reason of your having accepted such drafts or by reason of any claims made by any company or person in respect of the transactions above mentioned, provided that our liability hereunder shall not exceed the amount of our respective subscriptions hereto, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the time of payment being demanded. In witness whereof we, the assurers, have subscribed our names, and assured in London this first day of October, one thousand nine hundred and two." Then followed the names of Burnand, Draffen, Read, Mordan, and Elwell, the last four of whom are the respondents in this case. As I have said, that was the last of a long series which I need not go through; they are all connected, and they were all given as renewals from time to time in respect of the original transaction in 1900. Now, the authority which was given to Mr. Burnand by Mr. Read, who is one of the names—and I read it because it is the one which has been most referred to, but there is no distinction between it and the other authorities, although there are verbal differences—under which this policy was underwritten is in these terms. I will only read the material parts of it. The said Burnand “shall act for a period of three years certain, commencing as from the 19th day of August 1891 and terminating on the 31st December 1894, and thereafter from year to year, subject to six months’ notice in writing by either party, such notice to terminate on the 31st Dec. in any year, as the agent of the said Robert Arthur Read for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd’s, and carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd’s (hereinafter called ‘the business’) in the name and on behalf of the said Robert Arthur Read, in accordance with the usual custom of Lloyd’s, and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter contained.” And then clause 2: The said Burnand “shall during the said period have the sole management of the business, and all risks shall be taken and all losses, averages, and returns shall be settled by him in the name and on the account of the said Robert Arthur Read, and the risks to be taken and the claims to be settled shall be left to the discretion of the said Percy George Calvert Burnand, who shall devote sufficient time and attention to the business for the proper management and transaction of the business.” Now, there is no doubt that the indebtedness of Messrs. Gaze became very large, and the liabilities undertaken in the aggregate by Burnand on their behalf became very large also, I think amounting to something like 100,000*l*. Ultimately this action was brought on this policy, and the defendants set up in answer two things. They say that the guarantee does not apply at all, in the first instance, because the authority is limited in the terms that I have read for the purpose of underwriting policies of insurance at Lloyd’s and carrying on the business of an underwriter at Lloyd’s. That is their first point. That raises a question of fact. Secondly, they contend that, as a matter of law, having regard to the finding and inferences of Bigham, J. as to the motives which prompted Mr. Burnand to underwrite these policies, and having regard to his relations with Messrs. Gaze, it must be held that these policies were underwritten without the authority of the respondents. Now, I will deal with the first point, which is a question of fact—namely, whether this class of policies is underwriting of policies of insurance at Lloyd’s, or carrying on the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd’s. That is the first point. Now, Bigham, J. heard a great many witnesses and had the opportunity of hearing a great many more, but he was satisfied with the overwhelming weight of evidence of those he had heard, and he did not insist upon, in fact he dismissed, the assistance of a large number of other witnesses who were there prepared to give evidence, and he came to the conclusion, on the balance of evidence, having heard evidence from the other side also, that he was clearly satisfied that this particular class of business was within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd’s. Now, it had to be admitted by the respondents themselves that the making of what are called solvency policies in this case is part of the ordinary business of underwriters at Lloyd’s. Solvency policies differ from these, it appears to me, and in fact Mr. Lush so put it, only in this respect. The solvency policy is a policy whereby the underwriter undertakes to pay on the insolvency of the debtor. The insolvency of the debtor is the event which creates his liability to pay, and that is a common form of policy at Lloyd’s. But Mr. Lush contended that, though the event insured against is insolvency, and that is a common policy, a policy where the event insured against is not the insolvency of the debtor, but the nonpayment by the debtor, is extraordinary; a policy against insolvency being ordinary, a policy against the event of a particular debtor not paying a particular sum at the time is extraordinary, and therefore entirely outside the limits of this authority. It seems to me that this was a question of fact, and the learned judge accepted what seems to me to be the clear preponderance of evidence in favour of there being no such distinction. Even if there were a distinction, there was evidence that policies of this kind were entered into against the event of nonpayment by a particular person at a particular date. Therefore it seems to me that Bigham, J., sitting as a judge of fact, was abundantly justified in coming to the conclusion at which he has arrived, and in which I cordially concur, on the evidence, that this particular class of insurance was properly, or could be properly described as falling, within the ordinary business of an underwriter at Lloyd’s. So much for the facts. There is another question of fact which is raised with respect to one of the respondents, Mr. Mordan. I do not propose to deal with that until the end of the case, so I will deal with the case broadly as covering all the respondents, and I will deal with any exceptional facts relating to Mr. Mordan afterwards. I now come to the question of law, which is that which has been most debated before us. That point is whether, where there is an express written authority given to an agent authorising in terms the very thing which that agent has done, it is open for the principal to say that, although what the agent has done is within the express words of his authority, yet if, on inquiring into his state of mind at the time he did it, the principal finds that he intended to misuse his opportunity, and, acting within the letter of the authority, to apply the power to purposes which the principal would not have sanctioned had he known it—that is, to apply to his own benefit a power which was conceded to him to be exercised for the benefit of his principal—that therefore the principal is free from liability, however much the person the agent has dealt with may have been misled into thinking he had the principal’s authority; that if, on looking into the agent’s authority, the principal comes to the conclusion that the agent was influenced by improper motives in doing what he did, the principal stands free from the obligation which might seem to be imposed on him if the actual words are looked at of the authority which was given, and within which unquestionably the act done by the agent comes. Now, I am bound to say it did seem to me, unenlightened by authority, that that was a contention which could not hold water in any court, and I have been surprised to find that at one time it was thought to be a possible answer in one of the American courts. I can therefore, although at first I did not understand it, perfectly well now understand how Bigham, J. came to take the other view. I should naturally give the greatest weight to any opinion formed by Bigham, J., particularly on a commercial question such as this is. But I begin now to see how it was that the learned judge was led to adopt the opinion which he did adopt, because it does seem that an authority from one of the courts in America was cited to him where there had been a difference of opinion between certain judges upon this very question. One judge had adopted the view that, although the authority in terms authorised the work done, it was competent to look into the authority of the agent and see whether he was misusing it or not, and if he was, and was going to misapply the proceeds which he derived from the exercise of the authority for his own benefit, the matter might be looked into, and it might be said that this was not an act by which the principal could be bound. One judge took that view; two others did not agree with it. Bigham, J., examining the reasons given, thought the reasons of the dissenting judge, the judge who was in the minority, the stronger of the two. No doubt in that case, I think, there were grounds for saying that, read in a certain way, the authority was limited so as not to cover the particular thing done. How far that was the real basis of the decision, I do not stop to inquire; at all events, Bigham, J., not being apprised—certainly not fully apprised—of the condition of the American authorities, came to the conclusion that that was the proper view. Since the case in which the judgment was given on which Bigham, J. relied, the matter has been mooted several times again in America, and ultimately the American courts have come out with a perfectly clear and authoritative judgment, adopting the principle, which I should certainly have thought was the true principle—namely, that where the written authority expressly covers the actual thing done, one cannot inquire into the motives that actuated the agent when he acted. It seems to me that it would be quite impossible for the business of a mercantile community to be carried on if one were obliged to go behind the actual authority of the agent in each case and endeavour to subject his mind to a process of scrutiny, and try to ascertain whether his motives, when fully understood, did or did not invoke an application of an authority given him for the benefit of the principal to purposes of his own private use. However it does not stand there on principle, because, since this case was argued before Bigham, J., the learned counsel for the appellants have had an opportunity of searching the authorities more fully, with the result that they have found this long concatenation of American authorities which have ultimately come out, as I have said, clearly in favour of their view. Not only have they found that, but they have found that it was both anticipated and finally adopted in England. It was anticipated in a very remarkable passage, which puts with very great clearness, it seems to me, the exact and the true view of this matter, by Lord Brougham in a judgment given in the Privy Council as far back as 1849, in the case of Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (7 Moo. P. C. 61, 74). He says this: "But it is said that the power was given to do the acts in question on the donor's behalf. This is really only saying that what the agent is to do, he is to do as representing the principal, as doing it on behalf of, or in the place and in the right of, the principal. But it is further said that, even if the expression be read as only amounting to this, the indorsement is to be only made for the benefit of the principal, and not for the purposes of the agent." That is precisely the argument that has been put so forcibly before us by Mr. Lush to-day. "We do not see how this very materially affects the case, for it only refers to the use to be made of the funds obtained from the indorsement, not to the power; it relates to the purpose of the execution, not to the limits of the power itself; and, though the indorsee's title must depend upon the authority of the indorsee, it cannot be made to depend upon the purposes for which the indorser performs his act under the power." That by anticipation deals with the very point which was the one salient point of the judgment of Bigham, J. and of the argument before us to-day. Now, it does not stand there alone, because—and none of these cases were cited to Bigham, J.—in the year 1893 there is a decision of the Privy Council (Bryant, Powis, and Bryant v. Quebec Bank, 68 L. T. Rep. 546; (1893) A. C. 710). I will first read a passage from the judgment, and then refer to the facts which bear upon it: "In the discussion at the Bar it was conceded by the learned counsel for the appellant that the banks were bonâ fide holders for value; and the argument, as in the previous case, was substantially confined to the question of Davies' authority. The authority of Davies, as the agent and attorney of the company, was derived from the power of attorney of the 25th Nov. 1885, which has been fully stated already. That instrument in terms authorises the attorney to indorse bills of exchange"—that is the authority in this case. "Their Lordships agree with Andrews, J. that the fact that Davies abused his authority and betrayed his trust cannot affect bonâ fide holders for value of negotiable instruments indorsed by him apparently in accordance with his authority. The law appears to their Lordships to be very well stated in the Court of Appeal of the State of New York, in President, &c., of the Westfield Bank v. Cornen (ubi sup.), cited by Andrews, J. in his judgment in another case brought by the Quebec Bank against the company. The passage referred to is as follows: 'Whenever the very act of the agent is authorised by the terms of the power—that is, whenever by comparing the act done by the agent with the words of the power, the act is in itself warranted by the terms used—such act is binding on the constituent, as to all persons dealing in good faith with the agent; such persons are not bound to inquire into facts aliunde. The apparent authority is the real authority.' " Now that, as has been pointed out by Mr. Scrutton, though cited and adopted in the last decision of the Court of Appeal in New York, is taken from the language used by the majority in the first case cited by Bigham, J. So that after this long series of cases in which the matter has been discussed, that was the final view of the court in America, and that is the view which has been taken by the Privy Council at home. Mr. Lush says that he accepts the authority of that case at once, but that it is the case of a negotiable instrument, and of bonâ fide holders for value, and therefore it is not in point. But when Romer, L.J. came to criticise that argument, he pointed out that by the statement in the case it appears that the agent, who indorsed, indorsed per pro—that is, on the face of the bill he showed and vouched the fact that he was an agent acting only within the limits of the specified authority. Therefore, everyone who took that bill took it with full notice of the limited rights of the person who gave it, and therefore it is not ad rem at all to say it is a question of a negotiable instrument. The measure of the rights of the person who takes is measured by the rights of the agent. Therefore we have a clear decision that the secret purposes of the agent, in misapplying for his own uses the authority which covers the act done, does not affect its validity against the principal. It seems to me, therefore, that the law is clearly established both on principle and on authority, and that the main ground of the judgment of Bigham, J. fails. I should say that Mr. Lush urged certain specific points in support of the same view. I regard those points as really going to emphasise the fact that in point of fact what Burnand did he must be taken to have done for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of the principal, and I am assuming he has established that in dealing with the law of the case. I am therefore not bound to go into the particular points which Mr. Lush urged as showing that Burnand could not have been bonâ fide, particularly the point about the premiums. On the face of this policy it appears to be perfectly correct. The plaintiffs were not called upon to inquire into what was done about the premiums. They were not the persons to pay the premium, and, on the face of the policy, it appears in the ordinary way that the premium has been dealt with. For all I know, it was dealt with. It was suggested that by some arrangement between Gaze, who had to pay it, and Burnand, who acted as broker in the matter, the premium had been set off. It may be, I do not know; but in any view it does not in the slightest degree in my judgment affect the right of the plaintiffs to put in suit this instrument, made with the authority of the defendants, against them. That disposes of the case on its broad aspects, but it is said by Mr. Mordan's counsel that he stands upon a separate footing, because it is asserted for him that after the original policy in 1900, of which the present one now sued upon is only a renewal, he revoked his authority before the date at which the policy now sued upon was executed—that is, before the 1st Oct. 1902. That, again, is a question of fact, and I find no support in the judgment of Bigham, J. for any such view. It seems to me that if Bigham, J. had accepted that view of the case, he would most certainly have referred to it in his judgment. He does not do anything of the sort; in fact, he treats Mr. Mordan exactly on the same footing as all the other defendants; and when I come to examine the evidence which it is suggested proves revocation by Mr. Mordan, in my judgment it does not support it. He has to admit that all he did was in 1901. He does appear to have had his attention called to the fact, and it would be material on another view, that this class of insurance was going on, that Mr. Burnand had been underwriting in his name this very particular class of insurance, and he also became aware that losses had to be paid upon it, and he said that he did not approve of that class of business, and thought that it ought not to be pursued; that he spoke to Burnand, who agreed with his views and expressed his intention of not going on with it, and went so far, Mr. Mordan says, that he sought to revoke his authority. However, he admits that at the end of 1901 he changed his mind, and, having taken an assurance from Mr. Burnand—I am perhaps putting it too high when I say an assurance—an intention expressed by Mr. Burnand of not embarking in that class of thing further, he withdrew his withdrawal and renunciation of authority, and left the document of authority with Mr. Burnand. So that in point of fact, after that change of mind on the part of Mr. Mordan, things remained as they were before—namely, he had given the authority to Burnand, and he had not countermanded it. Then he follows that up by giving a formal letter withdrawing his authority on six months' notice, according to the terms of the original bargain, and that six months' notice would not expire until the end of 1902. But, in the meantime, and while the power was unwithdrawn, this policy was made. But it does not stand there, because he had to admit on cross-examination that, notwithstanding that he was contending he had effectually revoked his authority, he found his name had been used in underwriting a similar policy for another banker, and he found that involved a liability on him, and he had never repudiated his obligation, and he could not explain why he had not done it. It seems to me that Bigham, J. must have arrived at the conclusion that he could not place any confidence in this gentleman's assertion that he had withdrawn the authority; he does not distinguish his case from that of the other defendants; and in my judgment on the evidence he has not shown, and I think the onus is on him of showing, that, having given the authority, he had revoked it. Therefore it seems to me he stands in the same position as the other defendants. This appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first questions we have to consider are as to matters of fact. On the questions of fact I come to the same conclusion as that arrived at by Bigham, J. First, with regard to the written agreements which conferred authority on Mr. Burnand to underwrite on behalf of his co-defendants. Now, it must be remembered in the first instance, in construing those documents, that they are entered into by men of business, who must be presumed to know the practice of carrying on business at Lloyd's. They are commercial documents entered into by commercial men and ought to be construed accordingly, and when I look at the evidence in this case, taken as a whole, as to what, at the date when these agreements were entered into, was the practice of underwriters at Lloyd's, and when I look in particular at the result of the cross-examination of

Mr. Sydney Bolton and the other expert witnesses called on behalf of the defendants, I can only say, without going through the evidence in detail, that I am satisfied that it was within the authority conferred by his co-defendants on Mr. Burnand that he should have power to underwrite such policies of guarantee as we have to consider in the case now before us. I will now say a word or two in regard to the special case sought to be made by Mr. Mordan as distinguishing his case from that of his co-defendants. His case is that the written authority had been revoked by him, at any rate before the document which is sued on in the present case was underwritten. Now, in the first place, I am bound to say that when I look at Mr. Mordan's evidence as a whole, it is not, on the point I am now considering, satisfactory to me, considering what he had to prove to sustain his contention that the written authority had been revoked; but I will for this purpose accept his own statement as given in evidence, and see what it amounts to. He says that he gave a verbal notice to Mr. Burnand purporting to revoke the written authority at a future period, which, at the time of the interview I am now considering, had not expired. Then he has a conversation with Mr. Burnand as to what Mr. Burnand contemplated doing in the future, and Mr. Burnand said: "That as the marine business was profitable and he intended to do no more guarantee business, it would be worth my while to continue." Mr. Mordan then withdrew his verbal notice. What does that mean? It means that he did not revoke the written authority. It means that he left the written authority unrevoked on the statement of Burnand that he did not intend to underwrite any future policies of guarantee. He says that he relied upon that intention as expressed by Mr. Burnand; but, even if that be admitted, he left the authority, though he may have expected it would not be acted on, so far as concerns policies of guarantee at any rate, without his being informed by Mr. Burnand of Mr. Burnand's change of intention; but, as a matter of law, the written authority remained unrevoked, and on the evidence as a whole of Mr. Mordan I unhesitatingly come to the conclusion that he has not established that he revoked that written authority. That reduces the case before us to a question of law. Now, let me first say a few words on that question as a matter of principle. Here is an authority given by underwriters to an agent to underwrite for them—a written authority expressly stating what are the powers conferred upon the agent. If the agent acts within the scope of the written authority and underwrites, it appears to me on principle that, so far as concerns persons taking in good faith for valuable consideration policies underwritten by the agent by virtue of that written authority, those policies are binding on the principals who had given the authority to the agent, and that the principals cannot escape merely because the agent may have abused his authority or betrayed his trust. Consider what would have happened if the plaintiffs in this case, who accepted the policies of guarantee, had not relied merely on the representation that Mr. Burnand made to them when he purported to sign on behalf of the four co-defendants. The utmost, it appears to me, that the plaintiffs need have done as between them and the principals of the agent would have been to ask the agent for the production of the written authority he had. Had they done that in the present case, they would have seen these written authorities. It appears to me that, if they had done that, it would have been hopeless for the principals of the agent afterwards to say that they were not bound by the written authority so inspected in a case where the agent acted, so far as they were concerned, in bad faith, he acting within the scope of the written authority. That appears to me on principle to be so clear that I shall not further pause to consider the point. Does it make any difference that as a matter of fact in the present case the plaintiffs did not inspect the written authority? In my opinion it does not, and for these reasons. By not inquiring for those documents they run, no doubt, a certain risk; but let me see what that risk is. The agent comes forward to them and represents that he has authority. He does that because he signs on behalf of the co-insurers. Now, if they do not ask for the authority, what are they relying upon when they avoid asking to see, or do not ask to see, the written authority? They rely—and that is the risk only that they take upon themselves—on his representation that, if called upon, he had that authority and can establish it. How can they then be held not entitled to hold the principals liable on these policies when it turns out that, to the extent to which they trusted the agent, they were justified in trusting him; that, to the extent to which he made a representation to them as to his authority, he was justified in making that representation? The plaintiffs are to my mind in the same position, and in no worse position, as if they had asked to see the written authority and these written authorities had been produced to them. It may be suggested that if Mr. Burnand in this case must be treated as having been guilty of fraud or misconduct, he might equally have been guilty of representing that he had authority, even if there was no written authority. But that is entirely fallacious. I should say there are few things that a man would more shrink from than writing other men's names down to documents such as these without authority, and for the very good reason that in writing such names, if he did so without authority, to say the least of it, he would run very great risk of being charged with forgery. A man might well shrink from that, even though he might not shrink from fraud or misconduct, and in the present case can anyone doubt, who knows the facts, that why Mr. Burnand did sign the documents in question here—namely, the policies of guarantee—was because he had at his back, and he relied upon, the written authorities given him by his co-defendants? It appears to me, therefore, on these grounds, that on principle the point of law ought to be decided in favour of the appellants. On the authorities, after what the Master of the Rolls has said, I desire to say but a very few words. With regard to the cases which were cited and relied upon on behalf of the respondents concerning the relations of master and servant, they appear to me to be wholly beside the case we have to decide, and for this short reason. The question in those cases is simply as to what is the implied authority conferred on a servant by his master. That has

[CT. OF APP.]

HAMBRO AND SON v. BURNAND AND OTHERS.

[CT. OF APP.]

nothing to do with a case like the present, where the authority is conferred on the agent by his principal expressly in writing; and, further, I agree with the Master of the Rolls, for the reasons he has pointed out, that this precise point has really been decided in the English courts, if not before at any rate by that case in the Privy Council of Bryant, Powis, and Bryant v. Quebec Bank (sup.) to which he has referred. It appears to me therefore, both on principle and authority, that the point of law decided by Bigham, J. ought to be decided adversely to his view, and that the appeal ought to succeed. Let me add in conclusion that, of course, although the document relied upon by the plaintiffs—the policy of guarantee—was within the scope of the authority of the agent, if the plaintiffs had taken the policy with knowledge of the fraud of the agent, they would not be entitled to hold the policies as against the persons defrauded. To my mind the respondents here utterly fail to establish any such case. All that they can say was known to the plaintiffs with regard to the peculiar position of Mr. Burnand was that he was, at the time the document sued on in this case was executed, a director of Gaze's, who were so much concerned in the transaction. But did that affect them with notice that Mr. Burnand was therefore in a position which rendered it impossible for him to act as agent in signing these policies on behalf of his principals? I should certainly think not. It certainly cannot be said, to my mind, on the evidence that there was anything in the nature of knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs, direct or indirect, of any misconduct on Mr. Burnand's part, nor that they were, as it is said on behalf of the respondents, in any way put on further inquiry in reference to the transactions in question. Therefore any attempted answer, as against the point of law, on behalf of the respondents fails. Therefore I am also of opinion with the Master of the Rolls that this appeal ought to succeed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The very full judgments which have been delivered relieve me of the necessity of doing more than expressing briefly my reasons for concurring in the judgments which have been given. Now, the first important question is a question of fact, whether or not this policy is one that in the ordinary course of business would be obtainable and would be effected at Lloyd's. In my opinion it is hardly too much to say that the whole of the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs and defendants pointed one way—to the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived, that this policy was one which could be readily obtained at Lloyd's, and which in the ordinary course of business would be effected merely upon consideration of the amount of premium by underwriters at Lloyd's. Attention was called on the part of the plaintiffs to the fact, which was admitted on the part of the defendants, that a great change had taken place in the way business was carried on at Lloyd's, and that now there was a vast variety of subjects of insurance. Indeed, I think Mr. Lush was prepared to admit that anything might be insured except the risk in question. He stoutly contended that the risk in question was not within the ordinary scope of the business of an under-writer at Lloyd's. Attention was called to the fact that solvency policies were well known at Lloyd's, and certainly they appear to be policies of the same character as the one in question. Further, this very form of policy had been in use at Lloyd's from the year 1890. All that had to be admitted. It was said on the part of the plaintiffs that the evidence they offered was complete and perfectly satisfactory to show that a policy like this could be got to-morrow at Lloyd's, and that there would be no difficulty in inducing any underwriter, on his being properly remunerated, to take the risk on himself. Now, what was the evidence offered on the part of the defendants—evidence which was elicited in an exceedingly dexterous manner? The ground taken by the defendants was difficult to occupy, but at any rate it was occupied for a very considerable time with an appearance of plausibility. The witnesses who were called, who were brokers of great experience, had their attention called to this particular policy on which this action was brought. They were asked if they were familiar with that form. They said that they were not; and they went further and said they had never seen that form. This was the evidence offered to show that no such insurance could be obtained at Lloyd's. It carried the defendants a very little way indeed, because it was quite possible these experienced brokers may not have seen a policy in this form. The market was described as a limited one, and they might call any number of underwriters to show they had not seen this form of policy, without proving that no such policy would be effected at Lloyd's. It carried them a very little way indeed. Then it was said that the fact that this form of policy is not generally known by brokers shows that it is exceptional in principle as well as in form; but the witnesses called for the defendants had to admit that the solvency policy was all well enough, but said that this policy was a different thing. How different? They were pressed a good deal in cross-examination, and one could see how every moment the grasp of the witnesses on the position in which the defendants wished to place them was loosened, and many of them readily drifted into an admission that they could not see any reason whatever why, if a solvency policy could be obtained, the policy in question should not also be obtainable at Lloyd's. What was the difference in principle? In the one case, in the case of a solvency policy, there is an insurance against a default, due to the bankruptcy or insolvency of the debtor. In the other case there is an insurance against a default on the part of the debtor in finding a sum of money at a particular date. In principle, to my mind, there is not the slightest difference between the two cases; and the learned judge, having heard a great deal of the evidence offered for the defendants, saw in the end how hopeless the contention was, and intimated his opinion, without hearing any further evidence, that he came to a conclusion upon this question of fact against the contention of the defendants. I should, perhaps, advert to the argument of Mr. Lush, that this was not insurance at all; that this particular contract was not a contract of insurance, but of suretyship; that it was a promise to answer the debt of another, but was not insurance. Unfortunately he was committed to the admission that the solvency policy was a policy of insurance, and, if so, what was the use of saying that this was only a policy to back a bill, and therefore ought not to be treated as an insurance. Passing from that point, I come to the point of law, and really I have nothing to add to what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J. upon that point. This I would repeat, that to my mind it would be fatal to the transaction of mercantile business if there were to be put upon a person dealing with a broker an inquiry into the motives with which the broker was entering into the contract. Those who employ brokers in the city of London, those who employ persons in the position of Mr. Burnand at the time when his authority was given to him, would know perfectly well that he would state to those with whom he was dealing that he had the authority to write a certain number of lines. Those who instructed him would know well that his word would be acted on, and that, upon his statement to Messrs. Hambro that he had the authority to represent those lines, they would not put searching inquiries to him and require him to produce the documents. There the documents were if they were called for, and on an inquiry the position is the same as against the defendants as if Messrs. Hambro had asked for the documents that they might inspect them and had then seen what the authority was. Burnand having that authority, is it to be suggested that Messrs. Hambro were to enter on an inquiry as to what motives the broker had in carrying the transaction through as he had done in this case? How could the inquiry be made? Any inquiry even approaching that would be regarded as an insult, and would be fatal to the transaction of business. No reasonable man would say that the plaintiffs were not bound to give credit to the statements of Burnand, but that they must first insist on seeing the documents and then enter into an inquiry as to his relations with Gaze and Co., and as to the possibility of his having some personal interest and therefore some indirect motive in the insurance being effected. There is no authority for saying any such inquiry has ever been required amongst English underwriters and English brokers. I can see at the same time how Bigham, J. was misled. There was a mass of authority on the subject in the early days of legal study in the United States, and for a time there appears to have been some error of judgment amongst the courts there; but they ultimately cleared themselves of the suggestion that the motives of the broker could ever be looked into. It is enough for us to say that the English law has established abundant authority that business may be carried on, in the future as in the past, with brokers with proper authority, without any inquiry as to the motives with which the particular contract was entered into. The passages which have been read by my Lord from the judgment of Lord Brougham in Bank of Bengal v. Fagan (sup.), the passage read from Story, sect. 73, and the case in the Privy Council of Bryant, Powis, and Bryant v. Quebec Bank (sup.), all appear to me to establish the law on the subject, and we do not need the very weighty authority which has been based upon it to show there is no such doctrine as the doctrine we are asked for the first time to lay down in this case. I agree, therefore, with the judgments which have been pronounced, and that the appeal must be allowed and cross-appeal dismissed.

OWENS v. P. AND A. CAMPBELL LIMITED. (a)
APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT, 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Employment—On, in, or about a wharf—Fireman on steamer moored to wharf—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

A passenger steamer was made fast to a landing pontoon outside a dock, and gangways were out connecting the vessel with the pontoon in order to enable passengers to go on board. A seaman employed as a fireman on the steamer was injured by an explosion while he was attending to the boilers.

Held (allowing the appeal, Mathew, L.J. dissenting), that the workman was not employed on, in, or about the wharf, inasmuch as his employment had no connection with the purposes for which the wharf was being used by his employers, and that therefore he was not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

APPEAL of the defendants from the award of the County Court judge at Cardiff, in proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff alleged he was injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the defendants, and he claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The plaintiff was a fireman employed on the Cambria, a steamer belonging to the defendants. He was a seaman on the ship's articles, and was engaged on his duties as a fireman when a boiler burst and he was injured.

The Cambria was a passenger steamer, which made trips to Ilfracombe and other places from Cardiff.

The Cambria came into Cardiff on the evening of 20th Aug. 1903, and was made fast to the landing pontoon, which is at the head of the Cardiff Drain, and outside the entrance to the docks. The pontoon is a wooden landing stage, which rises and falls with the tide, by means of which the passengers embark on and land from vessels.

The Cambria remained afloat from the time that she came in until about 8.30 p.m., when she was left dry on the mud. She was made fast to the pontoon by ropes, and she continued to be made fast by the same fastenings until she left the pontoon.

OWENS v. P. AND A. CAMPBELL LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

The engine fires in the vessel were left in all night, and the plaintiff, early on the morning of the accident, went on board the vessel to perform his usual duties as a fireman.

The vessel was afloat about 1.30 a.m. on the morning of the day of the accident, and was timed to leave Cardiff for Ilfracombe at 8.15 a.m.

At 8.17 a.m., whilst the plaintiff was attending to the boilers, a tube in one of the boilers burst, and he was severely scalded on the face and arms.

The gangways from the vessel to the pontoon had been out—that is, connecting the pontoon with the vessel—for some time before the accident happened, and at that time practically all the passengers were on board the vessel.

The main and auxiliary engines of the vessel had been worked before the accident happened.

The passengers on board the vessel were, after the accident, transferred to the steamer Ravenwood, which left Cardiff about 8.30 a.m.

The accident happened whilst the Cambria was moored to the pontoon for the embarkation of passengers.

The County Court judge held, upon the authority of Griffin v. Houlder Line (90 L. T. Rep. 142; (1904) 1 K. B. 510), that the plaintiff was employed in an employment within the Act, and he made an award in his favour.

The defendants appealed.

J. A. Simon for the appellants.—The learned County Court judge was wrong in holding that this case came within the Act. The vessel upon which the plaintiff was employed was not at the time of the accident a "factory" within the meaning of the Act. If the pontoon was a "wharf" and therefore a "factory" within the meaning of the Act, yet the vessel was not within that factory, and the plaintiff was not employed on, in, or about that factory:

Griffin v. Houlder Line Limited, 90 L. T. Rep. 142; (1904) 1 K. B. 510.

The plaintiff was not employed upon any work connected with the business of the wharf or the purposes for which his employers were occupying the wharf. There was no connection between the work upon which he was employed and the business of the wharf; and therefore he was not employed on, in, or about the wharf:

Powell v. Brown, 79 L. T. Rep. 631; (1899) 1 Q. B. 157;

Raine v. Jobson, 85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404.

H. Gatehouse (with him Albert Parsons) for the respondent.—The County Court judge rightly held that the plaintiff was entitled to compensation under the Act. The defendants had the use of the wharf and were the occupiers thereof within the meaning of the Act, and were therefore "undertakers." The wharf was occupied by the vessel upon which the plaintiff was employed, and he was therefore employed on, in, or about the factory"; that is, the wharf:

Merrill v. Wilson, Sons, and Co., 83 L. T. Rep. 490; (1901) 1 K. B. 35.

The fact that he was a seaman employed upon a ship does not prevent him from being entitled to compensation under the Act:

Griffin v. Houlder Line Limited, 90 L. T. Rep. 142; (1904) 1 K. B. 510.

J. A. Simon replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 26.—COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of the County Court judge at Cardiff, who held that the workman was entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The applicant was a workman who was employed as a fireman on a passenger steamer which made daily trips from Cardiff to Ilfracombe and other places. Upon the occasion in question the vessel had been lying during the night at a wharf, which was outside the docks at Cardiff, and was due to start on the following morning at 8.15 from Cardiff with passengers. As stated in the judge's notes, the plaintiff was a seaman on the ship's articles and engaged on his duties as a seaman at the time of the accident. What the plaintiff was doing at the time of the accident is also stated in the notes: "The engine fires in the vessel were left in all night, and the applicant early on the morning of the accident went on board the vessel to perform his usual duties as a fireman. The vessel was afloat about 1.30 a.m. on the morning of the day of the accident, and was timed to leave Cardiff for Ilfracombe at 8.15 a.m. At 8.17 a.m., whilst the applicant was attending to the boilers, a tube in one of the boilers burst, and he was severely scalded on the face and arms." The man, therefore, had signed on as a seaman and was employed as a seaman at the time of the accident, and the accident arose out of his employment while he was attending to the boilers. It was contended on behalf of the employers before the County Court Judge that they were not liable to pay compensation under the Act, as prima facie a seaman employed in a ship was not within the Act, because a ship was not a factory, and the owners were not the undertakers in respect thereof. The County Court judge held that a recent decision of the Court of Appeal settled the question. In Griffin v. Houlder Line (90 L. T. Rep. 142; (1904) 1 K. B. 510) the ship was in a dock, and a seaman was employed in cleaning out a hold for the reception of cargo when he met with an accident. This court there held that, as the ship was in a dock, and as the dock was a factory, the principle of Raine v. Jobson and Co. (85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404) applied, and that the seaman was at the time of the accident employed in a factory, and therefore, notwithstanding that he was a seaman, he came within the Act. The fact that he was a seaman did not exclude his rights under the Act, the ship being in a dock and therefore in a factory. There was no doubt in that case of the physical fact that the ship was in a dock, and that the dock was a factory. The question is whether that decision governs the present case. In the present case neither the ship nor the man was in a dock. No doubt the ship was lying alongside and using a wharf, and at the time of the accident it had not completely ceased to use the wharf; and the wharf was a factory within the Act. So far as the employers were using the wharf for the purposes for which a wharf was designed for use they were "undertakers" in respect thereof within the meaning of the Act, having the actual use or occupation thereof. How far does that entitle the applicant to relief under the Act? That depends upon sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. That section provides that "this Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a factory." A wharf is for this purpose a factory. Therefore the workman has to show that he was employed by the undertakers on in or about a wharf. That seems to me to be the only material question in this case. Upon the facts here, could it be said that this fireman, in discharging his ordinary duties as a fireman, was employed on or in or about a factory? Clearly he was not employed on or in a factory. Was he employed about a factory? This court has frequently laid it down, and it is well settled, that the word "about," as used in sect. 7, has in it the meaning of physical proximity. This workman was certainly employed near the factory. It also involves the idea of employment upon the business of the factory. If and so far as the workman was employed in relation to the purposes for which the employers had the use of the wharf he could be said to be employed by the undertakers about the wharf. But in dealing with these cases it must not be forgotten that one is dealing with what may be called constructive factories, and it is necessary to keep clearly before one's mind the nature of the factory in respect of which the employers were the undertakers and the purposes for which that factory was used, and to see whether the workman was employed about that factory. The mere fact that a man was employed by the occupier of a factory in juxtaposition to the factory would not constitute employment "on, in, or about" a factory within the meaning of sect. 7. Take a simple illustration. The occupier of a factory is being driven home from the factory by his coachman, and at a distance of, say, fifty yards from the factory the coachman meets with an accident. The coachman would be, no doubt, employed by the occupier of the factory, and therefore by the undertaker, and at the time of the accident would be employed near the factory; but he would not be employed on or in or about the factory within the meaning of sect. 7, because his employment did not concern the factory at all. It was a mere accident that he was injured near the factory. No doubt some cases come near the line, but a line, however fine, must exist, and a case must lie on one side or other of the line. The injured man in the present case was a seaman engaged at the time of the accident in discharging his ordinary duties in attending to the boilers of the ship; he was employed physically near the factory, but his work had no connection with the purposes for which the wharf was occupied. The County Court judge held that the case came within the decision in Griffin v. Houlder Line (ubi sup.), and that the Act applied. Upon the facts here the ship was clearly not in a dock, and, in my opinion, the employment was not on or in or about a wharf. The case, therefore, does not come within the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

ROMER, L.J. read the following judgment:—I am of the same opinion. It is admitted that the landing stage is a "factory," within the Act. But by the steamer being moored alongside and using the stage for the purposes of passengers and goods being taken into and from the ship, it did not become part of the wharf, or become itself as a whole a "factory." Nor, in my opinion, did every man upon and employed in the service of the ship become by the circumstances above referred to at once and of necessity employed on, in, or about a factory. No doubt a man ordinarily employed in the ship may, by the particular work he has to do while the ship is moored, be employed on, in, or about the landing stage, and so come within the Act. But whether he is so employed must depend on the special circumstances of his employment. I can only say that in the circumstances of the present case, which the Master of the Rolls has stated and are not in dispute, I come to the conclusion that the man was not employed on, in, or about the landing stage, and so is not within the Act. I gather that the point on which we are deciding this case was not sufficiently brought to the attention of the learned County Court judge, but the point is open to the appellants, and I think, therefore, that the appeal succeeds.

MATHEW, L.J. read the following judgment:—I regret to be unable to agree with the opinions of the Master of the Rolls and Romer, L.J., but it seems to me that the grounds upon which we are asked to allow the appeal are less satisfactory than the reasons for its dismissal. If the accident had occurred while the applicant was employed on a vessel moored to a wharf in a dock, he would be entitled to the protection of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, for the dock would be a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 and the Factory and Workshop Act 1901, and the applicant in the course of his employment would be "on or in or about" the factory: (see Raine v. Jobson and Co., 85 L. T. Rep. 141; (1901) A. C. 404, and Griffin v. Houlder Line Limited, 90 L. T. Rep. 142; (1904) 1 K. B. 510.) But, because the Cambria was moored to a wharf outside a dock, it was argued that the employment of the workman was one to which the Act did not apply. The wharf, it was agreed, was a factory, but it was said that, though he might be protected while passing near to and over the wharf to the steamer, he lost the benefit of the Act when he reached the deck of the steamer. From that time, it was argued, he could not be said to be working in or on the wharf, and was therefore outside the Act. It would follow that a workman going to the ship by the only approach to the wharf to do some necessary repairs and sustaining an injury when close to the wharf on the shore side would have no claim for compensation. It appears from the evidence that the applicant's employers had, for the purposes of their business as owners of the Cambria, the actual use and occupation of the wharf within the meaning of the Act of 1901, sect. 104. The vessel made daily trips from Cardiff to places on the neighbouring coast and back. On arriving at Cardiff she was brought under steam to the wharf and placed in her berth. She was fastened by ropes to the wharf, and remained fastened until her next voyage. Passengers coming on board and leaving passed over the wharf. Early in the morning of the accident the applicant came on board to attend to his ordinary duties as fireman. Steam was got up and the main and auxiliary engines were worked. At 8.17 the passengers were all on board and the steamer was on the point of departure. The applicant was standing by the boilers when a tube burst and he was badly scalded. In my view the evidence shows that the appellants could not have made the wharf available for their business without the assistance of such a workman as the applicant. He was on the steamer for a purpose directly connected with their use of the wharf, and I have come to the conclusion that in the course of his employment he was at the time of the accident "about" the wharf within the meaning of sect. 7 of the Act of 1897. If, as was assumed upon the argument of this point, the employment of the fireman was one to which the Act applied, the general intention of the Legislature must be admitted to be that there should be a right to compensation. The language of sect. 7 seems to me to permit effect to be given to the intention in the case of the applicant. I find nothing in the Act to suggest that the Legislature meant to distinguish between the rights of workmen of the same class or to show that while workman A was within the Act, workman B, under similar, if not the same, circumstances, was intended to be left unprotected. I therefore come to the conclusion that the appeal on this point fails.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

June 9 and 10.

(Before KEKEWICH, J.)

EDMUNDSON v. RENDER. (a)

Solicitor—Covenant in articles of clerkship not to practise within certain radius—Breach—Work usually done by solicitors.

The defendant had bound himself to a solicitor practising at M. by articles for a term, and covenanted that he would not at any time do any work or act for or on behalf of any persons usually done by solicitors within a radius of fifteen miles from M. without written permission. The defendant took proceedings to obtain probate of the will of a person within the prohibited radius, and corresponded from H. with a witness within the prohibited radius with a view to obtaining his evidence in order to enable probate to be obtained. He signed the praecipe directing a plaint note to be issued for a County Court summons at a court in the prohibited area on behalf of a plaintiff residing therein, and conducted the proceedings until receipt of the amount paid into court. He prepared the will of a testatrix residing within the area on instructions received outside the area, and received a small fee therefor, but was present when she executed it within the area; and, lastly, he advertised in a paper circulating within but published outside the area a farm for letting within the prohibited district.

Held, in an action to restrain the defendant from practising within the prohibited limit, that the covenant might be broken although the defendant or his clerks did not go professionally within such limit. That therefore the proceedings in connection with the collection of the debt through the County Court infringed the covenant. Also the acts done in relation to the execution of the will, which must be held to have been done by defendant in his character of a solicitor, constituted a breach of such covenant, but that those as to advertising the farm did not break it. Quære, as to applying for the proof of evidence infringing the covenant.

By articles of agreement dated in 1893, and made between the plaintiff, Charles Francis Peter Edmundson, a solicitor, of the one part and the defendant, John William Render, of the other part, the defendant bound himself as articulated clerk with plaintiff in the profession of a solicitor for three years. The agreement contained the following proviso and covenant:

Provided always and the said John W. Render doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree to and with the said Charles F. P. Edmundson, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he the said John W. Render shall not at any time hereafter, either on his own behalf or as a clerk or partner, or otherwise on behalf of any other person or persons who practise, or who may practise or carry on, the business or profession of a solicitor, do any work or act for or on behalf of any person or persons usually done by solicitors within a radius of fifteen miles from Masham Market Cross without the written permission of the said Charles F. P. Edmundson, or of the said firm, or the successor or successors of the said firm. And the said John W. Render will, in case of any infringement of this covenant on his part, submit to an injunction and abide by the decision of any court of law or equity as to damages and costs.

The plaintiff is and was at the time of the execution of the articles a member of the firm of Edmundson and Gowland, solicitors, practising at Masham and other places.

The defendant served the plaintiff as clerk until the 31st Aug. 1899, was admitted a solicitor in Aug. 1901, and thereupon commenced practising, opening an office at Harrogate, a short distance outside the prohibited area under the covenant. He resided at a place about a mile and a half from Masham Market Cross.

The plaintiff asserted that the defendant had committed divers breaches of the covenant in his articles of clerkship, and set out particulars of four of such breaches in par. 4 of his statement of claim. As to these alleged breaches, the evidence was as follows:—

In Oct. 1901 the defendant was given instructions to obtain probate of the will of James Baine Metcalfe, deceased, late of Swinton, near Masham, within the prohibited radius. He corresponded with a witness within that radius, and asked him, to send to Harrogate a proof of his evidence, which the witness ultimately declined to do.

Defendant was instructed by one Jackson, of Fearby, to sue a person named Wilkinson, of Fearby Cross, near Masham, for a debt in the County Court at Ripon. Fearby, Fearby Cross, and Ripon are within fifteen miles of Masham Market Cross. Defendant signed the praecipe upon which the registrar entered the plaint, the particulars, and notices to admit and produce, at his office at Harrogate. He described himself as the solicitor for the plaintiff, and stated he would accept service of all proceedings on his behalf. He served notice to admit and produce, and signed a receipt, which he sent to the registrar, for the amount paid into court in satisfaction of the cause of action.

On the 21st May 1903 he sent a telegram to the defendant in the County Court action, which he handed in at Masham, stating that the plaintiff in that action accepted the amount paid in. Defendant had not seen the plaintiff in that action at Masham in the matter.

In 1902 and 1903 he acted as solicitor for one Susannah Topham, of Pateley Bridge, within the prohibited radius.

Plaintiff had made a codicil to the will of Susannah Topham. Subsequently he found that defendant had been instructed to remake the will and codicil, and had gone to Pateley Bridge in order to get it executed. It was admitted that the whole will, including the date and attestation clause, were in the defendant's handwriting.

He was also present at the execution of the will on the 5th Sept. 1902. He stated that written instructions for the preparation of the will were given to him at Harrogate.

He was in September staying with a mutual friend, who asked him to go and see her sign her will, saying defendant need not make a business matter of it. He declined, but eventually went to her house, and the will was executed in his presence, but he did not witness the testatrix's signature. A charge of 10s. 6d. had been previously paid to defendant.

In April and May 1903 defendant caused advertisements to be inserted in a newspaper published at Harrogate offering to let a farm within the prohibited area, stating that application might be made to him at Harrogate. The newspaper circulates within the prohibited district.

The plaintiff brought this action claiming an injunction restraining the defendant from doing work as a solicitor in breach of his covenant, and also asking for damages.

Stewart-Smith, K.C. and F. H. Maughan, for the plaintiff, stated the above facts.—The defendant claims the right to do what he has done. He says he is within his right in doing professional work within the district provided he does not go within it. The issuing the plaint at the Ripon County Court was a breach of the covenant:

May v. O'Neill, 44 L. J. 660, Ch.

There is no such thing as being a solicitor of a particular County Court. The solicitor must sign the particulars before he demands his fee, and whether he enters the plaint by post or by clerk the effect is the same. Defendant on the particulars describes himself as the plaintiff's solicitor:

County Court Rules 1903, Order VI., r. 9.

He selected the Post Office as his agent for entering the plaint at Ripon within the prohibited area, but it was none the less his act, which also applies to the notice to admit. As the plaintiff's solicitor on the 21st May 1903 he signed the receipt for the amount paid into court. The writing to the witnesses as to the Metcalfe probate to come to him from Masham to Harrogate was an evasion of the covenant. It makes no difference whether defendant goes there himself or invites a witness within the prohibited area to send him a proof. [KEKEWICH, J. expressed the view that the extent of the prohibited radius could not be considered unreasonable.] If the defendant's contention that while he remains in his office at Harrogate he cannot infringe the covenant is correct, he might issue County Court summonses against undefended debtors and collect debts within the prohibited area. Defendant was the solicitor on the record. With regard to Miss Topham's will, he forwarded the ordinary form of directions as to its execution.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. and Owen Thompson for the defendant.—Mr. Render has done no work usually done by solicitors within the prohibited radius. He does not claim the right to appear in the County Court. Before he can do that he must sign the roll:

County Court Rules 1903, Order LIV., r. 7.

Plaints may be entered by letter:

Order V., r. 12.

The work was done at defendant's office outside the prohibited radius, nor have his clerks or agents served any documents within it.

KEKEWICH, J.—In dealing with the questions in this case I am dealing with pure questions of law. No question of conduct arises, and I have endeavoured with some if not with quite a full measure of success to exclude from discussion in the case any question of that kind. I take it that Mr. Render has honestly endeavoured to observe the covenant into which he has entered, and by which he is bound; and if, unfortunately, he has transgressed the covenant, there is not the least ground for finding fault with him as having been guilty of intentional misconduct. Mr. Render has, in my judgment, committed an error. He has made a mistake, not only in doing that which is wrong, which has led to the present dispute, but also he has made the mistake, which is a very serious one, of advising himself on a difficult question. I conclude that what he has done was based on a desire to keep within the limits of this covenant, but he has construed it erroneously. He wished to fulfil his obligations under it, but he has construed them erroneously. The cases in which he is said to have broken the covenant are set forth in the statement of claim. I take the first—the obtaining probate of the will of James R. Metcalfe. There was no question as to his obeying the instructions in what he had done in that respect. He did work usually done by a solicitor. In the course of doing that work he had occasion to obtain the proof of a witness residing within the prohibited limit. He corresponded with that witness, and asked him to send to Harrogate a proof of his evidence. It is said that that is a breach of the covenant. Without professing to give a definite opinion upon it, because the matter has not been thrashed out, and I am disposing of the case upon other grounds, I may express my view of this matter. It is extremely difficult to come to a conclusion on such a matter as that. I think some liberality must be exercised in construing a covenant of this kind. Take the case of a man engaged as an articled clerk at Bristol, who has entered into a covenant similar to that in the present case, and has then set up business at Harrogate, and, in proving the will of a man who dies at Harrogate, he finds it necessary to obtain evidence at Bristol to support the application for probate, I should be extremely unwilling to say that he committed a breach of covenant not to do work at Bristol by writing for the proof of a witness there, but I have no occasion now to consider this question, and I say no more about it. Then I pass over the two breaches next charged in the statement of claim, and I take the last. Mr. Render was instructed to let a farm at Felbeck, near Pateley Bridge. I cannot see how it can possibly come within the covenant. For his work he would have been entitled to charge under the scale. He advertised in a paper circulating at Pateley Bridge, and intended the advertisement should be read there. The paper was published at Harrogate. So far as Mr. Render was concerned, nothing was done outside Harrogate. There was no transgression of the covenant. Now I turn to the other cases. Mr. Render was instructed to sue a person in the Ripon County Court, that being within the limit, and he accordingly took proceedings. A plaint was issued, and a copy served with the summons. Notice was given that the money sued for was paid into court. It was accepted in discharge and paid out of court. All that was done by Mr. Render without his leaving his office. He paid the necessary fee, and sent his notice that the registrar was to accept the money paid in in discharge of the claim. He dated the address for service at Harrogate. When the time came and the money was paid into court, he took it out and gave the registrar a receipt, and he now says that there was not a transgression of the covenant in the articles of clerkship because there was no doing of work usually done by a solicitor. To my mind that is an erroneous view. Mr. Render considered that so long as he or his clerk was not within the limit he could do all this. It seems to me that there are two possible answers to that. The first is that the Postmaster-General was the agent for Mr. Render for doing what was done. That seems to be, perhaps, an absurd contention, and I pass that over, because I think that in issuing and entering the plaint the registrar was the agent of Mr. Render. The rule says that where a person wishes to enter a plaint he may, instead of attending, transmit a præcipe free of cost to the registrar. The words of the rule point to the entry being made by the person, plaintiff, or his solicitor, notwithstanding it is done by means of the post. The rule is in the following terms: "Where a person desires to enter a plaint in a court within the district of which he does not reside, he may, instead of attending at the court, transmit free of cost to the registrar (1) a præcipe . . . and upon receipt of the above the registrar shall enter the plaint." He still enters the plaint. The act is done by him. It seems to me that it is impossible to say that Mr. Render did not enter that plaint, notwithstanding the fact that he never left his office or went to Ripon. The same consideration applies to taking the money out and the other proceedings in the case. Finding as I do on this point, it would be unnecessary to say anything about the other, but the case is of great importance to the parties, and I propose to deal with that also. Mr. Render, on the instructions of relatives prepared a will for Susannah Topham, and he sent that will to relatives for her execution. He had written instructions for the preparation of that will. He saw a gentleman in Harrogate through whom he had instructions, and he prepared and engrossed the will, and sent it for execution. So far, although it was usual work done by a solicitor, it cannot be said to have been work done within the limit. He did not make a detailed charge for his services, but he charged for them half a guinea, which was sent in in the regular way as his bill, and paid as his bill. I assume that friendly reasons intervened as to the smallness of the amount, but I must take it as a regular solicitor's charge. He was on a visit to this Mr. Verity at Pateley Bridge, and he was asked to attend the execution, and he very properly said he could not. His good nature prevailed, and he did go. Two other witnesses were procured, who attested the testatrix's signature, and he did not witness the will. Why did he attend if it was not to see that the will was properly executed, that the date was filled in, and, I must infer, for the purpose of showing the testatrix and witnesses where they were to sign? He must have done this in his character of a solicitor. I desire, however, to guard myself against holding that a man may not do an act of this kind for charity without making himself liable for breach of such a covenant as the present. That depends on circumstances. If this had been a friendly act throughout, I should not have thought it an infraction of the covenant. If solicitors, from a feeling of good nature, do friendly acts for their friends, not really in the character of solicitors, they are amply secured. I cannot say that it was so here. He drew the will. He admitted it was a matter of business as a solicitor, and I think his attendance must be referred to the character he bore before in the transaction. I think that Mr. Render transgressed the covenant. Therefore on these two matters I think the covenant was broken. I can quite understand that it is important to Mr. Edmundson that the covenant should be observed, although I do not think Mr. Render has wilfully failed to observe it, and I think that he will be well advised to observe it more strictly in the future. There is no reason why anything can be said against the defendant, and there is no reason why he, a gentleman occupying a professional capacity, should be put under the injunction asked for, but he must pay the costs of the action, and 1*l.* nominal damages.

certain charity. Some eight years afterwards the donor, with the object of giving the sum in her lifetime, executed another deed by which she covenanted to pay the 5000*l.* at once, and by this deed she, her executors and estate, were relieved from payment of the 5000*l.* under the former deed. The 5000*l.* was paid over, and the donor died within twelve months from the execution of the deed and the payment. Upon her death the Crown claimed estate duty upon this sum of 5000*l.*

Held, that the payment of the 5000*l.* was "an immediate gift inter vivos," within the meaning of sect. 38, sub-sect. 2 (a), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881; that it was none the less a gift because there was a release of the donor and her estate from the obligation under the prior deed, and that, as the donor died within twelve months from the making of the gift, estate duty was payable under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (c), of the Finance Act 1894.

INFORMATION by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty.

1. By an indenture dated the 1st June 1892, and made between Eliza Warrington of the one part and the defendant Viscount Cobham, Lord Kinnauld, Sir Harry Vernon, and G. W. Child of the other part, after reciting an indenture dated the 11th July 1889, whereby certain trust funds were settled upon the trusts therein particularly appearing, as and by way of endowment for the college of the blind sons of gentlemen, established at Powyke in the county of Worcester (now called "College for the Higher Education of the Blind"), and reciting that Eliza Warrington was desirous of adding to and increasing the endowments to the extent and at the time thereafter mentioned.

It was witnessed that Eliza Warrington thereby covenanted with Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, Sir Harry Foley Vernon, and G. W. Child that the executors or administrators of Eliza Warrington would, within three calendar months after her death, pay to Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, Sir Harry Foley Vernon, and G. W. Child or the survivors or survivor of them or the executors or administrators of such survivor or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the now stating indenture the sum of 5000*l.* free of all duties, charges, or deductions whatsoever, to be held and applied by them or him upon the trust thereafter mentioned, and Eliza Warrington thereby directed and Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, Sir Harry Foley Vernon, and G. W. Child thereby declared that they or the survivors or survivor of them or the executors or administrators of such survivor or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the now stating indenture, to whom the aforesaid sum of 5000*l.* should become payable should and would recover and receive payment thereof, and stand possessed thereof upon trust to pay and transfer the same to the persons or person who should then be the trustees or trustee of the recited indenture of trust, to be held by such last mentioned trustees or trustee upon the like trusts, as and by way of addition to and augmentation of the moneys comprised in and settled by such last mentioned indenture, provided always and it was thereby declared that the trustees or trustee of the now stating indenture might either themselves receive the sum of 5000*l.* and pay the same to the trustees or trustee for the time being of the recited indenture of trust, or might direct or cause the same to be so paid by the executors or administrators of Eliza Warrington without themselves receiving the same or any part thereof, and that all obligations and responsibility of the trustees or trustee thereof should cease and determine as soon as they should have paid or caused to be paid the aforesaid sum to the persons or person who should for the time being appear to be the trustees or trustee for the time being of the recited indenture of trust, and that notwithstanding any irregularity or informality in the appointment of such last mentioned trustees or any of them; and it was thereby declared that Eliza Warrington during her life should have the statutory power of appointing a new trustee or trustees of the now stating indenture.

2. By an indenture (indorsed on the lastly-stated indenture) dated the 3rd Nov. 1900 and made between Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, and Sir Harry Foley Vernon of the one part and Eliza Warrington of the other part. After reciting the death of G. W. Child and reciting that Eliza Warrington had agreed to pay the therein within mentioned sum of 5000*l.* to Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, and Sir Harry Foley Vernon as surviving trustees of the therein within written indenture upon the trusts therein within declared concerning the same upon having such release from the covenant on her part in the therein within written indenture as was therein-after contained. It was witnessed that in consideration of the premises and of the payment of the sum of 5000*l.* to Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, and Sir Harry Foley Vernon (the receipt whereof they did thereby acknowledge), they, Viscount Cobham, Baron Kinnauld, and Sir Harry Foley Vernon, as surviving trustees of the therein within written indenture, did thereby release Eliza Warrington, her executors and administrators, estate and effects from all actions, claims, and demands whatsoever for or in respect or on account of the therein within mentioned sum of 5000*l.* and the covenant on the part of Eliza Warrington relating thereto in the therein within written indenture contained.

3. Eliza Warrington upon the execution of the lastly-stated indenture paid the sum of 5000*l.* to the trustees of the indenture of the 1st June 1892, who duly paid that sum to the trustees of the college. The defendants were the trustees of the college, and the sum of 5000*l.* was vested in them as such trustees.

4. Eliza Warrington died within twelve months from the date of the lastly-stated indenture, and from the date of payment of the sum of 5000*l.*—namely, on the 19th May 1901.

5. Under the circumstances aforesaid it was contended on behalf of the Crown that estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act 1894, and succession duty under the provisions of the Succession Duty Act 1853, became payable by the defendants in respect of the sum of 5000*l.*, as to the estate duty on the death of Eliza Warrington, and as to succession duty on the payment of the sum of 5000*l.*, or upon the death of Eliza Warrington.

6. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue caused application to be made to the defendants to deliver proper accounts in respect of the sum of 5000*l.* and to pay the duties which ought to be paid in respect thereof as aforesaid, but they refused to deliver such accounts and to pay such duties and contended that no such duties were payable.

The informant prayed as follows: That it might be declared that upon the death of Eliza Warrington estate duty under the provisions of the Finance Act 1894 became payable in respect of the sum of 5000*l.*, and that upon the payment of that sum or (alternatively) on the death of Eliza Warrington succession duty under the provisions of the Succession Duty Act 1853 became payable in respect of the sum of 5000*l.* That an account might be directed to ascertain the amount of the duties so payable together with interest at 3 per cent. per annum from the time when the same became payable respectively.

The claim for succession duty was abandoned by the Attorney-General during the course of the argument.

Sect. 1 of the Finance Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30) imposes "estate duty" to be levied and paid upon the principal value of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, "which passes on the death" of every person dying after the commencement of the Act.

Sect. 2 (1) provides:

Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following (that is to say): (c) Property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under sect. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, as amended by sect. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words "voluntary" and "voluntarily," and a reference to a "volunteer" were omitted therefrom.

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 12) provides:

Sect. 38 (1). Stamp duties at the like rates as are by this Act charged on affidavits and inventories shall be charged and paid on accounts delivered of the personal or movable property to be included therein, according to the value thereof. (2) The personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following descriptions—namely: (a) Any property taken as a donatio mortis causæ made by any person dying on or after the first day of June 1881, or taken under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust or otherwise, which shall not have been bona fide made three months before the death of the deceased.

This section was amended by sect. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 7), as follows:

Sect. 11 (1). Sub-sect. 2 of sect. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 is hereby amended as follows: The description of property marked (a) shall be read as if the word "twelve" were substituted for the word "three" therein, and the said description of property shall include property taken under any gift, whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained, to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise.

The Attorney-General (Sir Robert B. Finlay, K.C.) and Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

—The Crown do not now claim succession duty, but it is submitted that estate duty is payable. The question arises under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (c), of the Finance Act 1894, and sect. 38, sub-sect. 2 (a), of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, as amended by sect. 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889. The effect of these sections is to impose estate duty upon any property, real or personal, taken under a "disposition made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, whether by way of transfer, delivery, declaration of trust, or otherwise," "which shall not have been bona fide made twelve months before the death of the deceased." The point is an extremely short one, but it does not seem to be covered by any authority, although the principle has been laid down over and over again that, to determine whether there is a gift or not, you have to look at the particular circumstances of each case. It is contended that the payment of the 5000*l.* by the deceased, under and in pursuance of the indenture of the 3rd Nov. 1900, was a gift. The covenant in the indenture of the 1st June 1892 was a covenant to make a gift of the 5000*l.* to the trustees, and, if the deceased had died without having altered the arrangement, and without having paid over the 5000*l.* in her lifetime, and if things had taken their natural course, then estate duty would have been payable on that sum of 5000*l.* The estate duty is none the less payable because the deceased had given the money in her lifetime. Here we have a gift, followed by performance in paying over the money; it was a gift made inter vivos by the deceased, and it was made within twelve months of the death of the deceased, and therefore we have all the conditions necessary to bring the case within the words of the section: "purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos," and made within twelve months of the death of the deceased; and it is none the less a gift because it was made in consideration of the release of the prior covenant. [The case of Crossman v. The Queen, 55 L. T. Rep. 848, 18 Q. B. Div. 256, was referred to.]

Asquith, K. C. and C. H. Sargent for the defendants.—The whole point is as to what is the meaning of the words in sect. 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, a disposition taking effect "as an immediate gift inter vivos"; and the question is, did this instrument of the 3rd Nov. 1900, coupled with an immediate payment of the money, constitute a gift within the meaning of the section. There is no authority upon the point, but it is submitted that the payment of the 5000*l.* in pursuance of the deed of Nov. 1900, was not a gift. If there was any gift at all in the case, the true gift was when the deceased brought herself under the obligation of 1892 to have this money paid out of her estate. Assuming that there was a gift made in 1892, then it was made more than twelve months before the death of the deceased. By the payment of the 5000*l.* in her lifetime she, under the deed of 1900, got a release from all obligations under the deed of 1892, so that by that payment she purchased a release of her obligation under the former deed. That prevents it from being a gift.

The Attorney-General in reply.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree that the substance of this matter is that it is a gift. There are words

K.B. Div.]

GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS COMPANY v. RODOCANACHI.

[K.B. Div.]

which it is a little difficult to follow in the section of the Act of Parliament upon which the question turns, as altered by the insertion of the provisions of the two prior Acts, especially the words "purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos," but I think that both the "purporting to operate" and "immediate" are to come in, because those words follow upon a provision as to donatio mortis causa: "Any property taken as a donatio mortis causa made by any person dying after" such a date, or taking it, as it was originally, "under a voluntary disposition, made by any person so dying, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos." I think that is an extension of the provision as to donatio mortis causa, which does not operate immediately, but as from the death, to other gifts, which has caused those words to come in in the way in which they do. The substance of the matter is that if gifts are made they count, for the purpose of this duty, as part of the estate of the deceased, unless they were made more than twelve months before the death, with some exceptions, which I need not deal with because they do not affect this particular case. Here there was a promise put in a binding form, because it was under seal, some eight or more years before the deceased died, to make a gift to a charity. Then some eight years after that the gift in point of fact was made and at the same time a deed was executed to show that the gift was not to be made over again by the executors after the lady had died, she having, in point of fact, made it in her lifetime. There would, I suppose, have been a good deal of doubt as to whether if that had not been expressed it would have had that effect. In my opinion it was still a gift when it was made in the year 1900, and it did not become anything else but a gift because there had been a binding promise beforehand to make that gift, and I do not think that the real substance of the transaction was the buying back for good consideration of the liability to have that gift made after the lady died. It is quite true that if she had lived twelve months from the time when she handed over the 5000*l.* there would have been a saving to the extent of the duty upon this sum, which in that event would have been saved, as it would have had to be paid by the estate if the gift had not been made in her lifetime. But that cannot possibly, as it seems to me, affect the question. In a very great many cases where gifts are made by people in their lifetime, they are made for the very express purpose of evading the payment of duty, and that certainly does not entitle them to any consideration or advantage. That is, of course, one of the reasons why this legislation was passed affecting sums given away during lifetime. I think on the whole it is quite clear that the transaction here was in substance a gift, and that it was made less than twelve months before the death of the deceased, and therefore the Crown are entitled to what they claim in this case.

Judgment for the Crown in respect of the estate duty, the claim for succession duty having been abandoned.

GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS COMPANY
(apps.) v. RODOCANACHI (resp.). (a)

Water company—Supply of water—Communication pipe belonging to occupier—Defect in—Leakage and waste of water—Non-repair by occupier—Right to cut off water—Right of occupier to demand supply—Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 43—Metropolis Water Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113), ss. 28, 29, 32.

An owner or occupier of premises in the metropolis, whose attention is called by the waterworks company, who are bound to supply him with water, to a defect under the street in the communication pipe belonging to him and connecting his premises with the company's main, and who has the opportunity of repairing the defect without opening the roadway, but does not choose to repair it, is not a person entitled to demand a supply of water under sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847.

A leak having been discovered under the roadway opposite certain premises in the metropolis, the waterworks company opened the street and found that the communication pipe connecting the premises with the company's main was defective and leaking, thereby causing a waste of water. The communication pipe was the property of the occupier, and the company at once gave him notice of the defect, stating that if it were not remedied forthwith the company would disconnect the pipe from their main, and would not allow it to be reconnected until the pipe was repaired. The occupier took no steps to repair his pipe, and it was disconnected from the main and the water cut off. The occupier could at the time have repaired the pipe without opening the street, as the street was then open.

Held, that the duty of repairing the defect in the pipe was by sect. 28 of the Metropolis Water Act 1871 cast upon the owner or occupier, and that the owner or occupier who, after notice that the communication pipe belonging to him was out of repair, permitted the pipe to remain in its defective state in which it would cause waste of water, has wrongfully failed to do something for the prevention of the waste within the meaning of sect. 32, and that under the circumstances the company were entitled to cut off the water, and to cease to give a supply to the occupier so long as the pipe remained unrepaired.

CASE stated on an information and complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellants under sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, for that the appellants on the 6th June 1903, at No. 113, Eastbourne-mews, did refuse to furnish to the respondent a supply of water to No. 113, Eastbourne-mews aforesaid.

The information was heard and determined by the magistrate, and upon such hearing he convicted the appellants, and imposed a penalty of 6*l.* being 40*s.* a day for three days, and he awarded to the respondent 12*l.* 12*s.* costs—subject to this case.

The appellants were a company incorporated by 51 Geo. 3, c. clxix. authorised to supply water throughout a district mentioned in the Act, which has been from time to time extended within the limits of which district Eastbourne-mews is situated. The powers of the company are contained in the Act and within other Acts passed in the years 1819, 1826, 1835, 1844, 1852, 1855, 1856, 1861, 1868, 1873, and 1878, and the Acts incorporated with those Acts, and in the public Acts relating to the supply of water in the metropolis and the regulations made thereunder (all of which Acts and regulations were to be taken to be part of the case).

The respondent was the lessee of No. 113, Eastbourne-mews under a lease by the terms of which the lessor was liable for all external repairs.

No 113, Eastbourne-mews was a stable with a dwelling-house above, and the dwelling-house was inhabited by two grooms in the service of the complainant. Eastbourne-mews was a public street repairable by the local authority.

No. 113, Eastbourne-mews was within the district of the appellants. The supply to the premises in question was a supply for domestic purposes, and was a constant supply under the provisions of the Metropolis Water Acts 1852 and 1871. The notices under sect. 27 of the Act of 1871 were duly served, and the prescribed fittings were duly provided.

The water rate for the period from the 6th to the 10th June 1903 was to be taken to have been paid.

Prior to the 6th June 1903 there were indications in the roadway opposite No. 113, Eastbourne-mews of the existence of a small leak. Upon that day it became evident from the subsidence of the cobble stones in the roadway (which was thereby rendered dangerous to vehicles) that the leak was serious, and on an investigation being made by a ganger in the employment of the appellants it was discovered that there was a leak in the communication pipe (which was the property of the respondent) supplying No. 113, Eastbourne-mews, close to the junction of the pipe with the appellants' main under the roadway. The leak was at the rate of about 1500 gallons in twenty-four hours.

The ganger who opened the ground thereupon on the 6th June 1903 served upon the coachman of the respondent who was on the premises a notice requiring the repair of the communication pipe to be forthwith undertaken by the respondent and intimating that otherwise the water would be cut off.

The notice was signed by the appellants' district superintendent, and was as follows:—

Notice of Leakage.—To the occupier of No. 113, Eastbourne-mews.—Sir,—Upon opening the ground opposite No. 113, Eastbourne-mews a leakage of water was found to exist from the defective state of your communication pipe, and unless you forthwith repair the same it will be the duty of the company to disconnect such pipe from their main. Immediately after the repair, rendered easy by the ground being now open, the company will re-connect the pipe with their works, and will undertake to fill in and make good the ground upon payment of the expenses incurred thereby amounting to 15s.

The coachman took the notice immediately to the respondent's house, but found he had left for the City, and would not return for some hours. The coachman then returned and explained this fact to the ganger, and in answer to a suggestion by the ganger that he should request the plumber usually employed by the respondent to do the necessary work of repair stated that he had no authority to order any repairs to be executed to the pipe. Beyond communicating with his landlady the respondent at no time took any step to have the communication pipe repaired or the waste stopped. The water was thereupon cut off by the company, and it remained cut off until the 10th June, when the repairs were executed by order of the respondent's landlady, and the water was thereupon restored.

The soil removed was too wet to be replaced, but the ground was refilled with dry earth by the company by 11.30 on the morning of the 6th June, and it remained filled in until the 10th June, when at the request of the respondent's landlady the roadway was again broken up by the appellants, and the repairs were executed by her order. The time occupied in executing such repairs was stated to be about two hours. It would be necessary to disconnect the supply during the repairs.

On the afternoon of the 6th June the respondent wrote complaining of the cutting off of the water as follows:

The Secretary Grand Junction Water Company.—Dear Sir,—113, Eastbourne-mews.—I am informed that your men have cut the water off at these stables without notice. As this is illegal if the water is not on at 10 a.m. on Monday morning my solicitor will take proceedings. I am also writing to the borough authorities. These stables I may add belong to 113, Westbourne-terrace, and the owner of that house keeps them in repair.

This letter was duly received by the appellants on the 8th June, and their secretary replied on the same day as follows:

In reply to your letter of the 6th inst. I have to inform you that the company's men opened up a leakage in the above mews opposite No. 113, and found that the 1½ in. lead pipe supplying those premises was broken. The defective pipe was shown to your coachman, and a notice was also handed to him stating that the company would have no alternative but to disconnect the pipe from their main unless the repair was taken in hand forthwith. This was not done, and accordingly the pipe was disconnected from the company's main. The company cannot permit the pipe to be reconnected to their main until the necessary repairs have been carried out by your plumber.

It was contended by the appellants (1) that the appellants ought not to be convicted because the respondent was not entitled to a supply of water at the time of the alleged refusal of the appellants to give a supply; (2) that upon the true construction of the Acts of Parliament governing the matter the appellants were entitled to cut off the supply, and were under no obligation to supply water after the communication pipe had been severed until the same had been restored; (3) that the appellants were entitled to disconnect the defective communication pipe from their main and prevent the waste of water, the respondent having wrongfully failed to keep the pipe in proper repair, and to do what ought to have been done to prevent waste; (4) that the appellants did not on the 6th June 1903, or on any other day refuse to furnish a supply of water within the meaning of the 43rd section of the

[K.B. Div.]

Waterworks Clauses Act 1847; (5) that even if they did refuse they were within the exemptions mentioned or referred to in sects. 42 and 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, in that the supply was not given only during necessary repairs; (6) that even assuming the appellants could be properly convicted the maximum penalty which could be imposed was not 6*l.* but was only 4*l.*, being at the rate of 40*s.* for the two days which elapsed between the receipt of the respondent's letter of the 6th June 1903, demanding a supply and the time when the supply was restored.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent (1) that there was neglect or refusal on the part of the appellants to furnish a supply of water to No. 113, Eastbourne-mews, within the meaning of sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847; (2) That the severing of the pipes was a wrongful act on the part of the appellants, and that the respondent did not, by reason of such severance, cease to be entitled to a supply of water for his premises; (3) that sect. 42 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 had no application to the facts of this case, and that in any event "necessary repairs" only continued for about two hours on the morning of the 10th June; (4) that there was no power in the respondent to dig up the public highway, and no liability on the respondent to repair this pipe; (5) that upon the true construction of the Acts of Parliament the appellants could only justify cutting off the supply of water if the conduct of the respondent, in failing to repair, was either wilful or negligent; (6) that there was no evidence of any wilful wrong, or of any negligence on the part of the respondent; (7) that the penalty of 6*l.* was rightly imposed.

The magistrate was of opinion that the contention of the respondent was correct, and, as above stated, convicted the appellants and imposed a penalty of 6*l.*, being at the rate of 2*l.* for the 8th, 9th, and 10th June 1903 respectively.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) whether upon the facts herein stated the magistrate properly convicted the appellants; (2) whether he was justified in imposing a penalty of 6*l.*

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) provides:

Sect. 42. The undertakers shall at all times keep charged with water, under such pressure as aforesaid, all their pipes to which fire-plugs shall be fixed, unless prevented by frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable cause or accident, or during necessary repairs, and shall allow all persons at all times to take and use such water for extinguishing fire without making compensation for the same.

Sect. 43. If, except when prevented as aforesaid, the undertakers neglect or refuse to fix, maintain, or repair such fire-plugs, or to furnish to the town commissioners a sufficient supply of water for the public purposes aforesaid, upon such terms as shall have been agreed on or settled as aforesaid, or if, except as aforesaid, they neglect to keep their pipes charged under such pressure as aforesaid, or neglect or refuse to furnish to any owner or occupier entitled under this or the special Act to receive a supply of water during any part of the time for which the rates for such supply have been paid or tendered they shall be liable to a penalty of ten pounds, and shall also forfeit to the town commissioners, and to every person having paid or tendered the rate, the sum of forty shillings for every day during which such refusal or neglect shall continue after notice in writing shall have been given to the undertakers of the want of supply.

Macmorran, K.C. (Acland, K.C. with him) for the appellants.—The magistrate was wrong in holding that the appellants were liable. If there was a leak in the communication pipe, then the waterworks company were not bound to supply the water until the respondent had repaired the leak, and the respondent had power to open the road for that purpose. The Metropolis Water Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 113) applies in this case. Sects. 26 to 34 deal with the supply of prescribed fittings. By sect. 3 of the Act the term "fittings" is defined as including communication pipes. By sect. 26 notice relating to a constant supply may be given, and by sect. 27 where the company are required to provide a constant supply they may serve on the owner or occupier a notice requiring such owner or occupier to supply his premises with the prescribed fittings. Then sect. 28 is important; it provides: "Every owner or occupier of premises upon whom notice to that effect has been served, shall, within two months after the date of the service of such notice, provide the prescribed fittings, and shall from time to time keep the same in proper repair." He is not only to provide, but he is to keep in repair the prescribed fittings, which by sect. 3 includes communication pipes. The case finds that the notices under sect. 27 were duly served, so that the duty was thereby cast upon the respondent to keep in repair the communication pipes. By sect. 32 if any person supplied with water by the company wilfully or negligently causes or suffers any fittings to be out of repair, or to be so used that the water is likely to be wasted, he is liable to a penalty, or if he fails to do anything which ought to be done to prevent such waste, then the company may cut off any of the pipes through which water is supplied to him, "and may cease to supply him with water, so long as the cause of injury remains or is not remedied"; so that the company though they might conceivably do the repairs, are not bound to do them, and if the consumer does not do them the company may cut off the supply. The consumer can open the road to repair the fittings; and the company are not liable to penalties under sect. 43 of the Act of 1847 until the consumer himself has restored the communication with their main pipes: (Sheffield Waterworks Company v. Wilkinson, 41 L. T. Rep. 254; 4 C. P. Div. 410). Coming to the Act of 1847, sect. 43 imposes a penalty upon the company if they neglect or refuse to furnish to the owner or occupier a proper supply of water; and sect. 47 gives the owner a right to purchase from the company any communication pipes laid by the company, and thereupon such pipes are to become the property of the owner. Sect. 53 of the Act—which is important—provides that every owner and occupier, "when he has laid such communication pipes as aforesaid, and has paid or tendered the water rate, shall "be entitled to demand and receive" from the company a sufficient supply of water; so that one of the conditions of demanding a water supply is that he should have laid the communication pipes. Where the water has been lawfully cut off, a person is not entitled to have the supply restored until he has restored the communication pipes. Bramwell, L.J. in Sheffield Waterworks Company v. Wilkinson (ubi sup.), says: "I think there was no obligation on the appellants" — the waterworks company — "to supply water to the respondent's house until the communication was restored, and that they were not bound to restore it." The appellants were entitled in this case to cut off the supply to prevent waste of the water; if so the respondent was not entitled to say that the appellants were in the wrong until he himself was able to apply to them to restore the supply, which he could not do until he had restored the communication pipes. With regard to the second point, the magistrate imposed penalties for three days, when he could only have imposed them for two days.

William Finlay for the respondent. — The magistrate was right upon two grounds; first, upon the authorities there was no right to open the road for the purpose of getting at the pipe to repair it; and, secondly, under sect. 32 of the Act of 1871—which is the only section which can apply—there was no power to cut off the water; the section applies only to cases where there has been some wrongful act or default on the part of the person receiving the supply, and there was no such wrongful act or default in this case. First, as to the right of the respondent to open the road and repair the pipe, the respondent had no such right. That was clearly decided in Chapman v. Fylde Waterworks Company (71 L. T. Rep. 539; (1894) 2 Q. B. 599), where Kay, L.J. says: ". . . I have looked through the Act of 1847, and I cannot find anywhere in it an express power given to the owner or occupier of a house to repair a service-pipe, or to break up the surface of the street for the purpose of such repair." There is no power given anywhere to the owner or occupier to break up the street for the purpose of repair. That case arose outside the metropolis, and therefore the Metropolis Water Acts would not apply to it; but there is no power under the Metropolis Water Acts to break up the streets for the purpose of repair of the pipes, and there being no power in the respondent to break up the road, he ought not to be rendered liable to a penalty for not repairing the pipe, when he had no power to open the road for that purpose. The next point is that under sect. 32 of the Act of 1871, which is the only section under which the appellants can justify, even if there was a refusal to repair the pipe that refusal was not wrongful so as to bring that section into operation. Sect. 27 of that Act relates to notices as to the supply of fittings, and sect. 28 requires the owner or occupier to supply the prescribed fittings; then, coming to sect. 29, my proposition is that sect. 29 deals with the case of an innocent omission to repair and the proper proceedings to be taken where the fittings are out of repair without any wilful default or negligence of the occupier. Sect. 32 is a highly penal section, and the intention clearly was that in the case of an innocent failure to repair sect. 29 applies, but in case of a wilful failure to repair sect. 32 applies. The magistrate has found that there was no default and no negligence whatever on the respondent's part, and therefore there was no wrongful failure by him under sect. 32. The respondent was clearly a person entitled to a supply under sect. 43 of the Act of 1847, and as the appellants have not given the supply they must justify. Their justification can only be under sect. 32, which must fail for two reasons—first, that there was no power in the respondent to break up the street, and therefore no power to get at the pipe to repair it; and, secondly, because there was no wilful default or negligence on the respondent's part.

Macmorran, K.C., in reply, was called upon as to what power there was in the respondent to break up the street, except that which could be inferred from the sections. I refer for that purpose to the group of sections in the Act of 1847, sects. 41 to 47, and to the group 48 to 53. Sect. 48 gives power to the occupier under certain conditions to lay pipes between his house and the main; and sect. 52 gives express power to the occupier to open so much of the pavement of any street as lies between his house and the undertakers' pipe. Then, when the owner and occupier has done all that, and when he has laid such communication pipes and has tendered the water rate, under sect. 53 he is entitled to a supply of water. So that there is no doubt that the owner or occupier is entitled to open the public street for the purpose of taking down or making up the communication pipe. In Chapman v. Fylde Waterworks Company (sup.) there was no obligation whatever on the tenant to repair the pipe, and the whole case seems to turn on that. Lord Esber, M.R. in his judgment makes that clear. He points out that sect. 52 gives the householder power to break up the street to lay down a service pipe or to remove it, but that in that case there was no power to break up the street to repair it, as there was no liability to repair. That was not this case, and has no bearing on this case. Here there was a duty on the tenant to repair the pipe. This is the case of an ordinary communication pipe, and if there is an obligation to repair it—as there was in this case—then there would be a clear right on the part of the consumer to do what was necessary to keep the pipe in repair, and necessarily a power to open the street for that purpose, just as he has a power to open the street to lay down a new pipe.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 28.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment of the Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Kennedy, J.J.):—This was an appeal by way of a case stated by a police magistrate on a complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellants for refusing to furnish a supply of water, contrary to sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847. The case was extremely well argued by counsel on behalf of the appellants, and on behalf of the respondent, and raises a point of general importance. It is not necessary to refer to the facts in detail, as to which there was no dispute, and which are clearly set out in the case; it is sufficient to say that on the 6th June 1903, a leak having occurred under the roadway opposite 113, Eastbourne-mews, the road was opened and the leak was found to be in the communication pipe, the property of the consumer. Notice was thereupon given to the respondent's coachman, who was occupying the premises which were supplied with water, to repair the pipe, and the notice stated that it would be the duty of the company to disconnect if the pipe was not repaired. The respondent took no steps to repair it, and the water was then cut off by the company. The pipe was subsequently repaired by the appellants at the request of the respondent's landlady. The magistrates convicted the appellants, the water company, and fined them a penalty of 6*l.* for neglecting, or refusing, to supply water in accordance with sect. 43. The question we have to consider is whether there was any evidence upon which this conviction can be supported. It must, we think, be taken upon these facts, and, in fact, it was so stated in the course of the argument, that the only refusal to supply the water was by the company's cutting it off upon the 6th June, and continuing to keep the water cut off until it was again supplied on the 10th. The questions we have to decide are whether, in the metropolis, if a leak is found in a pipe belonging to a consumer, the company is entitled to cut off the water until the pipe is restored; and, secondly, does a refusal to supply under the circumstances of the present case constitute an offence under sect. 43? It is found as a fact in the case, and for reasons which we state later on it must be the fact, that the pipe was the property of the consumer—that is, the owner of the premises let to the respondent. Under sect. 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, if the undertakers, except when prevented, as provided in an earlier section, neglect or refuse to furnish to any owner or occupier entitled under the Waterworks Clauses Act, or the special Act, to receive a supply of water during any part of the time during which the rates for such supply shall have been settled, or tendered, they shall be liable to a penalty. The exception referred to in the earlier words of that section is to be found in the provisions of sect. 42, and does not, in our opinion, apply. Under sect. 28 powers are given to the undertakers to open the streets and lay down service pipes and other works for the supply of water; under sect. 29 they may not enter private property without consent, except in a case which does not apply here, and by sect. 31, before breaking up the street, they must give certain notices. By sect. 48 the owner or occupier of any dwelling-house who wishes to have water brought into his premises may open the ground between the pipes of the undertakers and his premises and lay communication pipes, and sect. 52 empowers such owner or occupier to open or break up the street for such purpose. There are also provisions in sects. 44-47 as to the laying of communication pipes, by the undertakers which are only material as supporting the view that communication pipes are, under ordinary circumstances, the property of the consumer. The Metropolis Water Act 1871, contains a group of sections—sects. 26 to 32—which were referred to in argument and require consideration. Under these sections the company may prescribe fittings, which by the interpretation clause, sect. 3 of the same Act, include communication pipes, and sect. 28 provides that in the case of a constant supply the owner or occupier of the premises shall provide all supply fittings, and from time to time keep the same in proper repair. Sect. 29 enables the company, if the fittings are out of order, to give notice requiring the owner or occupier within twenty-four hours to cause the same to be repaired so as to prevent any waste of water, and, if any person fails to comply with the terms of such notice, the company may repair the fittings of such person, and may recover the expenses incurred. Sect. 32 provides that if any person wilfully or negligently causes or suffers any fittings to be out of repair, or to be so used that the water supplied to him is likely to be wasted, he shall be liable to a penalty, and the second paragraph of the same section provides that, if any person supplied with water wrongfully fails to do anything which ought to be done for the prevention of waste, the company may cut off any pipes by or through which the water is supplied to such customer, and may cease to supply him with water so long as the cause of injury remains or is not remedied. It will have been observed that neither the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 nor the Metropolis Water Act 1871, nor any other Act to which our attention has been called, contains any express provision giving the consumer the right to open the street for the purpose of repairing the pipe, and this we gather from the statement in the case and from the judgment of the learned police magistrate to be one of the grounds on which he decided against the appellants. It is true that Bramwell, L.J., sitting in the Common Pleas Division, expressed the opinion, in the case of Sheffield Waterworks Company v. Wilkinson (4 C. P. Div., at p. 421), that the right to break up the soil followed from the right which the consumer had to lay down fresh pipes for the purpose of obtaining a supply, and it may be that the obligation imposed upon the owner and occupier by sect. 28 of the Metropolis Water Act 1871 to keep the prescribed fittings, which include communication pipes, in proper repair may give the consumer a right to open the road for the purpose of repair. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal, in the case of Chapman v. Fylde Waterworks Company (ubi sup.), expressly decided that the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 gave the consumer no power to open streets for the purpose of repair. In the view, however, we take, this does not seem to us to be conclusive of the case. The question still remains—Is the consumer who, having the opportunity of doing so without opening the street, does not choose to repair his own communication pipe a person entitled to demand a supply of water under sect. 43? We do not think for the purpose of this question that any distinction can be drawn between owner and occupier. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the duty of repairing the pipe rested with his landlady. The water company have no means of knowing what the contractual relations between the occupier and his landlady are, and, in our opinion, the liability of the company in respect of an offence under sect. 43 cannot depend upon the relations between the owner and occupier of the premises. No question in this case arises as to the opening of the street. The street was opened by the company: notice was given, and the company offered to reconnect the pipe upon payment of the expenses: they at the same time gave notice that if the pipe was not repaired the water would be cut off. In our opinion the duty to repair the defect in the communication pipe is by sect. 28 of the Act of 1871 cast upon the owner or occupier. We think that the owner or occupier who, after notice to him that the communication pipe belonging to him is out of repair, permits the pipe to remain in a condition in which it would cause waste of water has wrongfully failed to do something to prevent the waste within the meaning of the second paragraph of sect. 32 of the Act of 1871, and that under these circumstances the company were entitled to cut off the water and to cease to supply him as long as the injury to the pipe remained unremedied. It might be that the owner or occupier of a house did not wish to continue the supply, or preferred to put in a better, larger, or different communication pipe. The fact that the company could, if they were so minded, have repaired the pipe after twenty-four hours' notice under sect. 29 does not disentitle them from exercising their rights under sect. 32, and we therefore think that the owner or occupier who, under such circumstances as the present, will not repair the pipe which causes the waste is not a person entitled to receive a supply of water under sect. 43. We think the true view to be taken of the facts is that indicated by the court in Young v. Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company (69 L. T. Rep. 144); and, although no doubt in one sense it may be said that the question is one of fact, we think that the magistrate ought as a matter of law, upon the evidence in this case, to draw the conclusion which we have indicated upon the facts as stated. The appeal will therefore be allowed, with costs.

Re BRADBURY; WING v. BRADBURY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

*Will—Construction—Gift to the children of A.
—“Die without leaving children”—Vested interests.*

A testator gave his property in trust for his wife for life and upon her death to his daughter A., but if she should be then dead to any child or children of A., and “failing such issue of” A., to his daughter B., but if she should be then dead to any child or children of B.; but should A. and B. be then both dead “leaving no issue,” then, in case of each or either of them being married leaving a husband or husbands them surviving, to the husbands or to the survivor of such husband.

B. was dead, leaving one child.

A. was still living, and had three children.

Held, that the case fell within the rule that where a vested interest was given to children it was not to be divested by a gift over if the parent died without leaving children.

Treharne v. Layton (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 459, at p. 463) considered and applied.

Re Ball; Slattery v. Ball (59 L. T. Rep. 800; 40 Ch. Div. 11) distinguished.

Decision of Kekewich, J. affirmed.

ELIJAH BRADBURY, who died in 1895, by his will, dated in 1880, gave certain real and personal estate to his wife Catherine and her brother R. E.

Foster upon trust for sale and conversion and to pay the income to his wife during her life; and upon her death the testator directed that his real and personal estate should be paid and transferred to his youngest daughter Isabella Bradbury, but if she should be then dead, then the same should be transferred to any child or children of Isabella Bradbury in equal shares if more than one, and, “failing such issue of” Isabella Bradbury, then the same should be transferred to his elder daughter Mary Ann Bradbury, but if she should be then dead, then the same should be transferred to any child or children of Mary Ann Bradbury. But should Isabella Bradbury and Mary Ann Bradbury be then both dead, “leaving no issue,” then, in case of each or either of them being then married leaving a husband or husbands them surviving, the same should be transferred to their said husbands, share and share alike, or to the survivor of such husbands.

Mary Ann Bradbury was married in 1881 to Charles Henry Wing and was now dead, having had issue one child only.

Isabella Bradbury was married in 1898 to Frank Vigar and had three children, the eldest of whom was born in 1899, and who were all living.

This action was brought by Charles Henry Wing and his infant child against the testator's widow and Isabella Vigar, alleging a breach of trust and claiming an account and administration so far as was necessary of the testator's estate; and the plaintiffs took out a summons for the appointment of a receiver.

The question was whether, according to the true construction of the testator's will, the plaintiffs had such an interest thereunder as would enable them to maintain an action for the preservation of the trust property from the consequence of the alleged breach of trust.

The summons came on before Kekewich, J. in chambers, when the defendants raised the point that, according to the true construction of the testator's will, the children of Isabella Vigar took vested interests at birth; and that as she had had children the plaintiffs had no such contingent interest as they claimed to have, and could not therefore maintain the action.

The summons was adjourned into court for argument on this point, when Kekewich, J. upheld the defendants' contention and refused to make any order on the summons.

The plaintiffs now appealed.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. and H. Langford Lewis for the appellants.—This appeal from the refusal of Kekewich, J. to appoint a receiver involves the construction of the will of the testator. We submit that that will shows a distinct intention that the person or persons to take the testator's property on the death of his widow should be a person or persons who survived her. In the case of the successive gifts to the testator's two daughters, Isabella and Mary Ann, it is an express condition that to enable them to take they shall be living at the death of the widow; and it should, we contend, be so implied in the case of their children, the words “failing such issue” being read as meaning “failing such issue then living.” There is a distinction between “failure” and “want” of issue under sect. 29 of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26); failure means not only to be lacking, but to become lacking. The words

[CT. OF APP.]

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH.

[CT. OF APP.]

"leaving no issue" in the final gift over to the daughters' respective husbands must be taken in their natural meaning, and should not be construed "having had no issue." In all the cases where this construction has been adopted it has been with the object of preventing a clearly vested interest from being divested. Kekewich, J. decided in this case upon the authority of a line of cases beginning with Maitland v. Chailie (6 Madd. 244), and of which the last reported is Re Cobbold; Cobbold v. Lawton, 88 L. T. Rep. 745; (1903) 2 Ch. 299.

[VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to the proposition laid down by Amphlett, B. in Treharne v. Layton (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 459, at p. 463).] We say that the present case is covered exactly by the principle laid down by North, J. and the Court of Appeal in Re Ball; Slattery v. Ball, 59 L. T. Rep. 800; 36 Ch. Div. 508; 40 Ch. Div. 11.

The principle there established is that the court will construe words such as these according to their natural meaning where it is clear that the testator intended the interest of the children to be divested in some event. Here the interest of Isabella's children is not vested, but is contingent on Isabella dying before the widow. Should Isabella survive the widow she will take absolutely, and her children will be excluded. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In Re Ball; Slattery v. Ball (ubi sup.) there was no express gift to the children at all.] That is so, but that was not the ground of the decision there. It is amply wide enough to cover the present case, which at any rate differs essentially from all the reported cases where "leaving" has been construed as "having had."

Edward Clayton, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion this case falls within the well established rule that where a vested interest is given to children it is not to be divested by a gift over if the parent dies without leaving children. Against that it is said that we ought to hold that there is no vested interest originally given to the children by reason of the latter part of the will, which contains these words: "But should the said Isabella Bradbury and Mary Ann Rachel Foster Bradbury be then both dead, leaving no issue, then in case of each or either of them being then married, leaving a husband or husbands then surviving, the same shall be transferred to their said husbands, share and share alike, or to the survivor of such husbands. That, however, is not my view. In my judgment, we ought not to read the gift in the way suggested on behalf of the appellants. The case is really governed by the proposition laid down in Treharne v. Layton (L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 459) to which I referred in the course of the argument. In that case Amphlett, B. said (at p. 463): "I have always considered that the canon of construction which has been applied to this will has been established upon authority it was impossible to gainsay. The counsel for the defendants has been unable to adduce a single case at variance with the uniform current of decisions which establish the principle that where a gift is a vested gift it will not become divested by the use of the words 'in case the parent dies without leaving issue.'" With regard to the case which has been relied upon of Re Ball; Slattery v. Ball (59 L. T. Rep. 400; 40 Ch. Div. 11) it is only necessary to say that that case obviously belongs to quite a different class of case from that with which we have now to deal.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. When you once find out that there is a gift to the children of Isabella which was a vested interest at birth, there is an end of the appeal.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Tenant for life and remainderman—Authorised investment—Proceeds of realisation of insufficient mortgage security—Arrears of interest—Apportionment of fund available.

The true principle of apportionment, as between tenant for life and remainderman, of a fund representing the proceeds of the realisation of an authorised, but insufficient, mortgage security, upon which there are arrears of interest due, in order that there may be a rateable equality in the incidence of the deficiency, is to take the amount due to the tenant for life in respect of arrears of interest, and the amount due to the remainderman in respect of capital, and to apportion the fund, as at the date when the same is recovered, in proportion to those amounts respectively.

Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (52 L. T. Rep. 510) and Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (1901) 2 Ch. 584) considered and approved.

Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (63 L. T. Rep. 443; 45 Ch. Div. 629) overruled.

Decision of Kekewich, J. affirmed.

JOHN ATKINSON, by his will, dated the 30th Aug. 1858, so far as is material for the present report, gave and bequeathed his residuary estate to his trustees upon trust for conversion and investment of the proceeds as therein mentioned, and upon further trust, subject to certain interests which have since determined or become satisfied, to pay the income to his eleven nephews and nieces for life and the survivors and survivor of them, with remainder to the master, governors, and commonalty of the Mystery of Barbers, London (hereinafter termed the Barbers' Company) upon charitable trusts.

The testator died on the 8th Nov. 1861.

The present trustees of the will were Henley Grose Grose-Smith, Charles Howard Atkinson, and Frank Chorlton Lingard.

In 1892, when these proceedings were instituted, the surviving life tenants were John George Atkinson, Richard James Atkinson, Mary Thornton Smith, and Charles Howard Atkinson.

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GEORGE-SMITH.

[CT. OF APP.]

John George Atkinson died on the 12th Oct. 1894, and Alice Margaret Hyde was his personal representative.

Part of the testator's residuary estate was invested on mortgage of three farms in Essex (hereinafter termed the Essex mortgage), known as Belshams and Clements Hall Farms at Hawkwell, and Butlers Farm at Shopland.

Another part of the testator's residuary estate was invested on a mortgage called "Sutton's mortgage," not material to be more specifically referred to.

The Essex mortgage was dated the 13th Jan. 1864, and was for 29,000*l.* and interest at 5 per cent., reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment.

The interest on the Essex mortgage falling into arrear, the trustees entered into possession in May 1889, at which time the principal sum of 23,340*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* was due on the security.

The rents received by the mortgagees from the mortgaged properties proved insufficient to keep down the interest on the Essex mortgage, and in March 1892 this action was commenced, by originating summons, by the Barbers' Company as plaintiffs against the then trustees of the testator's will and the then tenants for life, for the purpose of determining whether the mortgaged properties ought not to be realised.

At the date when this action was commenced Clements Hall and Belshams farms were occupied by the representatives of William Perry under a lease which would expire at Michaelmas 1892 at the yearly rent of 375*l.*, and Butlers Farm was occupied by Seaman Jeffries and Arthur William Jeffries on a tenancy which commenced at Michaelmas 1889 and was determinable by either party on two years' notice at the yearly rent of 450*l.*

By an order made on the originating summons on the 2nd June 1892 the court declared that the trusts of the will of the testator John Atkinson ought to be performed and carried into execution, and did order and adjudge the same accordingly. And it was ordered that an inquiry should be made whether any and what proceedings should be taken to realise the mortgage securities in the summons mentioned (being the Essex and Sutton's mortgages) or either of them.

At Michaelmas 1892 the Clements Hall and Belshams Farms became vacant. Belshams Farm was immediately relet.

By an order in this action made on the 23rd Jan. 1893 it was ordered that the income in the hands of the trustees should be from time to time paid to the defendants, the tenants for life. And it was ordered that the trustees should be at liberty to raise and pay out of the Consols forming part of the capital of the testator's residuary estate the moneys payable to the executors of William Perry as outgoing tenants for tenant right in respect of Clements Hall and Belshams Farms, after deducting what was due from them for rent and also to raise and pay any moneys necessary to be expended for cultivation of Clements Hall Farm until it was relet, but without prejudice to any question as to the manner in which such moneys ought ultimately to be borne as between capital and income, or as to the right, if any, of the tenants for life under the testator's will to such rent (the trustees replacing any moneys so expended by them as last aforesaid out of the first moneys received in respect of rents and profits of Clements Hall Farm).

In accordance with this order the trustees raised and paid 522*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* to the executors of William Perry for tenant's right, but they did not deduct from this sum the rent received by the trustees from such executors on quitting, amounting to 84*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.*

The trustees claimed to treat this money as capital, but the matter being brought before the judge by the master, the judge authorised the trustees to treat such sum of 84*l.* 6*s.* 4*d.* as income, and the same was distributed by the trustees among the tenants for life accordingly. The trustees placed Clements Hall Farm under the care of Charles Howard Atkinson, one of the trustees and also one of the tenants for life, who kept it in cultivation from Michaelmas 1892 to Lady Day 1897, the money required for the purpose being raised out of the Consols forming part of the testator's residuary personal estate.

On the 4th Feb. 1898 an order was made giving leave to sell to Robert Watkinson Clements Hall Farm for 4250*l.* and the Manor of Clements for a sum to be ascertained by valuation (which valuation amounted to 462*l.*) and for Charles Howard Atkinson's farming accounts to be passed.

Since May 1899, when the trustees took possession of the farms subject to the Essex mortgage, the rents had never been sufficient to pay the mortgage interest, and there were considerable arrears due to life tenants, but the amount of such arrears depended to a great extent whether mortgage interest should be charged at the rate of 4 or 5 per cent.

A summons was accordingly taken out by Richard James Atkinson and Mary Thornton Smith, two of the three surviving tenants for life, asking for a declaration that the net proceeds of sale of Clements Hall Farm, and also the proceeds of sale of the other hereditaments remaining subject to the mortgage of the 13th Jan. 1864, when the same should be sold, ought to be apportioned between the tenants for life for the time being of the residuary estate of the testator, under the trusts of his will and the trustees of the will as representing the capital of such residuary estate, in proportion to the amounts due in respect of arrears of interest under the mortgage, and the amount of capital remaining due on the mortgage, including sums advanced out of capital of the testator's residuary estate towards the expenses of cultivating the property pursuant to the order of the 23rd Jan. 1893; or, in the alternative, that the rights and interests of the beneficiaries under the testator's will in such net proceeds of sale might be ascertained and declared.

The summons also asked for a declaration that the rent, amounting to 87*l.* 10*s.*, of Clements Hall Farm and of Belshams Farm, and the rent, amounting to 197*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, subsequently received in respect of the same farms after the same were relet, ought to be treated as income and paid to the tenants for life; or otherwise that the rights and interests of the beneficiaries in relation to such rent might be ascertained and declared.

The summons further asked that directions might be given for the realisation of the other properties now remaining subject to the mortgage of the 13th Jan. 1864.

[CT. OF APP.]

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH.

[CT. OF APP.]

The summons was adjourned into court and came on to be heard before Kekewich, J. on the 9th Nov. 1903, when the following judgment was delivered:—

KEKEWICH, J.—The mortgage of the 13th Jan. 1864 comprised several distinct properties. One of them was called the Clements Hall Farm. The Clements Hall Farm was realised some years ago, and the purchase money was available for distribution among the parties entitled, subject, of course, if it be necessary, to a provision for costs. The other properties remain unsold. There is no reason why, subject to such a provision as I have mentioned, the proceeds of sale of the Clements Hall Farm should not now be distributed among those entitled to the proceeds and in the proportions in which they are entitled to them. The question is, In what proportions are they entitled to those proceeds? There is a tenant for life—there are more than one, I know, but, for the purpose of the proposition, I will say there is a tenant for life—and there is a remainderman; and the real question is in what proportions the tenant for life and the remainderman are to be entitled to this money. I went into this question in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (1901) 2 Ch. 584. I expressed my opinion in that case, and I do not intend now to go into my own judgment there. But I shall certainly adhere to it, and not the less because the whole question has since been considered in Ireland in a case of Stewart v. Kingsale (1902) 1 Ir. 496, and the Master of the Rolls, although he quoted my judgment, not professing to follow it, has arrived at the same conclusion as I did. Before going further, as I am now on the cases I may mention that I do not see that as regards the matter in hand Swinfen Eady, J.'s decision in Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (88 L. T. Rep. 765; (1903) 1 Ch. 942) in the slightest degree conflicts with my view. He had there to determine from what date the account should be taken, and he put the question in this way: Should the account be taken from the testator's death or from another date he mentions when the mortgage became payable, and it appeared that the security was insufficient; or from another date he mentions when the income first fell into arrear? Of course I have here no doubt. The account must be taken from the time when the income first fell into arrear. But that was not what he adopted. He adopted the date when it was first ascertained that the security was insufficient. It is impossible for me to apply that decision supposing it to be otherwise applicable here, because I do not know that the security is insufficient. It never has been known, and is not known now. As I pointed out not long ago in the course of the argument—when Mr. Vaughan Hawkins endeavoured to persuade me to postpone the realisation of the rest of the security because it was hoped that the property would rise in price so much that everybody would be paid in full—non constat that they will not be paid in full. I cannot yet say that the security has been found to be insufficient. Is that any reason why I should not distribute what has been realised? If the sale is postponed, as it may be, for some time, reasons may yet appear for putting it off longer than I at present think it ought to be put off. But is there any reason why, having got a large sum of money in hand, the parties should not have the benefit of that because there are other properties which will by and bye be realised to bring in more money available for distribution? Therefore it seems to me I must start with this, that I have a part of the property realised. I know that that is not enough, certainly, to pay 20s. in the pound; but I have to distribute it as far as it will go among the parties entitled—that is to say, among the tenants for life and the remainderman—and I apply Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (ubi sup.). I find what to-day is due to the tenants for life for interest; I find what to-day is due to the remainderman for capital; and, having got those sums, whatever they are, I distribute what is distributable among the two parties in the proportions which those sums bear to one another. That is the application of Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (ubi sup.). That is all that I can do by my present order. But other points of detail have been argued, and one or two of them must be dealt with. In the first place, in order to ascertain what is due to the tenants for life, am I to calculate interest as running at 5 per cent. or at some other rate? It has been decided by Kay, J. as long ago as 1889, in the case of Bright v. Campbell (60 L. T. Rep. 731; 41 Ch. Div. 388), and I believe the decision has never been questioned in the slightest degree, that the receipt by a mortgagee in possession of rents and profits is not receipt of interest so as to make it a payment of interest under the ordinary provision of a mortgage deed reducing the rate from, say, 5 per cent. to 4 per cent. on punctual payment. That seems to apply here. The mortgagees are entitled to calculate the sum due to them at 5 per cent. interest. The tenants for life to whom the interest is payable are therefore entitled to 5 per cent. interest on the capital sum due from the mortgagor. Then what is the capital sum due from the mortgagor? The mortgagees entered into possession and they have necessarily increased—that is to say, they have as a matter of fact, as does sometimes happen, increased—the amount due from the mortgagor to the mortgagees. The mortgagor is not here and I cannot bind him, and I do not attempt to bind him by anything that may be said. But it seems as if the mortgagees had, while in possession, from time to time expended moneys, taking them possibly out of the rents and profits and possibly out of other trust moneys. They have taken moneys to make those payments, which the mortgagor must allow them, and, allowing them, must pay interest on them at 5 per cent. The tenants for life are, it seems to me, entitled to say: "What is due to us is 5 per cent. interest on the sum originally advanced and on whatever has been added to the capital sum by taking the money which would have been available for the payment of our interest and expending it on permanent improvements." Then there is possibly another class of expenditure. It looks to me from the account as if there would be another class of expenditure—that is, where mortgagees in possession have expended money on cultivation—the result being that money has been taken which might have been available for distribution among the parties for the use of the farms, but, at the same time, cannot be charged against the mortgagor. If it comes under the head of permanent improvements it can be charged against him. If it is merely cultivation it cannot. I cannot do more than indicate the line. Not being chargeable against the mortgagor, or such part as is not chargeable against the mortgagor, it cannot bear interest at 5 per cent. or any other rate per cent. for the benefit of the tenants for life. That will be dealt with, and must be dealt with, on a different footing. The tenants for life are entitled to 5 per cent. on what is due, whether it was the sum originally advanced or that which has, according to the ordinary rules between mortgagor and mortgagee, been added to it. The remainderman is entitled to that which bears interest. What there is available for distribution must be distributed among them according to those proportions. Really the order may with great advantage follow that made in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (ubi sup.), which simply directs an apportionment between the tenant for life and the remainderman according to what is due to them respectively, using those words as implying that an account must be taken of what is due.

[CT. OF APP.]

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH.

[CT. OF APP.]

The order as drawn up was in the following terms:

"This court doth order that the hereditaments remaining subject to the mortgage dated the 13th Jan. 1864 in the summons mentioned be sold with the approbation of the judge, and that the money to arise from such sale be paid into court to the credit of" the action. And, after ordering that accounts be taken of what is due to the trustees under the mortgage and of all sums of money properly laid out by them in necessary repairs and lasting improvements and insurance of the hereditaments comprised in the mortgage, it was ordered that "the net proceeds of the sale of Clements Hall Farm and Manor of Hawkwell be apportioned between the defendants Charles Howard Atkinson, Richard James Atkinson, and Mary Thornton Smith, the tenants for life, and the defendant Alice Margaret Hyde, representing John George Atkinson, a deceased tenant for life, on the one hand and the capital of the trust fund on the other hand in the proportion which the amount of interest in arrear at 5l. per cent. per annum bears to the amount of principal due under the said mortgage, and that the amounts so apportioned and the names of the persons to whom the same are payable be certified. And it is ordered that the said trustees do pay the amounts so apportioned to the said defendants Charles Howard Atkinson, Richard James Atkinson, Mary Thornton Smith, and Alice Margaret Hyde less the said sums of 200l. already paid as aforesaid and do retain the residue of such proceeds as capital moneys of the testator's estate, and the rest of the said application is to stand over until after the sale hereby directed."

From that decision the plaintiffs appealed.

By their notice of appeal the plaintiffs asked that the decision of Kekewich, J. might be reversed; and that in lieu thereof it might be ordered that for the purpose of apportioning the net proceeds of sale between the defendants, the tenants for life, on the one hand and the capital of the trust fund on the other hand, the total amount of interest and income received by the tenants for life for the time being from the mortgage ought to be added to the net proceeds of sale, together with any other capital sum or sums repaid to or received by the trustees for the time being of the testator's will in respect of the mortgage (such aggregate sum being hereinafter referred to as "the net aggregate amount received from the mortgage") and that the net aggregate amount received from the mortgage should be divided between the tenants for life on the one hand and the capital of the trust estate on the other hand in the proportion which the total amount of interest and income which the tenants for life would have received from the mortgage if the same had been punctually paid (after deducting income tax) bore to the total amount of capital invested on the mortgage security. But that in estimating the sum due to the tenants for life they were to give credit for the total amount received by them in respect of interest and income from the capital sum invested on the mortgage security and in estimating the sum due to capital credit shall be given for all capital sums repaid to or received by the trustees for the time being in respect of the mortgage. And that for the purpose of making the apportionment aforesaid all necessary directions should be given and necessary and proper accounts and inquiries be ordered, or that such other order should be made as to the court should seem fit.

The appeal now came on to be heard.

T. H. Carson K.C. and A. J. Spencer for the appellants.—The appeal raises a question upon which there is some conflict of authority—namely, what is the true principle of apportionment as between tenant for life and remainderman of a fund representing the proceeds of the realisation of a mortgaged property which turns out to be an insufficient security? Two principles have been enumerated—one by Kay, J., that the court is to deal with the sum as a whole, and so apportion the deficiency as to make it fall proportionately between capital and income:

Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr, 63 L. T. Rep. 443; 45 Ch. Div. 629.

That principle was applied by Farwell, J. in Re Bird; Re Evans; Dodd v. Evans (84 L. T. Rep. 294; (1901) 1 Ch. 916), and by Swinfen Eady, J. in Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (88 L. T. Rep. 765; (1903) 1 Ch. 942). The other principle is that enunciated by Kekewich, J., in which his Lordship has taken the period of realisation as the date at which an apportionment ought to be made, and directed such apportionment between the tenant for life and the remainderman, according to what is due to them respectively:

Re Alston; Alston v. Houston, (1901) 2 Ch. 584.

In the present case Kekewich, J. has adopted his own decision in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (ubi sup.). That decision was followed with approval by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland:

Stewart v. Kingsale, (1902) 1 Ir. 496, at p. 508.

We submit, however, that the court should adopt and approve the principle laid down by Kay, J. in Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.). The earlier cases on the subject are

Turner v. Newport, 2 Ph. 14;

Cox v. Cox, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 343;

Re Earl of Chesterfield's Trusts, 49 L. Rep. 261; 24 Ch. Div. 643;

Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson, 52 L. T. Rep. 510;

Re Barker, (1897) W. N. 154;

Lyon v. Mitchell, (1899) W. N. 27.

They referred also, on the question as to what sume may be included as just allowances in taking accounts between mortgagor and mortgagee, to Union Bank of London v. Ingram, 43 L. T. Rep. 659; 16 Ch. Div. 53.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. and Lyttelton Chubb for the respondents the tenants for life; Samuel Dickinson for the respondents, two of the trustees; and Vaughan Hawkins for the respondent, the third trustee, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal fails. I think that the judgment of Kekewich, J. in this case, and also his judgment in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (1901) 2 Ch. 584 were quite right. In this case there was an authorised investment, a mortgage, and that investment was a security for capital and interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and for a long time the security was sufficient and the interest was paid. Then subsequently the security began to be deficient; there was not enough to keep up the full payment of the interest; and there was a grave probability that the security might not be sufficient to provide payment of the capital. Under these circumstances a portion of the securities was realised, and that produced over 4000*l.* A question has arisen about apportioning this amount. Strictly speaking, one cannot make a final adjustment in the case. It is impossible at present to ascertain all the factors which are necessary for such an adjustment. One does not know at present what the unsold residue of the estate may be. But it is said that it will be a convenient course, although the time for a final adjustment has not come and the conditions are not present which would enable one to make that final adjustment, that we should declare now what will be the principle of the final adjustment. It is said that that course will be desirable in order that, for the convenience really of all parties, this sum that has been realised may be provisionally apportioned—only provisionally apportioned—and then any adjustment which is ultimately necessary when all the factors have been ascertained can be made on the occasion of the final adjustment. But in the meanwhile we have to make an order which will constitute really a provisional apportionment, and I may say that I do not think, so far as I can judge from Kekewich's, J. judgment that he meant what he did to be anything more than a provisional apportionment. That being the case, we have now to deal with the question of what is the right principle of apportionment. Now, as the Master of the Rolls said in the Irish case of Stewart v. Kingsale (1902) 1 Ir. 496, he had to choose there between Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (63 L. T. Rep. 443; 45 Ch. Div. 629) and Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (52 L. T. Rep. 510), and he said that he preferred the principle laid down in Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.). I say, as he did, that I prefer that principle; and really the Master of the Rolls gives such clear and forcible reasons in his judgment for his preference that I feel that I could not better them in any way by anything that I may add now to them. But in only one respect do I at all criticise what the Master of the Rolls said. I do not think that the question whether Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) or Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.) laid down the right principle of apportionment was quite as open a question, according to the English cases, as the Master of the Rolls assumed. It seems to me that with regard to Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) it is a case which, as Mr. Carson told us, has never been followed, and, as he also practically had to admit, it has never been preceded, by that I mean that there never was before the decision in Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) a case in which the principle which would support that decision was in the slightest degree indicated. One cannot help seeing that when one looks at the judgment of Kay, J. and considers it with the greatest care, having regard to his learning and carefulness as a judge. Curiously enough, in the judgment in Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.), he practically refused to follow the decision in Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.), and he does so without the indication of any reason why he disapproved of Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.), or preferred the calculation which he enunciated in Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.). I say, therefore, that I prefer Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.), and the principle laid down in that case, as I understand it. In the present case we have not got a case of unauthorised investment, and cases were cited to us of unauthorised investment. But I do not mean to trouble myself with those cases, because I think that they have no bearing on the present case whatsoever. We have a case here of authorised investment. There are tenants for life, and the fund is to go ultimately to remaindermen. Now, having that state of things, and the security being a security both for principal and for interest on mortgage at the rate of 5 per cent., What is to be done in a case where, for a considerable time, that interest has been paid, and then the security is realised and proves insufficient? What was it a security for? It was a security equally for the principal and the interest. Now, I will venture to try and enunciate—not a calculation, but a principle, here, which one ought to apply in these cases. That principle is that there being a security for the principal and the interest, and there having been a loss, you ought to take care that there is rateable equality in the incidence of that loss. That is all that you have got to do. Now, I will proceed to make the calculation which follows upon that principle, and I will now follow the very words of Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.). Take the amount due for capital and the amount due to the tenants for life for arrears of interest, and then apportion the fund accordingly. That is the principle which it seems to me we have to apply in the present case. The result of this will be that the appeal fails, and that we must introduce what words may be necessary by way of precaution to prevent it being supposed that this is a final apportionment. It seems to me that, under the circumstances, there is nothing more to be said in this case. I just mention the matter of interest, but really the rate of interest was disposed of in the course of the argument for the reasons which have been given.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that, but for the cases of Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) and Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (88 L. T. Rep. 765; (1903) 1 Ch. 942), I should have thought that the principle to be applied in a case like the present was quite clear. The question may be shortly stated as follows: There is a mortgage debt on authorised security.

CT. OF APP.]

Re ATKINSON; BARBERS' COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH.

[CT. OF APP.]

It is settled by a settlement to certain tenants for life, with remainder to some remaindermen. Interest is paid on the mortgage debt for some time in full. Then the interest falls into arrear, and, after there are some arrears outstanding and due, the security has to be realised, and it turns out that there is not sufficient to pay the arrears of interest and the capital of the mortgage debt. What is to be done under the circumstances? I should have thought, as I have said, that the way to proceed was pretty clear; and that the considerations which would lead to the way in which the fund should be dealt with were pretty obvious. In the first place, as to the interest which was paid to the tenants for life, it is clear that the tenants for life were entitled to receive it, and that the remaindermen could have no possible claim upon the sum so received by the tenants for life—no equity against the tenants for life in respect of those sums in any point of view whatever. That being so, what is the position of the tenants for life and the remaindermen so far as concerns the property that represents the security for the debt? They are simply in the position of persons who have one security for the two debts belonging to them respectively. Notwithstanding the payment of interest to the tenants for life, so far as concerns their arrears of interest they have a right, as against remaindermen, to see that those arrears are charged upon the security. The security is a security not only for principal but for interest, and that is a right the tenants for life had. And I fail to see any equity on the part of the remaindermen which would enable them to challenge the position or right of the tenants for life. That being so, when the security is insufficient to pay the two debts charged upon the security, I should have thought that it would follow as a matter of clear right that the tenants for life would say to the remaindermen: "Apportion our security, which is a security for our debt as well as yours, between us in proportion to the amount of the respective debts, in the same way as you would if you had a joint mortgage given on one security—a security for two separate debts, and the security is insufficient." In such a case you apportion the insufficient proceeds between the two mortgage debts. That is the simple principle, and there is no possible equity that I can see to prevent the ordinary rights applying and being enforced. That, on principle, as I have said, ends the case. About the authorities only let me say a few words after what my Lord has said. So far as concerns Turner v. Newport (2 Ph. 14), Cox v. Cox (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 343), and Re Bird; Re Evans; Dodd v. Evans (84 L. T. Rep. 294; (1901) 1 Ch. 916), they are all authorities dealing with cases of unauthorised investment, and have no application in principle to such a case as we have to deal with here. Where you are dealing with cases of unauthorised investment, from the very nature of the transaction you have to consider the rights of the parties at the time it was made. Almost of necessity you must go back to readjust those rights, as I have said, at that time. Those cases, in my opinion, have no real bearing upon the case which we have now to decide. The exact question that we have here had to be considered, and properly considered, in Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.), and there it received, to my mind, proper and sufficient treatment. The principle which I have referred to was carried out, and rightly carried out, in that case, as indeed it was also in Lyon v. Mitchell (1899) W. N. 27 and in Re Barker (1897) W. N. 194, and in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (1901) 2 Ch. 584; also in Stewart v. Kingsale (1902) 1 Ir. 496. The only authorities that cause the slightest trouble are those of Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) and Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (ubi sup.). As my Lord has pointed out, Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) had no previous authority to justify it. And speaking with great respect of the very learned judge who decided it, I cannot help thinking that the decision in that case was wrong. The learned judge there appears to have arrived at a method of apportionment which, so far as I can see, was not argued and not authorised by any previous authority; and he gave no reason for his adopting the method of apportionment which he did. He states no principle on which he is said to have proceeded, and that case has never been followed. It was not really followed even in Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (ubi sup.), and the other judges have expressly declined to follow it, as, for example, in Lyon v. Mitchell (ubi sup.) and in Re Barker (ubi sup.). With regard to Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (ubi sup.) I need only say this, that I think Swinfen Eady, J. was misled there by the form the argument took before him. The real point of principle on which that case ought to have been decided was, in my opinion, never brought to the attention of the learned judge. He was led to believe by the arguments before him that the whole question which he had to decide was one as to the point of time from which an account should be taken as against the tenant for life in respect of the income received by the tenant for life to be brought in by the tenant for life as a sort of hotchpot in order to procure the apportionment. He was, I repeat, led to consider that that was the only question which he had to decide. As it was, he declined to follow Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) But it is really for the reasons that I have given, no authority upon the question we have here. So far as it really proceeded on a different basis from that which I have indicated as the correct basis, I cannot help again saying that, in my opinion, it was wrongly decided. Those are the only two cases which are really in any way in conflict with the principle which I have indicated. To my mind, as I have already said, it is a perfectly clear and intelligible principle, and one that ought to be applied without any difficulty. I will only add that in this case we are really deciding a hypothetical question. But we are led to do that under the advisability, if not the necessity, of allowing some interim division—some provisional division—to be made in respect of the fund realised between the tenant for life and the remaindermen. I think that that justifies the court in deciding the question, though, as I have said, it is up to the present time hypothetical. I think that the order that was made by Kekewich, J., as to the apportionment of the fund ought to be prefaced by a statement to the effect indicated by my learned brother Cozens-Hardy in the course of the argument, to the effect that the apportionment of that fund is to be without prejudice to a final adjustment when the estate is ultimately realised. It is not until the estate is completely realised that you can finally adjust the rights, and not till then can you take a proper account between the parties. You cannot treat the fund, for example, as representing any specific portion of the original mortgage, and for that reason, amongst others, you cannot possibly at the present time, have a complete and final adjustment and apportionment so far as regards the fund. Therefore, as I have said, the division of the fund can only be treated as provisional, and the final adjustment of the rights must take place when the estate is fully realised. There will be then time to apply for the taking of such accounts as may be necessary to finally adjust the rights of the parties, on the principle which we have decided.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add after the judgments given by my Lord and Romer, L.J. I think that the true way to approach this question is to treat it as though the whole security had been realised and had produced a sum. What would then be the inquiry which the court would have to make? What was due on the security at the time of realisation? The answer would be the capital and the arrears of interest; nothing more would be due. It would be idle to say that the interest which had been paid, wholly or in part, to the tenants for life was then due upon the security of the land or upon the proceeds of the sale of the land. The only charge would be for those two sums—capital and arrears of interest. On what principle are you to apportion? Just in the same way as you would if it were a contributory mortgage, part owing to A. and part owing to B. You would apportion it rateably. Just so here. When the larger realisation comes to pass you will have to ascertain what was due for capital and what was due for arrears of interest. It is a plain, simple, and intelligible rule which was adopted by Pearson, J. in the case of Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.). It follows from what has been said in the case of Re Moore; Moore v. Johnson (ubi sup.), which was followed by Kekewich, J. in Re Alston; Alston v. Houston (ubi sup.), and by the Irish Master of the Rolls in what I may very respectfully refer to as his very able judgment in Stewart v. Kingsale (ubi sup.), and again by Kekewich J. in his judgment in the present case, that that is correct. But, with the greatest respect to Kay, J. and Swinfen Eady, J., I cannot consider that the decisions in Re Foster; Lloyd v. Carr (ubi sup.) or in Re Phillimore; Phillimore v. Herbert (ubi sup.) are correct. I do not refer to those cases as to unauthorised investments. They are on a different footing from a case like the present, where the tenants for life were entitled to the income derived from this investment. The appeal will be dismissed, the only variation being that the order made by Kekewich, J. is without prejudice to any ultimate adjustment of the whole realisation.

Appeal dismissed.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE CHELSEA WATERWORKS COMPANY AND THE METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD. (a)

APPEAL UNDER THE METROPOLIS WATER ACT 1902.

Waterworks — Dividends — "Prescribed rate" — Preference shares issued under special Act — Rate of interest fixed by company — Profits divisible among ordinary shareholders — Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17), ss. 2, 75 — Companies Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), s. 13.

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 enacts by sect. 75 that the profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year shall not exceed "the prescribed rate," or, where no rate is prescribed, the rate of 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital in the undertaking; and by sect. 2 "prescribed" means "prescribed for that purpose in the special Act."

The Companies Clauses Act 1863 provides by sect. 13 that where a company is authorised by any special Act to raise money by the issue of new preference shares or stock, it may issue the shares or stock with a dividend or interest not exceeding the rate prescribed in the special Act, and, if no rate is prescribed, then not exceeding the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

A waterworks company whose Acts incorporated the above-mentioned enactments obtained power to raise additional capital by the issue of new preference stock, no rate of interest being named in their special Act. This stock was in fact issued, some at 5 per cent. and the rest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Held, that 5 per cent. and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. respectively were the "prescribed rate" for this preference stock within the meaning of sect. 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847.

APPEAL by the Chelsea Waterworks Company from an award by the Court of Arbitration appointed under the Metropolis Water Act 1902.

The award was in the form of a special case stated by the Court of Arbitration (Sir Edward Fry, Sir Hugh Owen, and Sir John Wolfe Barry) for the determination by the Court of Appeal of a question of law.

During the hearing of the arbitration it was agreed between the counsel for the Chelsea Waterworks Company and the Metropolitan Water Board that in ascertaining the balance of the certified accounts under sect. 40, sub-sect. 2, of the Metropolis Water Act 1902, the contingency fund of the company should be treated as profits available for immediate distribution as dividends and legally distributable as such, and that the contingency fund, together with the estimated balance of other profits available as aforesaid should be treated by the Court of Arbitration as a deduction from the amount payable as back dividend, and in making their award the Court of Arbitration took into consideration and acted upon this agreement.

During the hearing of the matter it appeared that the total capital of the company in shares and stock created, issued, and paid up consisted of the following items, viz., 782,322*l.* ordinary stock; 150,000*l.* 5 per cent. preference stock; 160,000*l.* 4½ per cent. preference stock; 643*l.* 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock, making in all 1,092,965*l.*

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On this state of facts a question of law arose on which the Court of Arbitration held that, on the true construction of the Chelsea Company's Acts of 1852, 1864, and 1875, and the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, and the Companies Clauses Act 1863, the rates of 5 per cent. and 4½ per cent. on the above-mentioned 5 per cent. preference stock and 4½ per cent. preference stock (other than the above-named 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock) were the prescribed rates on those stocks respectively, and that the company were entitled to divide as maximum dividends the sums of 10 per cent. on the sums of 782,322*l.* ordinary stock and 643*l.* 4½ per cent. convertible preference stock, of 5 per cent. on the sum of 150,000*l.* 5 per cent. preference stock, and of 4½ per cent. on the sum of 160,000*l.* 4½ per cent. preference stock, and no more.

The Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 17) provides as follows:

Sect. 2. The expression "the special Act" used in this Act shall be construed to mean any Act which shall be hereafter passed authorising the construction of waterworks, and with which this Act shall be incorporated; and the word "prescribed" used in this Act in reference to any matter herein stated, shall be construed to refer to such matters as the same shall be prescribed or provided for in the special Act, and the sentence in which such word occurs, shall be construed as if, instead of the word "prescribed," the expression "prescribed for that purpose in the special Act" had been used;

Sect. 75. The profits of the undertaking to be divided among the undertakers in any year (shall not exceed the prescribed rate, or where no rate is prescribed they shall not exceed the rate of ten pounds in the hundred by the year on the paid-up capital in the undertaking, which in such case shall be deemed the prescribed rate, unless a larger dividend be at any time necessary to make up the deficiency of any previous dividend which shall have fallen short of the said yearly rate.

The Companies Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118) provides as follows:

Sect. 13. Where any such company is authorised by any special Act hereafter passed and incorporating this part of this Act to raise any additional sum or sums by the issue of new preference shares, or by the issue of new preference stock or (at the option of the company) by either of those modes—then and in every such case the company, with the like sanction as aforesaid, may for the purpose of raising such additional sum or sums from time to time create and issue (according as the authority given by the special Act extends to shares only or to stock only, or to both), such new shares or new stock, either ordinary or preference, and either of one class and with like privileges, or of several classes and with different privileges, and of the same or different amounts, and respectively with any fixed, fluctuating, contingent, preferential, perpetual, terminable, deferred, or other dividend or interest, not exceeding the rate prescribed in the special Act, and if no rate is prescribed, then not exceeding the rate of five pounds per centum per annum, and subject (as to any such new shares) to the payment of calls.

The Chelsea Waterworks Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. clvi.) by sect. 13 incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847.

The Chelsea Waterworks Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. xxxix.) provided as follows:

Sect. 7. The second and third parts of the Companies Clauses Act 1863 are incorporated in this Act.

Sect. 8. The company from time to time . . . may (by way of addition to their present share capital) raise any sum or sums not exceeding altogether the sum of 285,000*l.* by the issue of new ordinary shares, or by the issue of new ordinary stock, or by the issue of new preference shares, or by the issue of new preference stock, or (at the option of the company) by all or any of those modes . . .

The Chelsea Waterworks Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. cviii.), by sect. 2, incorporated, with other Acts, Part 2 (relating to additional capital) and Part 3 (relating to debenture stock) of the Companies Clauses Act 1863 and also the provisions "with respect to the amount of profit to be received by the undertakers" in the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, and it provided:

Sect. 7. The company from time for the purposes of this Act, may raise, by the creation and issue of new shares or new stock, whether preferential, or ordinary, or both, any further sums not exceeding in the whole 160,000*l.*

Neither these two Acts of 1864 and 1875 prescribed any rate of dividend.

Under the Act of 1864 the company issued the 150,000*l.* 5 per cent. preference stock, and under the Act of 1875 the 160,000*l.* 4½ preference stock.

Sir Edward Fry in delivering the judgment of the Court of Arbitration, said that he had no doubt that the whole sum of 1,092,965*l.* was "the paid-up capital in the undertaking" within the meaning of sect. 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, and in no case could the profits to be divided ever go beyond 10 per cent. on that 1,092,965*l.*, the total ordinary and preference capital of the company. The provision in sect. 13 of the Companies Clauses Act 1863 for a rate "if no rate is prescribed, then not exceeding the rate of five pounds per centum per annum," was the prescription of a rate, and, therefore, as regards the 150,000*l.* 5 per cent preference stock, no more than 5 per cent. could be deemed to be the prescribed amount. As to the 4½ preference stock, the company had the right of prescribing something less than the 5 per cent. mentioned in sect. 13, and therefore 4½ must be taken as the prescribed amount. Therefore, the highest amounts that could be divided among the shareholders was not more than 10 per cent. in respect of the ordinary stock, 5 per cent in respect of the 5 per cent. preference stock, and 4½ per cent. in respect of the 4½ per cent. preference stock.

From this decision the company appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C. and Haldane, K.C. (Edward Boyle, K.C. and Boydell Houghton with him) for the company.—The decision of the arbitrators was wrong. There is nothing to prevent the company from distributing and paying back dividends up to an amount ascertained by the measure of 10 per cent. on its entire capital. By sect. 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847 a dividend of 10 per cent. "on the paid-up capital in the undertaking" is allowed unless a smaller rate is prescribed in the special Act. It is not denied by the respondents that the company is entitled to pay back dividends up to 10 per cent on the ordinary shares. The company contends that in calculating the 10 per cent., the 5 per cent. and the 4½ per cent. preference stock should be included as part of the capital in the undertaking. The limitation to 10 per cent. which was imposed by sect. 75 was imposed for the benefit of the public. It is immaterial to the public whether the capital of the company consists wholly of ordinary shares or partly of ordinary and partly of preference. By a domestic arrangement the shareholders of the company have decided that some shares shall be preference and shall receive 5 per cent. interest and that the other shares shall be ordinary. That is to say that the preference shareholders contract with the ordinary shareholders that in return for certain privileges they are not to be entitled to more than 5 per cent. They have sacrificed for the benefit of the ordinary shareholders a part of the maximum of 10 per cent. which is the statutory limit. The ordinary shareholders would now get more than 10 per cent., but that is a matter between them and the preference shareholders which does not concern the public. Against that view the arbitrators have decided that the 5 per cent. and the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. rates at which the preference stock was raised are "prescribed rates" within sect. 75. But "prescribed" there means "prescribed by the special Act." The company's special Acts of 1864 and 1875 did not prescribe any rate. The Acts gave power to the company to raise the money, at its option, either as ordinary or preference stock, and the company in deciding to raise the money as 5 per cent. or as $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. preference stock did not thereby make a "prescribed rate" within sect. 75. The arbitrators have held that the incorporation in the company's special Acts of sect. 13 of the Companies Clauses Act 1863 makes 5 per cent. the "prescribed rate" as regards the preference stock. But even so, as regards the preference stock raised under the Act of 1875, the company ought to have the benefit of the difference between the prescribed rate of 5 per cent., and the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. at which the money was in fact raised.

Moulton, K.C., J. D. Fitzgerald, K.C., and A. B. Shaw, for the Metropolitan Water Board, were not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Sir Edward Fry and his brother Commissioners, in an arbitration under the Metropolitan Water Act 1902. The point really is whether, on the true construction of sect. 75 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, the Chelsea Waterworks Company is entitled to distribute in the shape of back dividends among the ordinary shareholders a sum which will result in their receiving an amount considerably larger than 10 per cent. Sect. 75 provides as follows: [His Lordship read it, and also the definitions of the expressions "special Act" and "prescribed" in sect. 2.] Now part of the capital of this company consists of preference shares, some of 5 per cent., and a smaller proportion at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Mr. Haldane, on behalf of the company, contends that the only "prescribed rate" that he has got to deal with is the rate of 10 per cent. which is prescribed by sect. 75 in a case where no rate is prescribed by the special Act. His argument is that, notwithstanding the fact that a portion of the shareholders are limited, as between themselves and the other shareholders, to the right to receive only 5, or it may be, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., yet the sum available for distribution under sect. 75 is the full amount of 10 per cent. on the whole of the capital of the company, so that if the full amount of 10 per cent. on the whole of the capital has not been paid, those shareholders who have received 10 per cent. are entitled, over and above that 10 per cent., to share in the unpaid surplus of the aggregate amount of 10 per cent. on the whole capital. He says that there is nothing in the Act of Parliament to prevent that amount being distributed among those of the shareholders who are not deterred by any arrangement between themselves and the preference shareholders from taking more than 10 per cent. It seems to me that Sir Edward Fry is correct in arriving at the conclusion that there is a prescribed rate for all the capital of the company. As regards the ordinary shareholders sect. 75 of the general Act has prescribed a rate of 10 per cent., no rate being prescribed in the special Act. As regards the preference shareholders, I agree with the conclusion of the learned Commissioner, that for them the prescribed rate is 5 per cent., or $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as the case may be. The process by which he arrived at that conclusion is this: The company's special Act empowers the raising of preference and ordinary shares, and also incorporates the Companies Clauses Act 1863, and when we come to look at the provisions of the Act as to the raising of capital, we find that there is a provision which limits the dividend in the case of preference shares to 5 per cent., and therefore, by the terms of the incorporated Act, 5 per cent. becomes the prescribed rate in respect of that part of the capital. With regard to that part of the capital which was raised at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., that rate is undoubtedly below the 5 per cent. which is prescribed, but on that point the argument which was adopted by Sir Edward Fry appears to me to be quite conclusive. The legislature has put it into the power of the company to issue preference stock, and it has also conferred upon the company a statutory power to determine the rate at which that preference stock is to be raised. It was by the exercise of that statutory power that the company fixed $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as the rate at which that preference stock was raised. It appears to me that on the exercise of those statutory powers $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was the "prescribed rate" as to that stock. Therefore, as to the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., as well as the 5 per cent., there is equally a "prescribed rate." Where there is a prescribed rate the company has no business to distribute among the shareholders any sum over and above that prescribed rate. The surplus is for other purposes. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument fails. The argument rests upon this, that, there being no prescribed rate, the company is entitled to distribute its surplus among the shareholders until the total deficiencies of 10 per cent. dividends on all its capital during the time of its existence have been made up. That argument breaks down when a different rate than 10 per cent. is the prescribed rate. There is a prescribed rate with reference to the subscribed capital of the company, except as to the ordinary shares. These shares have 10 per cent. substituted for the prescribed rate; the other shares have been limited under statutory powers to 5 per cent. as regards one class, and to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as regards the other. For these reasons it seems to me that the conclusion arrived at by Sir

[CT. OF APP.]

JAMES V. OCEAN COAL COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

Edward Fry is right, and that this appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with the reasons given by Sir Edward Fry for the conclusion arrived at by him and his co-arbitrators, and with the judgment just delivered by my Lord, and I have nothing to add.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It really is not necessary to add anything as to the point which has been first discussed, and I will only deal with the last point made. It is said that the preference stock raised at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. stands on a different footing from the preference stock raised at 5 per cent. It is impossible to doubt that if the company had raised all their preference stock at 5 per cent., that would have been the prescribed rate under sect. 13. The language of the section is perfectly plain. The company had the most ample powers to issue this preference stock at any of the different rates mentioned or referred to in the course of the section, and where no rate is prescribed by the special Act, which is the case here, then, as it seems to me, the prescribed rate is the sum fixed by the company as the rate which they are willing to pay. Whether you are dealing with the 5 per cent. or with the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. preference stock the position is exactly the same. In each case the interest arrived at is the prescribed rate.

Appeal dismissed.

JAMES V. OCEAN COAL COMPANY LIMITED. (a)
APPEAL UNDER THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897.

Employer and workman—Injury by accident—Compensation—Review of weekly payment—Fluctuations of wages at collieries—Alteration in maximum of compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), sched. 1, pars. 1 (b) 2, 12.

A workman employed as a haulier in a colliery was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, by which he was totally incapacitated for work for several months. In the district where he was working the rate of wages for hauliers were fixed every three months by a conciliation board, the rate varying with the price of coal.

During the workman's total incapacity for work, his employers made him a weekly payment of half the wages which he was earning at the date of the accident, as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Afterwards they took him back into their service at an employment on light work, and gave him as weekly wages a sum which was larger than the weekly payment which they had been making him, and which was the same amount as hauliers then were receiving, the rate of hauliers' wages having fallen since his accident. At the same time the employers ceased to continue the weekly payment to the workman. He therefore applied to the County Court judge, as for a review of his weekly payment, to have the weekly payment fixed.

The County Court judge held that the maximum which had been originally fixed on the average weekly earnings at the time of the accident was subject to variation from time to time to the same extent as the rate of wages as fixed by the conciliation board; and he also held that as the workman was then receiving from his employers the same rate of wages as was then being received by hauliers, the workman was not entitled to any weekly payment, but he made a declaration of the employers' liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Upon the workman's appeal:

Held, that the County Court judge was wrong in holding that the maximum weekly payment, which was originally fixed at the date of the accident, could be varied according to the variations in the rate of hauliers' wages.

APPEAL by a workman from the decision of the judge of the Bridgend County Court of Glamorganshire in an application under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

The workman had been employed as a haulier by the defendants, a colliery company.

On the 9th Oct. 1901 he met with an injury to his spine by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, which totally incapacitated him from work up to the 15th June 1903.

His average weekly earnings for the twelve months preceding the accident were 34s., and the defendants agreed to make him a weekly payment of half that amount—i.e., 17s.—which was the maximum that he could have obtained under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

There was no award, nor was any memorandum of the agreement registered.

On the 15th June 1903 the defendants took him again into their employ, and gave him light work in the lamp room, for which they paid him 29s. 5d. a week, and they at the same time ceased to make him the weekly payment which they had made to him since his accident.

At the pit where this workman was employed lampmen received fixed weekly wages, which did not vary with the price of coals as did the wages paid to hauliers.

The workman then made an application to the County Court judge, in the nature of an application for a review, asking for an order fixing the amount of compensation to which he was lawfully entitled, and contending that he was entitled to 4s. 7d. a week—i.e., the difference between 34s. and 29s. 5d.

It appeared that in the case of hauliers, and most of the persons working in the coalfields of South Wales, there is a standard day wage to which is added a percentage varying with the price of coal.

These percentages are regulated every three months by a conciliation board.

In June 1903 the price of coal had fallen, compared with what it had been in Oct. 1901, and the wages of a haulier, which had been 34s. a week in Oct. 1901, were in June 1903 only 29s. 5d. a week, so that the wages which this workman was getting, at the time of his application to the County Court judge, for his light work in the lamp room, were the same as he would have been getting if he had then been employed at his former work, as a haulier.

The County Court judge, in the course of his judgment, said:

The principal question for decision in this case is whether, when the amount of compensation has been decided either by award or agreement, on the basis of the earnings of the injured person prior to the accident, by which for a time he was totally incapacitated from working, that compensation is subject to revision when he is able to undertake light employment, and whether it is subject to the variations governing the wages paid to persons doing similar work to that which he performed prior to the accident. I am of opinion that the proper principle to be adopted in such circumstances is that the basis—i.e., the wages on which the amount of compensation was originally fixed—should be varied to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages earned by persons performing similar work at the time, but that the wages earned by the injured person when he undertook light employment should be supplemented by a sum which would bring up his earnings to the same amount as is paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident. Now, in the case of Jamieson v. Fife Coal Company (5 Fraser, 958), Lord McLaren, in delivering judgment, concurring with his learned colleagues, makes use of these words: "Where in an application for review you have to consider wage-earning capacity, that is a thing which may vary from time to time, and if this was a question of wage-earning capacity, it might be right for the arbiter to consider the present rate of wages." That dictum appears to me to support the view I have expressed above. The effect of my decision is to place the injured workman in the same position with regard to earnings as he would have been in if he had not been injured, for if he had continued to work without interruption, his wages would have been subject to the variations in the percentages, and would therefore in this case be less than those which he earned prior to the accident. On the other hand, if the applicant's contention is to be allowed—viz., that the wages earned by him in undertaking light employment are to be supplemented by a sum which would bring them up to those which he earned prior to the accident, he would be receiving higher wages than those who were at that time engaged in a similar capacity. That, in my opinion, would be absurd. In arriving at these conclusions I have not lost sight of the fact that he is, as a consequence of the injuries he has received, still unable to undertake the duties which he performed prior to the accident, or, indeed, any heavy work. In applying the principle which I have laid down as affecting the variations in the percentages I find that the respondents have, since the 15th June 1903, paid the applicant the proper amount of compensation, for he has received the same rate of wages as those hauliers who performed the same duties as he did prior to the accident. Their wages have, by the stop in the percentages, been reduced to the same amount as he has been paid. He therefore fails in his application to review the amount of compensation paid to him. I therefore award to the applicant compensation at the same rate as he has received since the 15th June, and, as he is still suffering from the effect of the accident, and unable to resume his former occupation, there will be a declaration of liability.

From this decision the workman appealed.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides:

Sched. 1, par. 1. The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) Where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding fifty per cent. of his average weekly earnings, during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed . . . Par. 2. In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment, not being wages, which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury, during the period of his incapacity.

Abel Thomas, K.C. and Rhys Williams (Sankey with them) for the workman.—The County Court judge was bound to exercise his discretion as to how much compensation the workman ought to have under the circumstances of the case, but in exercising that discretion he has held that he was bound to take into consideration the general fall in wages since the accident. He was wrong in so holding, and has to that extent misdirected himself. We therefore ask that the case may be sent back to him that he may decide it upon his discretion, without his decision being fettered in any way by the general fall in wages since the accident. The maximum compensation which the workman could get is limited by sched. 1, par. 1 (b) to half his average weekly earnings before the accident. When once that maximum has been calculated, it remains fixed. Nothing happening after the accident can alter it. If it is proposed to alter this weekly payment then, according to par. 2, regard is to be had to the difference between his average weekly earnings before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident. The variations in the general rate of wages in the district has nothing to do with the question before the County Court judge. Wages in the coalfields are liable to alteration every three months, and are continually changing either upwards or downwards. If the County Court judge was right in his opinion, there will be an application for a review every three months in all cases in which a workman who has been accidentally injured in a colliery is in receipt of a weekly payment as compensation under the Act. The County Court judge has misunderstood what Lord McLaren said in Jamieson v. Fife Coal Company (ubi sup.).

Ruegg, K.C. (A. Parsons with him) for the employers.—In considering the change in the workman's wage-earning capacity the County Court judge was right to give some weight to the general fall of wages paid to men doing the same work as this workman did before the accident. In effect, the County Court judge said that he was not going to put the workman into a better position as regards money than he would have been if he had not met with the accident. His decision was perfectly correct. The consideration of the question of the proper amount of compensation was altogether a matter for the discretion of the County Court judge, and this court ought not to interfere with his exercise of his discretion.

Collins, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the County Court judge upon an application by a workman, not in the strictest sense for revision of a weekly payment, but to have it determined what amount of compensation ought to be paid to him under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 under the particular circumstances of the case. What happened was that the workman, who had been a haulier in the service of the defendant company, met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, which resulted in total incapacity on his part to do work, for a time at all events. His average weekly earnings for the preceding twelve months had been 34s. In so far as that sum was an average, consideration was doubtless given to the fluctuations of wages. But that was the sum which was fixed by the parties themselves without the intervention or assistance of the County Court judge, as the average weekly earnings, and accordingly the defendants made the workman after the accident a weekly payment of 17s., which would be the maximum that he could claim under the Act. Afterwards when he was sufficiently recovered to accept light work, he was taken back into the employment of the defendants, and for the work which he was able to do, which was not the same kind of work that he had done before the accident, he received wages at the rate of 29s. 5d. a week. Now 29s. 5d. is the full present rate of wages for a haulier—that is to say, for a person in the kind of employment in which he was engaged at the time of his accident. Under these circumstances, the defendants naturally refused to continue paying compensation to the workman in addition to his wages. The workman, being unsatisfied with that, applied to the County Court judge for an order settling what amount of compensation the defendants ought to pay. In the result the learned County Court judge found that the defendants' contention that the workman was getting enough was right; he therefore did not award the workman any compensation, but made a declaration of the defendants' liability so as to keep seisin of the case. Now, if the learned judge had simply declared his view that he saw no reason under the circumstances for interfering with the arrangement then in existence whereby the workman was receiving the sum of 29s. 5d. a week, and if he had not travelled into a discussion as to reasons and principles I think that we should have had no ground for interfering with his decision. I have no right to express any opinion as to whether he was right or wrong in the particular amount that he assessed. It is sufficient for me to see no reason to suppose that it is not a perfectly proper amount. But now comes the real difficulty. The learned County Court judge has given reasons. A question was raised which, we are told, the parties on both sides were very anxious to have decided, and therefore, at the invitation of counsel, the learned judge travelled into a discussion of principle, and he has laid down some rule of calculation which I myself am not prepared to adopt. Now, the first question which the learned judge put to himself was whether, when the amount of compensation has been decided, either by award or by agreement, upon the basis of the earnings of the injured workman before the accident, by which he has for a time been totally incapacitated from work, that compensation is subject to revision when he is able to undertake light employment. It is perfectly clear that under sched. 1 the answer to that question must be that the compensation is subject to revision. It is perfectly clear. The Act admits no doubt about it. It is the second question that he put to himself which seems to me, when analysed, to involve a misconception of the law on his part, and in so far as that misconception was a factor in arriving at the amount which he has actually arrived at it is no doubt important, and I do not think that we should be justified in ignoring it and treating it as having no relation to the final decision. Now, the second question which the learned County Court judge put to himself was whether the compensation—which, ex hypothesi, was the maximum allowed in the case of total incapacity—is subject to the variations governing the wages paid to persons doing similar work to that which he performed prior to the accident. That question arises for consideration on an application to review. The learned judge went on to say: "I am of opinion that the proper principle to be adopted in such circumstances is that the basis—i.e., the wages on which the amount of compensation was originally fixed—should be varied to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages earned by persons performing similar work at the time, but that the wages earned by the injured person when he undertook light employment should be supplemented by a sum which would bring up his earnings to the same amount as is paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident." That seems to me to carry out what would apparently appear to be the prima facie meaning of the second question that he puts to himself, and to be an opinion that the basis—i.e., the maximum which has been fixed by reference to the then amount of wages—is to be varied, on an application for a revision, to the extent of the variation of the percentages in the wages earned by persons performing similar work at the time. In so far as he committed himself to that view and acted on it, the learned judge was, in my opinion, wrong, because, in my judgment, the maximum fixed in the first instance is entirely independent of any fluctuation in the wages afterwards. That is in accordance with the decision of the Court of Session in the case of Jamieson v. Fife Coal Company Limited (5 Fraser, 958), and also in accordance with the whole scheme and actual wording of the Act. When the compensation for total incapacity has been arrived at, whether it be the maximum allowed, or whether it be under the maximum, that factor is not to be altered by matters that occur subsequently. I take exception also to what the learned judge said with regard to the wages earned by the injured man being supplemented by a sum which would bring up his earnings to the same amount as is paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident. I do not think that in this particular case it would be at all wrong to supplement the original maximum by a sum which would bring the workman's wages up to the same amount as are paid to persons in similar employment to that in which he was engaged prior to the accident. But it is impossible to lay down a general principle that that ought to be the sum which is arrived at. In fact we have repeatedly held in this court in cases of this kind, that the County Court judge must not lay down rigid canons obliging him to come to conclusions for special amounts—for the same amount in any number of different cases. He must not apply a general rigid rule like that. He must be governed by his discretion in each particular case. Therefore, so far as the learned County Court judge here laid down a fixed rule of calculation, I think he was wrong. His direction to himself involved an opinion that the original maximum is itself subject to variation by matters subsequently arising. As I have said, that seems to me to be wrong, and if and so far as that error entered into the calculation that he has made, that calculation ought to be reviewed. I am not sure myself that it did enter into his calculation. It seems to me that it was entirely irrelevant to the discussion, because, if it were not for this reference to the principles governing the matter and the rigid rules to be applied, the matter, upon the Act itself, is perfectly clear. When compensation to an injured workman has to be assessed in a case of total incapacity to work, his average weekly earnings have to be found, and that involves an examination of what the injured workman has been earning in that particular employment. When the amount of those average weekly earnings has been found, the weekly payment awarded cannot be more than half that amount. When that is arrived at the matter is done with and ended. But then comes the case where the law provides for a revision of the weekly payment. In fixing the amount of the weekly payment par. 2 of sched. 1 provides that "regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident, and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident, and to any payment not being wages which he may receive from the employer in respect of his injury during the period of his incapacity." So that when the new factor is introduced, the County Court judge ought to consider the question: "What ought this workman to get in order to receive the nearest equivalent that in my judgment I can give him under all the circumstances so as to put him back again, as far as the Act will permit, into the position which he was in originally? The Act does not contemplate complete compensation, and in cases of total incapacity to work, fixes the maximum at half the average weekly earnings. What am I to do now, when it is proved that the man is no longer suffering from total incapacity to work, but is able to earn something?" It seems to me that the elements of fluctuation in the original maximum is entirely remote from the discussion. In such a case as this, where there is an application for a review, what the County Court judge has to do is to reduce the weekly payment by reason of the fact that the incapacity to work is no longer total, but how far he is to reduce it is a matter which is left by the law entirely to his discretion subject to the rule which I have just read, laid down in par. 2. That is all that is laid down for the judge. He is to regard those facts. The facts there mentioned do not embrace the consideration which the learned County Court judge appears to have introduced here as to whether the maximum originally awarded has been subject to a fluctuation. That maximum is out of the discussion in the question that he has now to deal with. He has to consider how much the workman was capable of earning before and how much he is capable of earning now. Having regard to those facts, the learned judge must arrive at the best conclusions he can. It seems to me, therefore, that in the course of his judgment the County Court judge has expressed an opinion which, in my view, is wrong. I cannot be quite clear that it did not really affect the calculation that he made, and therefore I see no alternative myself but to send the matter back to him. It may be that I have not completely understood what he himself intended by that expression of opinion, and it may be that when he comes to reconsider the matter he will make no alteration whatever in the award that he has actually given. But I cannot be sure of that, and as the point was strongly pressed upon him as an element which was material in determining the case, I think that it is possible he may have been influenced by it, and therefore there may be a mistake, and he would not arrive at the same amount if he cleared his mind of that. There is another point in the form of his judgment which seems to show that he had not quite cleared his mind. He says: "I find that the respondents have since the 15th June paid the applicant the proper amount of compensation, for he has received the same rate of wages as those hauliers who performed the same duties as he did prior to the accident. Their wages have by the drop in the percentages been reduced to the same amount as he has been paid; he therefore fails in his application to review the amount of compensation paid to him. I therefore award to the applicant compensation at the same rate as he has received since the 15th June." That, on the face of it, is clearly wrong. What he does give him is 1*l.*, because he thinks that, being in receipt of the sum named, he is not really entitled to demand from the employers anything by way of compensation now under the Act, so that there is a technical mistake there. How far that entered into and confused his mind on the main discussion I cannot tell, and under the circumstances I think we have no alternative but to send the matter back to the learned County Court judge.

JAMES V. OCEAN COAL COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

ROMER, L.J.—My brethren are both clearly of opinion that the learned County Court judge has misdirected himself in this case, and has not, or may have not, properly exercised the discretion which he ought to have exercised. There are some passages in his judgment which certainly do not appear to me to be accurate statements of the law. I regret the result, however, for I cannot think that the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge was in itself improper. I say this because, in the circumstances of the case, it appears to me clear that the judge, in reviewing the weekly payment, could take, and ought to have taken, into consideration the fact that the workman was again in the employment of his old employers, and was being paid the same wages—far exceeding the amount of compensation awarded—that he would have been earning had no accident occurred. I cannot see that the judge would have been wrong in refusing to make the employers pay the workman any further sum so long as they continued to pay him those wages. I further cannot help thinking that the sole effect of the matter going back to the learned judge will be, or may be, that he will arrive, after properly exercising his discretion, at the same conclusion that he has already arrived at, and that the sole practical result of the appeal will be that further costs will be incurred. However, as the point has been taken and insisted upon by the appellants, the case must go back to the County Court judge.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question that has been argued is whether or not the learned County Court judge thought that he was bound, in dealing with the question of the reduction of the weekly payment, to look at the wages which the man was earning at that time, and he came to the conclusion that, if the man were whole, he could not have earned more at that time, and the learned judge therefore thought he was bound to dismiss the man's application. I think that was wrong. In order to get away from that statement of what the learned judge intended to decide, it was said that he dealt with the case upon the footing that the arrangement with the employers was a fluctuating arrangement, an arrangement that the man should be paid for his light employment such wages as he would have earned as a haulier. If that had been the point made, and the learned judge thought that such an arrangement had been come to, there would have been nothing further to decide. I am clearly of opinion that he did not proceed upon any such footing. Then it was said that if he did not decide it upon that view, and if there was not an agreement to that effect when the parties were before him, we ought to deal with it upon the footing that he did exercise the discretion which is undoubtedly confided to him by the Act of Parliament. I act upon the learned judge's own statement of the principle upon which he proceeded. That principle seems to me to be wrong, and the case must therefore go back to him.

STEPHENS v. DUDBRIDGE IRONWORKS COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

*Employer and workman—Injury by accident—
Compensation—Right of action for damages—
Exercise of option between two remedies—
Infant—"Workman"—Workmen's Compensation
Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), ss. 1, sub-s. 2 (b), 7.*

An infant workman met with an injury in the course of his employment under circumstances which entitled him either to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, or to bring an action for damages for negligence against his employers. The employers offered him compensation under the Act, which he accepted in full satisfaction and discharge of all his claims against them in respect of his injury. He afterwards brought an action against them for damages for negligence. At the trial Bruce, J. held that the agreement by the plaintiff to accept compensation under the Act in satisfaction of all his claims in respect of the injury was not for the plaintiff's benefit, and therefore did not afford any defence to the action. Upon appeal:

Held (affirming the decision of Bruce, J.), that there was nothing in the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 which deprived the infant workman of his right to repudiate a contract which was not to his benefit.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Bruce, J. on further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury at Gloucester assizes.

The action was brought by John Stevens, an infant of the age of seventeen years, suing by S. R. Smith, his guardian and next friend, to recover damages for an injury which he had received, while working as an apprentice to the defendants, in consequence of the alleged negligence of the defendants.

On the 12th April 1901 the plaintiff was apprenticed to the defendants.

On the 15th Aug. 1902, while he was working on the defendant's premises at a planing machine, which was unfenced, or not properly fenced, he met with an accident whereby he lost three fingers of his left hand.

On the 30th Sept. his uncle, S. R. Smith, with whom he was living, wrote a letter to the defendants, claiming, on behalf of John Stevens, the sum of 50*l.* as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

On the 3rd Oct. the company wrote in reply that they could not accede to the request for a lump sum, but were willing to pay compensation in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act—i.e., half his weekly wages during disablement; and as the plaintiff's wages were 5*s.* a week, they offered 2*s.* 6*d.* a week for the third and subsequent weeks of disablement.

On the 4th Oct. the plaintiff went to the defendant's office, and having read the letters of the 30th Sept. and the 3rd Oct., received a sum of 12*s.* 6*d.* as the first five of the successive weekly payments of 2*s.* 6*d.* each, and signed a receipt in the following form:

Received of the Dudbridge Ironworks Limited by payment of the Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation Limited, this 4th day of October, 1902, the sum of 12*s.* 6*d.*, being the first five of the successive weekly payments which I elect to accept under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims to compensation accrued or to accrue in respect of all injuries or injurious results, direct or indirect, arising or to arise from an accident sustained by me on or about the 15th day of August last, while in the employment of the above.—JOHN STEPHENS.

On the 4th Nov. 1902, the plaintiff's solicitor served upon the defendants a formal notice, headed the Employers' Liability Act 1880, and the Workmen's Compensation Acts 1897 to 1900, in which he claimed compensation for the injuries received by the plaintiff on the 15th Aug.

The defendants continued to pay the plaintiff the agreed weekly payment of 2*s.* 6*d.* until they had paid him in all the sum of 17*s.*, when they took him back into their employment at higher wages than he had formerly received.

On the 4th Jan. S. R. Smith was appointed guardian to the plaintiff.

On the 23rd Jan. 1903 the present action was commenced, in which the plaintiff claimed 150*l.* damages for personal injuries sustained by him whilst in the employ of the defendants, in consequence of the defective condition of the defendants' plant and machinery, and the negligence of the defendants and their responsible servant or servants.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

STEPHENS v. DUDBRIDGE IRONWORKS COMPANY LIMITED.

[CT. OF APP.]

At the trial of the action, before Bruce, J. with a jury, upon the defendants admitting negligence on their part in not fencing the planing machine, and the damages being agreed to at 75*l.*, the jury was discharged, and the defendants relied upon their contention that, under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, they could not be liable to pay compensation both under that Act and independently of the Act, and that the plaintiff by electing to accept compensation under the Act had debarred himself from succeeding in the present action.

Bruce, J., upon further consideration, said in the course of his judgment: The sole point is whether in the circumstances that I have mentioned the infant plaintiff has forfeited his right of action. In my opinion he has not done anything to disentitle him from recovering in the present action. The plaintiff, as an infant, was incapable of exercising an option whether to claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 or to proceed for negligence. The law considers that an infant is incapable of forming a judgment as to the necessity or expediency of applying for protection or redress to the tribunals of the country. The plaintiff, as an infant, was incapable of forming a judgment as to which of the two courses open to him it was most expedient to adopt. In view of the fact which is now established that the defendants were guilty of negligence in not fencing a dangerous machine, it was clearly in the plaintiff's interest not to elect to proceed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, because the compensation he could recover under that Act was very much smaller than the compensation he could recover in an action for negligence. Beyond the claim made by Mr. Smith on behalf of the plaintiff by the letter of the 30th Sept., and the acceptance by the plaintiff of the sums paid to him by the defendants as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, there is nothing to operate as an estoppel. I entertain some doubt whether there ever was a claim by the plaintiff for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act within the meaning of sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). No steps were ever taken to proceed to arbitration or to institute proceedings in any form under the Workmen's Compensation Act, nor was any next friend appointed to represent the interest of the plaintiff in accordance with the County Court Rules. All that took place was done by the voluntary act of the parties, and there was no formal proceeding under the Act. Had there been any such proceeding, and had a next friend been appointed, the County Court judge might have instituted an inquiry as to whether it was to the interest of the plaintiff to proceed under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and had such an inquiry been instituted I think it would certainly have been determined that it was not to the interest of the plaintiff so to proceed. But it is not necessary to speculate as to what might have been the state of things had a different procedure been adopted. It is enough for me to determine that in the circumstances which have happened there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from recovering damages in the present action. The plaintiff was not capable of bargaining away his common law rights, and no one was ever appointed whose duty it was and who was capable of advising him as to the course which he could pursue, and no proceedings were ever taken in such a form as to be binding upon the plaintiff. But I think the plaintiff is not entitled to retain the sum of money received by him as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Courts of equity, in setting aside proceeding on behalf of infants, always took care to make special provisions to provide against injustice being done, and to prevent the infant from deriving a benefit from the proceedings which were set aside. I must therefore direct that the sums of money received by the plaintiff as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act be deducted from the amount agreed upon as the damages in the present action, and that judgment for the balance so ascertained be given for the plaintiff with costs.

The defendants appealed.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37) provides as follows:

Sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). When the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceedings independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid.

Sect. 7. In this Act . . . "workman" includes every person who is engaged in an employment to which this Act applies, whether by way of manual labour or otherwise, and whether his agreement is one of service, or apprenticeship, or otherwise. . . .

Ruegg, K.C. (Corner and A. S. Poyser with him) for the defendants.—The plaintiff has disabled himself from succeeding in this action by his acceptance of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. Sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b) provides that a "workman" may exercise an option, either to claim compensation under the Act or to take such proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of the Act, and the employer is not to be liable to pay compensation to a "workman" both independently of and also under the Act. The interpretation clause, sect. 7, expressly says that the word "workman" is to include an apprentice. Whatever may be the rights of an infant to repudiate a contract he has entered into on the ground that it is not for his benefit, they are not material for consideration in this case. The right of compensation under the Act of 1897 is purely statutory. It is a right which the plaintiff could not obtain unless he first showed that he came within the definition "workman" in sect. 7. If he is a "workman" for the purposes of any part of the Act, he is a "workman" for the purposes of sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). He had a statutory ability to bind himself, just as much as though he were a workman of full age, by his exercise of the option given by that sub-section, and he has bound himself irrevocably by what he has done. The Act makes no exception in favour of infants.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. and L. Morton Brown for the plaintiff.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Bruce, J. in an action brought by an infant by his next friend in which damages at common law were claimed in respect of personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff through the alleged negligence of his employers in not fencing certain machinery. At the trial of the action the defendants admitted that they had been guilty of negligence, and the amount of damages was agreed to, so that the only question left for decision was whether, by reason of proceedings which had taken place before action brought, the plaintiff was prevented from putting his claim in suit. What had taken place was this: Upon the happening of the accident by which the plaintiff lost three of his fingers, his uncle wrote to the defendants asking for a lump sum of money as compensation, that being a thing which the plaintiff was not entitled to under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. The defendants' answer was that under that Act the plaintiff was only entitled to a weekly payment of half his wages, and they offered to pay him that amount—i.e., 2s. 6d. a week. The boy accepted that offer and signed a receipt in which he acknowledged that the weekly payments were accepted by him under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims to compensation in respect of injuries resulting from the accident. He continued to receive the weekly payment of 2s. 6d. until he was restored to health and able to work again. He then seems to have consulted a solicitor, who served on the defendants a notice claiming compensation, and a few weeks later the writ in the present action was issued. The question now is, whether by reason of the events which occurred after the accident and before this action was brought the plaintiff is debarred from succeeding in the action. The point arises under sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897. [His Lordship read it.] It is contended on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiff is a "workman" within the meaning of the Act, and that under this sub-section he was given an option either to claim compensation under the Act or to claim damages independently of the Act, and that he had exercised his option. Now, the definition of "workman" in sect. 7 of the Act covers the case of an apprentice, and therefore it was argued that a person who is engaged in an employment to which the Act applies has a statutory permission, though he is under the age of twenty-one years, to exercise the option which is given by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2 (b). But, in my opinion, the definition of workman in sect. 7 does not alter the ordinary law of the land that an infant cannot bind himself by a contract which is not for his benefit. Bruce, J. held at the trial of this action that the contract by which the plaintiff agreed to accept the weekly payment in satisfaction of all his claims in respect of the injury was not for his benefit, and that, as the defendants admitted negligence on their part, the plaintiff was entitled to the agreed amount of damages. In my opinion his decision was right. The definition of "workman" in sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 does not, by its inclusion of apprentices, alter the general law as to the inability of infants to bind themselves by contracts which are not for their benefit. I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. Apart from the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 it is clear that the course taken by this infant plaintiff before commencing this action would not estop him in any way from succeeding in it or afford any defence to the defendants; and I think that there is nothing in the Act to prevent the action being brought.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no reason that I can see for supposing that the Legislature intended to impose by this Act any special disabilities on infants.

Appeal dismissed.

CULLEN v. ELWIN AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Trade union—Application of funds to provide benefits to members—Principal object of society—Divisibility of objects—Rules in restraint of trade—Illegal society—Action by member to enforce benefit rules—Trade Union Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 4.

A society registered under the Trade Union Acts was governed by rules some of which made provision for benefits to members, and the others were illegal as being in restraint of trade.

A member brought an action against the officers of the society to enforce a rule of the society under which he claimed to be entitled to a superannuation allowance.

Held, upon the consideration of all the rules of the society, that the main object of the society was illegal at common law as being in restraint of trade, and that those rules which made provision for benefits to members were merely ancillary to that main object, and could not be separated from it.

Held, therefore, affirming the judgment of the Divisional Court (88 L. T. Rep. 686), that under sect. 4 of the Trade Union Act 1871 the action must fail.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) reversing the decision of the judge of the Nottingham County Court.

The plaintiff was a member of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses, and brought this action in the Nottingham County Court against the officers of the society to recover arrears of a superannuation allowance, which he claimed to be entitled to under the rules of the society.

The County Court judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upon appeal, the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J., Wills and Channell, JJ.) were of opinion that the society was illegal, and that therefore the action would not lie; and they reversed the decision of the County Court judge, and gave judgment for the society.

The case is reported 88 L. T. Rep. 636.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Trade Union Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31) provides as follows:

Sect. 4. Nothing in this Act shall entitle any court to entertain any legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the following agreements—namely . . . (3) Any agreement for the application of the funds of a trade union (a) to provide benefits to members. . .

The Amalgamated Society of Tailors and Tailoresses was registered in England under the Trade Union Acts 1871 and 1876, and was governed by rules of which the following parts are material:

Preamble. Much good has been accomplished by trade unions in times past, and still greater results remain to be achieved in the future. . . . The rules of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors, as now submitted, are constituted to mutually relieve each other in distress, disease, old age, and death. . . . Being convinced by experience that true unity can only be achieved by combining trade protection and benevolent objects in the benefits of one association, it has been endeavoured to frame the rules of the Amalgamated Society of Tailors so that individual right might be respected as well as the general weal secured. . . . We contend that no society, association, or insurance is so well calculated to achieve success, and give more general benefits to their members as a trade society. Whilst it not only secures to them all the benefits held forth by a friendly society by its unity and usefulness, it enhances the position of its members as workmen, who are in a position, by thorough organisation, to resist encroachments on their interests, but it is also an indispensable means of effecting whatever changes may be discovered as desirable between the relative positions of employer and employed. . . .

Rule i. Name and Objects. . . . (2) The objects of this society are (i.) the protection and furtherance of the interests of its members, the improvement of the conditions of employment in the tailoring trade, the moral and social elevation of its members, the regulation of the relation between workmen and employers, and to bring about the complete emancipation of labour from the exploitation of capital. (ii.) To raise funds for the mutual support of its members whilst travelling in search of work, or in cases of sickness and superannuation, and the burial of members and their wives.

Rules ii. to viii. inclusive related to the government of the society, the method of conducting its business, and entrance fees and contributions. Under the head of "Trade Benefits" came rules ix. (Power of Executive Council to assist Branches) and rules x. and xi.

Rule x. Protection. . . . (2) Any member or members leaving his or their employment under circumstances satisfactory to the executive council shall be entitled to the sum of 15s. per week, providing they have been members over six months; under six months and over three months, 12s.; if under three months 10s., while the strike lasts, except superannuated members, who shall only receive 15s. per week, superannuation pay included. A member in receipt of strike pay shall attend the club-house three times a day, to answer or sign his name, and shall be paid for the number of times he attends; but no member to receive support for any week wherein he has had four days' work. Members shall pay full contribution when in receipt of any benefit. When a strike or lock-out has been pending for a length of time, and the executive council consider it useless to prolong the struggle, they shall confer with the members of the branch and, if possible, bring the dispute to a close; but should the branch be unwilling to act upon their advice, the executive council shall cause the branch to make out a statement of their case, which shall accompany a statement to the executive council, to be sent to the country by the general secretary to be voted upon . . . (5) It is to be distinctly understood that all branches labouring under any grievance will use all legitimate means in their power to bring the matter to an amicable adjustment before requesting the aid of the executive council. In the event of such means failing, it will be the duty of the secretary in any of the said towns where the grievance exists, to forward in clear and laud terms the matter in dispute to the executive council, who shall take immediate steps to consider the case, and recommend a course of action subject to the approval of the majority of the members of the amalgamation, pending whose decision the aggrieved parties may continue to work. . . . (6) The decision of branches on all cases of appeal to be lodged with the general secretary within twelve days. . . . Should such decision stamp the case as a valid grievance, it will be the duty of the executive council to withdraw the men, and declare the town or towns on strike, intimate the same to all branches in the amalgamation, and recommend that no men apply for work in any of the towns during the dispute. . . . (7) Any officer being discharged from his employment for holding office, or any member being delegated on the business of the amalgamation and losing his employment in consequence, or an officer or member being victimised on the conclusion of a dispute for any action he may have taken in that dispute satisfactory to his branch, shall attend the club-house three times each day, and shall be allowed the statement of the town until he find employment satisfactory to the members of the branch, and shall be paid the expenses of removing himself and family to where he may obtain employment.

Rule xii. related to sick benefits. Rule xiii., relating to superannuation, was struck out in 1901 by a vote of the members of the country under rule i. (6). Rule xiv. related to general benefits. Rules xv. to xxv. related to the regulation of branches. Rules xxvi. to xxviii. related to the funds of the society: rule xxix. to members defrauding; rule xxx. to members leaving the United Kingdom.

Rule xxxi. Misconduct of Members. . . . (8) Any member acting contrary to the interest of the society, such as working for a shop on strike or lock-out, becoming a middleman or master sweater, and employing others to do the work, or working for a middleman or master sweater, or in other ways injuring the trade, contrary to the rules of the branch, shall be fined a sum not exceeding 5l., or expelled from the society. . . .

E. A. Jelf for the plaintiff.—This society is not illegal. Its fundamental object is the relief of members when disabled by age or accident, or when out of employment. Though some of the rules may be in restraint of trade, and as such illegal, yet, if the general objects of the society are not illegal, the existence of the illegal rules, though they could not be enforced, will not prevent the enforcement of rules in favour of members which are not in restraint of trade, or otherwise illegal:

Swaine v. Wilson, 62 L. T. Rep. 309; 24 Q. B. Div. 252.

In that case the Court of Appeal followed the judgment of the Privy Council delivered by Sir Montagu Smith:

Collins v. Locke, 41 L. T. Rep. 292; 4 App. Cas. 674.

The Divisional Court referred to a decision of the Divisional Court (Pollock, B. and Wills, J.) as being against me:

Old v. Robson, 62 L. T. Rep. 282.

In that case the society was held to be illegal, but though it was decided a few weeks later than Swaine v. Wilson (ubi sup.) in which the Court of Appeal enforced a rule in favour of a member, the decision of the Court of Appeal was not cited. Then again Rigby v. Connol (42 L. T. Rep. 139; 14 Ch. Div. 482) was cited against me. But in that case Sir George Jessel was not addressing his mind to the case of a society, some of the rules of which were legal and some illegal, and the illegal rules were capable of being separated from the legal rules.

Hugo Young, K.C. (Edmund Browne with him) for the defendants.—This society before the Trade Union Act 1871 would have been illegal, and though it is now to a certain extent legalised, this action is one that, under sect. 4 of the Act of 1871, cannot be maintained. The rules as to members' benefits are so mixed up with the illegal rules of the society that they cannot be separated so as to become enforceable. In Swaine v. Wilson (ubi sup.) there was no nexus, as there is here, between the legal and illegal rules. [He was stopped.]

Jelf in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court in an action brought by a member of a trade union to recover some benefits which he alleged he was entitled to under the rules of the trade union. Now I entirely agree with the decision of the court below, and the only thing that troubles me in the matter is that the Lord Chief Justice and Channell, J. expressed some hesitation in the view they took. The law on the subject was well established by the decision of the late Sir George Jessel, M.R. in Rigby v. Connol (ubi sup.), and as I understand it, it is this. At common law agreements in restraint of trade are bad, and combinations in restraint of trade are illegal. But the Trade Union Acts have, to a certain extent, and for certain limited purposes, modified the rigour of the common law. Sects. 2 and 3 of the Trade Union Act 1871 are as follows: [His Lordship read them]. That was the law which Sir George Jessel had to deal with, and he dealt with it, as it appears to me, in the most clear and unambiguous manner. With reference to an application to enforce one of these agreements inter se by members of a trade union, he pointed out that this statute did not confer any power, and did not take away any power, if it existed; and therefore you have to look to the common law to see whether the power existed or not, and try the matter by the common law. That is the effect of what Sir George Jessel said as to the construction of the Act, and he then went on to say: "The question therefore which I have to consider is, what would have happened without the Act? And it appears to me that without the Act it is clearly an unlawful association; it is an association by which men are not only restrained in trade, but they are bound to do certain acts under a penalty. Take the very act for which this man was expelled. He was expelled because he bound his son apprentice in a shop where the workmen did not belong to this union, but to another union. That is the allegation." That is the law. The question therefore here is whether there is anything in the rules of this society which makes it an illegal association at common law. It is possible for societies to frame rules which contain an element of illegality in them, without at the same time vitiating the whole system. It is possible. It is also possible for them to make rules which are apparently and ostensibly innocuous, and yet may vitiate the whole system, because, rightly understood and considered as a whole, their innocent parts are merely ancillary to that part which is not in point of law deemed to be legal. The question on which side of the line the particular rules of a particular society fall is a question of fact in each case. We have had authorities cited to us, one of them in particular falling on one side of the line, and the other as distinctly falling on the other side of the line. The case which was pressed upon us was Swaine v. Wilson (ubi sup.). There the Court of Appeal, on perusing the rules of the society, were able to arrive at the opinion that there was not such illegality in the rules as to vitiate the whole scheme and render it impossible to enforce them at common law. The rules are summarised in the report of the case, and the crucial point was whether they were ancillary to the illegal purpose of the society, or whether the illegal purpose came in only in particular rules, without being so inter-connected and indispensable to the rest as to carry its vicious character through the whole system. The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion, after looking at the rules, that the illegality was entirely separate from, and not mixed up with, the innocuous part of the rules, and therefore did not vitiate the whole scheme. The other case, Old v. Robson (ubi sup.), was one in which the court, upon reviewing the rules of the society, came to the opposite conclusion. In the present instance the question that we have to consider is on which side of the line does this case fall. In Swaine v. Wilson (ubi sup.) the society purported to be a friendly society. I do not say that that would be conclusive, but the society purported to be a friendly society, and not a trade union, and the greater number of the rules, on the face of them, were obviously fit rules for carrying out the purposes of a friendly society. Now, let us look at the rules of the present society. [His Lordship read the extracts from the preamble and the rules above set out.] There are other rules which were referred to by the learned judges in their judgments in the court below. It seems to me that it is perfectly impossible to say that the primary object of this society is not "trade protection," as they call it, by the ordinary means employed by trade unions—viz., strikes and so on, which at common law are illegal. That is the main purpose of the society, and all these other provisions are really ancillary to that main purpose. I cannot put the point better than in the words of Wills, J. After referring to the rules which provide that a member acting contrary to the interests of the society may be expelled, he said: "How can that be said to be such a society as Lord Esher's

K.B. Div.]

O'DONOGHUE (app.) v. MOON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

observations (in Suaine v. Wilson) apply to? The portions which are objectionable are of express intention and purpose. They are so mixed up with the friendly society part of it that any member who breaks the trade rules is liable to lose everything that he has put into the society. It seems to me that it is quite impossible under these circumstances to say that it is not a society with the most effectual guarantee that the members of it shall observe the rules which are made in restraint of trade. I cannot think under these circumstances that the expressions used in Lord Esher's judgment about whether the rules are mainly for the benefit purpose have any application. The two things are mixed up inextricably and you cannot separate the one from the other. If you cannot separate the one from the other, it seems to me the illegal portion is necessarily incorporated into the scheme of the friendly society portion of the work of the society." Those words seem to me to express exactly the substance of the case. The case is one as to which I feel no difficulty, and I am of opinion that the appeal fails.

ROMER, L.J.—I entirely agree with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and with the reasons given by him and by the learned judges in the court below for the conclusions they have arrived at; and I have nothing to add to what they have said.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that this is not a trade union, but a friendly society, and that, therefore, as far as the rules apply to a friendly society, this action may be maintained. On reading the rules and considering the whole system, I think that there can be no doubt that this is not a friendly society. The friendly part of it is only ancillary to the trade union part; and the condition and consideration for granting a superannuation allowance is that the applicant should belong from the first to the trade union. The society had power at any moment to terminate the membership and expel him for interfering with the main objects of the society.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Wednesday, May 4.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ.)

O'DONOGHUE (app.) v. MOON (resp.). (a)

Revenue—Excise duty—Carriage—Motor bicycle—Necessity of excise licence for—"Carriage drawn or propelled upon road by any mechanical power"—Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 8), s. 4.

A motor bicycle is, within the meaning of sect. 4 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888, a "carriage" for which a licence is required, as being a carriage drawn or propelled upon a road by mechanical power.

(a) Reported by W. W. OUN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CASE stated by two justices of the peace for the city and county of Bristol, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction.

The appellant was a supervisor of Inland Revenue for the city of Bristol.

The information laid by the appellant was as follows:

That the respondent, on the 23rd July 1903, in the city and county of Bristol, did keep a carriage—to wit, a motor bicycle—for the keeping of which a licence was and is required by the statute in that behalf, without having a proper licence under the statute, contrary to the form of the statutes in that case made and provided.

The definition of a "carriage" in the statute 51 & 52 Vict. c. 8 (the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888), s. 4, is as follows:

"Carriage" means and includes any carriage (except a hackney carriage) drawn by a horse or mule, or horses or mules, or drawn or propelled upon a road or tramway, or elsewhere than upon a railway, by steam or electricity or any other mechanical power, but shall not include a waggon, cart, or other such vehicle, which is constructed or adapted for use, and is used, solely for the conveyance of any goods or burden in the course of trade or husbandry, and whereon the Christian name and surname, and place of abode, or place of business of the person, or the name or style and principal or only place of business of the company or firm, keeping the same, shall be visibly and legibly painted in letters of not less than one inch in length.

The section imposes duties of excise upon every carriage as therein defined, as follows:

For every carriage as hereinafter defined—If such carriage shall have four or more wheels, and shall be drawn, or be adapted or fitted to be drawn, by two or more horses or mules, or shall be drawn or propelled by mechanical power, 2*l.* 2*s.* If such carriage shall have four or more wheels, and shall be drawn, or be adapted or fitted to be drawn, by one horse or mule only, 1*l.* 1*s.* If such carriage shall have less than four wheels, 1*s.*

The facts proved were as follows:—

On the 23rd July 1903 the respondent was riding on a motor bicycle. The motive power of the motor bicycle is an engine working by means of petrol under the control of the rider.

The respondent was the owner of and kept the motor bicycle alleged to be a carriage. He stated that he understood that it had been decided in Bristol that the motor bicycle was not a carriage in respect of which he could be required to take out an excise licence, or he would have complied with the law.

The appellant was represented by a solicitor from the office of the Inland Revenue at Somerset House, and he contended that the respondent kept a carriage, and asked the justices to inflict a nominal penalty.

With the knowledge that their decision, if they convicted the respondent, would be in conflict with the decision of the learned Recorder of Bristol, the justices decided not to convict, as the appellant's solicitor intimated that he would apply for a case for the opinion of the High Court.

Accordingly the justices gave their judgment as follows:

We personally think a motor bicycle is a "carriage" within the meaning of the Acts for the taxation of carriages, but the learned recorder in quarter sessions has taken the opposite view. We here, sitting in petty sessions, are bound to treat with the utmost respect the

K.B. Div.]

O'DONOGHUE (app.) v. MOON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

judgment of the recorder who sits in quarter sessions and as a court of appeal from the magistrates; and so we are going to uphold that judgment, and we are going to say in accordance with that judgment—though it is not in accordance with our own opinion—that a motor bicycle is not a “carriage,” and this information will consequently be dismissed.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether a motor bicycle is within the meaning of the statute a carriage for which a licence should have been taken out by the respondent.

Sir Edward Carson (S.-G.) (Rowlatt with him) for the appellant.—The short point raised is whether a motor bicycle—that is, a bicycle propelled by mechanical means—is a carriage under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888 for which an excise licence must be taken out. But for the fact that the justices were told that the Recorder of Bristol had given a contrary decision, they state that they would have decided that this motor bicycle was a carriage within the meaning of the Act and required a licence. The Act under which the penalty is claimed is the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 14); that Act has been altered as regards the definition of “carriage.” “Carriage” was there defined in sect. 19, sub-sect. 6, as meaning and including “any vehicle drawn by a horse or mule, or by horses or mules, except a waggon, cart,” and so forth. Then that definition was altered by sect. 4 of the Act of 1888, and after the words “or horses or mules” were added these words, “or drawn or propelled upon a road or tramway, or elsewhere than upon a railway, by steam or electricity or any other mechanical power.” The only question would seem to be whether this motor bicycle is a carriage drawn or propelled by mechanical power. It carries somebody; it has got two wheels, and it is driven by mechanical power. The matter does not rest there, because there have been a number of decisions on various Acts as to whether bicycles and tricycles were carriages or not, and what seems to be laid down is that you must take the context as regards each Act. Under the Locomotives on Highways Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 36), the matter is set at rest, because a light locomotive is a vehicle propelled by mechanical power. Light locomotives are defined in sect. 1 of that Act, and this motor bicycle was undoubtedly within that description. Even before that Act it had been held that a bicycle was a carriage, but this last Act meant to put an end to all these questions as regards light locomotives, as this undoubtedly was. It says, in sect. 1 (1) (b): “A light locomotive shall be deemed to be a carriage within the meaning of any Act of Parliament, whether public, general, or local, and of any rule, regulation, or by-law, made under any Act of Parliament, and, if used as a carriage of any particular class, shall be deemed to be a carriage of that class, and the law relating to carriages of that class shall apply accordingly.”

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. — Notwithstanding that this case has not been argued on the other side, I do not think that there is anything which could give rise to a reasonable doubt that a bicycle propelled by some mechanical means or other and carrying a person would be a carriage within the meaning of this Act. The definition of “carriage” in the Act includes “any carriage drawn or propelled upon a road or tramway, or elsewhere than upon a railway, by steam or electricity or any other mechanical power”; and, having regard to the gradual extension of this Act and common knowledge of what is going on, it seems to me that a machine which carries a person along a road is none the less a “carriage” because it is a very uncomfortable thing and because the person on it is shaken very much when he is going along. I think the decision was wrong, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

WILLS and KENNEDY, JJ. concurred.

Appeal allowed.
